My Family

My life began in the 1910s when Korea had suffered the worst tragic calamities. By the time I was born, Korea was already under the Japanese colonial rule. Korea was under the thumb of Japanese Emperor through a Japan-Korea Annexation agreement. The Korean people became slaves of Japanese Governor General of Korea. Korea, with her long, brilliant history, with rich natural resources and clear waterways, had become the stomping ground of Japanese boots and gun carriage wheels.

The Korean people seethed with anger and wept with sorrow over the loss of their nationhood. Countless patriots could not bear the tragedy that had befallen on Korea and opted to end their lives than to live under the Japanese yoke. They chose honorable death over shameful submission to the much despised Japanese.

Police and civil servants - and even school teachers - wore uniforms and carried samurai swords, and Korea was subjected to the most barbaric secret police state terrorism ever known to man. Under Emperor's direction, the Governor General commanded the military in Korea and yielded life and death powers over the Korean people. All Korean political organizations and scholastic entities were disbanded by the Governor General.

Our patriots were beaten with cowhide whips in Japanese torture chambers and prison cells. Japanese police applied the notorious Tokugawa Shogunate torture methods on our patriots; red-hot iron rods were mercilessly thrust into their bodies.

The Governor General issued edict after edict to enslave the Korean people: we were forced to color our traditional white attires; Japanese businessmen swarmed over Korea and took away our land and natural resources. They stole our national treasures and took them to Japan.

I have been to several nations that had been colonies and found no former colony that was forced to change family names and was forbidden to speak their native language; no colony was forced to give people's cooking pots and eating utensils to their colonists. No imperialists, with the sole exception of Japan, had perpetuated such inhuman acts.

Korea in those days was a living Hell, unfit for human habitation. The Korean people were, in all aspects, walking stiff; their spirits were dead, alive though their bodies were. Lenin's prediction that "Japan's hitherto unparalleled savage tortures of the Korean patriots and barbaric exploitation of Korea will continue, no matter what" was right on the mark.

The years of my childhood saw various imperial powers fighting over colonial spoils. In the year I was born, US Marines stormed Honduras, France made Morocco her protectorate, and Italy took Turkey's Rotus island. In Korea, the Land Examination Law was imposed by the Japanese to legitimize their land grab.

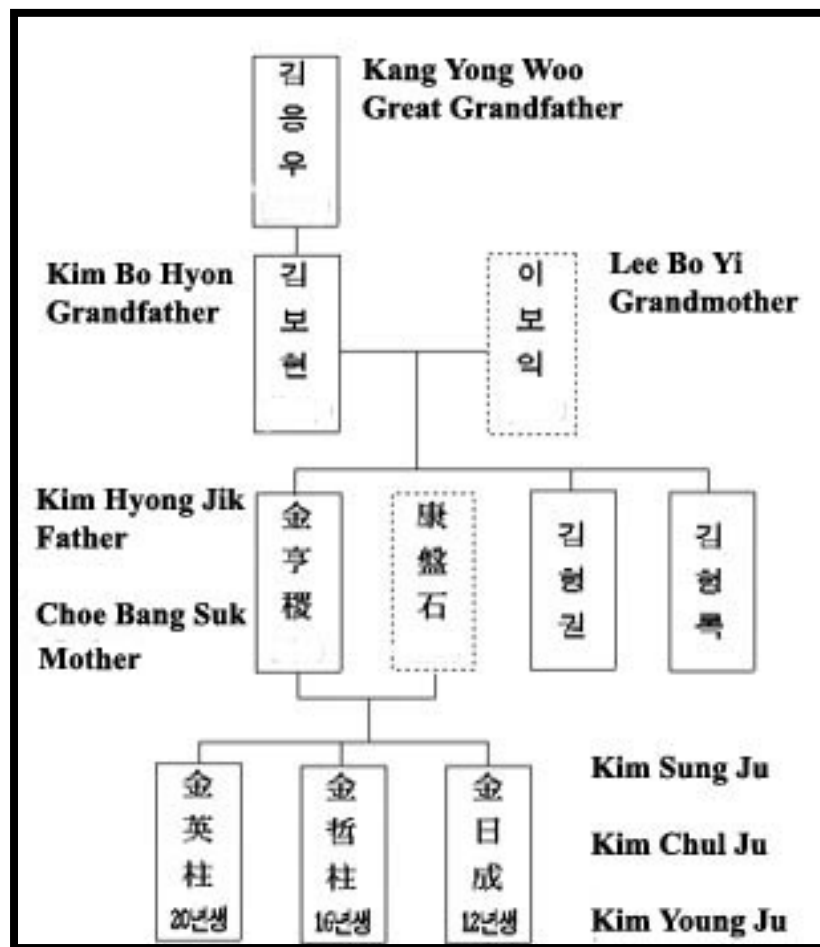

In short, it was my misfortune to be born in an era of evil events and to grow up seeing the worst of the Japanese savagery. These left indelible marks on my memory and shaped my future activities. My father told me how Korea got herself into the sad situation she was in, and I became angry at the elite of Korea who had let it happen. I swore then and there to devote the rest of my life to the task of driving out the Japanese colonists from Korea.

While other nations went about in mighty warships and rode shiny trains, our feudal leaders rode filthy scrawny donkeys wearing horse-hair hats and had wasted several hundred years in a stale state of stupor and suffocating economic stagnation. They kowtowed to foreign gunboat diplomacy and opened up the gate for foreign invasion and exploitation; Korea became an easy prey for the imperialists.

The Queen of Korea, still a sovereign nation in 1895, was cut to pieces in front of her own palace by foreign troops, and so-called King was locked up in a foreign legation for over a year in his own country. The King's father was kidnapped by a foreign power and Korea had to apologize for the incident. Guarding the palace was delegated to foreign troops. Who were to protect the nation and care for the Korean people in a situation such as this?

Though a tiny speck in the scheme of the Universe a family may be, it is an essential part of the world and it cannot live outside the world. The misfortune of Korea hit my family without mercy like a tidal wave. My family stood firm amidst the disasters and threats, weeping and laughing with the nation, and stood tall in the eye of the tornados sweeping the nation.

I was told that my great-great grandfather came from Chun-ju, North Chul-ra Province, in search of a better life in north Korea. My great grandfather, Kim Ung Woo, settled in Mangyong-dae in 1860. He was born in Jung-sung-ri, Pyongyang, and eked out a living farming. Lee Pyong Taek, a landowner in Pyongyang made him a caretaker of Lee's ancestral burial ground in Mangyong-dae. That was how we got to be in Mangyong-dae.

Lee Wha Ran notes: Kim Il Sung's birth name was Kim Sung Ju, he adopted Kim Il Sung as his nom de guerre. Kim Yong Woo's father, an impoverished farmer, moved to North Korea from South Korea in mid-1800. Kim Yong Woo caretaker of a rich landowner's ancestral burial ground near Mangyong-dae. Kim Bo Hyon was a farmer. Kim Hyong Jik was a school-teacher and became a medical doctor when Kim Il Sung was about 7.

Mangyng-dae is a beautiful village with clean air and green mountains around it. Mount Namsan rises left to my home and one gets breathtaking panoramic views of Taedong River from its summit. For this reason, many rich people from far away places and high government officials competed to buy up the mountains in this region for their ancestral graves. A mighty Pyong-ahn governor was supposedly buried there.

My family eked out living farming a tiny patch of land. To make the matter worse, after three generations of one-man-child, my grandfather, Kim Bo Hyon, and grandmother gave birth to six children, raising the family size to about ten mouths to feed. Grandpa worked day and night to put bread on the table for us. He got up early in the morn when others were still in bed, and collected wastes from neighboring villages. Late into the night, when other had gone to bed, he stayed up making straw ropes, sandals and sacks under a dim kerosene lamp.

My grandmother, Lee Bo Ik, ported water every night. My mother, Kang Ban Suk, my uncle's wife, Hyong Yang Sin, and my aunts, Kim Gu Il, Kim Hyong Sil and Kim Hyonf Book, worked the fields during the day and ran errands during the night. Because of our abject poverty, my uncle, Kim Hyong Rok, never set foot in a classroom, the closest to formal education he had received was the one-thousand character prose. He worked the field for grandpa since his childhood.

In spite of our hard work, we had barely enough to eat; there were days when we could not afford even a small bowl of thin rice gruel. Unprocessed grains were often served; I still recall how much trouble I had swallowing those course hard-to-digest grains, which were normally fed to domestic animals. Fruits or meats were beyond our reach. Once I had a growth on my neck and Grandma somehow brought home a tiny bit of pork. The pork in my stomach made the growth to go away. Since that time on, I often wished that the growth would come back, so that I could taste pork once again.

*Lee Wha Rang notes: Kim Il Sung's family - from left to right, Kim Sung Ju (aka Kim Il Sung), his father Kim Hyong Jik (holding Kim Young Ju, was tortured to death by the Japanese), Kim Chul Ju (killed by the Japanese in battle) and his mother, Kang Bang Suk, circa 1920. When I was a child growing up in Mangyong-dae, Grandma often lamented over the fact that our family owned no clock. Grandma was not keen on material wealth, but she did envy the wall clock of our neighbor next door, the sole household with a clock in our village. Grandma's clock obsession began with my father's schooling. She was dead afraid that my father might be late for school and used to wake up several times during the night to check the time. She had no clock and so, she had to guess the time by looking at the sky and other natural time pieces. Many times, she got up and, misreading her natural clocks, got the breakfast ready hours prior to the actual breakfast time.

My father's school, Sung-sil Middle School, was about 30 ri from our house and Grandma would not think of sending her son to school on empty stomach. Many days, Grandma would get up hours before the time and hanged around the kitchen; she would send my mother to the next door to get the time.

Mother, not wanting to wake the neighbor, would squat down by the neighbor's house, listening for the clock's hourly chimes.

Years later, when I returned home from Paldogu, my uncle's wife asked me how my father was and then she told me how relieved she was that I lived so close to my school in Paldogu. She recalled how tough it was to send my father to school on time without a clock in the house. Our family home did not have a clock until the day of Liberation.

Dirty poor though we were, it was our family tradition to share whatever we had with needy neighbors and relatives. Even though we lived on rice gruel more often than not, we helped other people as much as we could.

Grandpa used to tell us - "You can live without money, but you cannot live without kindness.", which became my family tradition and way of life, our philosophy. My father was eager to learn new ideas and had a high level of scholastic aptitude. He wanted to attend formal schools after learning the one-thousand-character prose from a traditional village scholar..

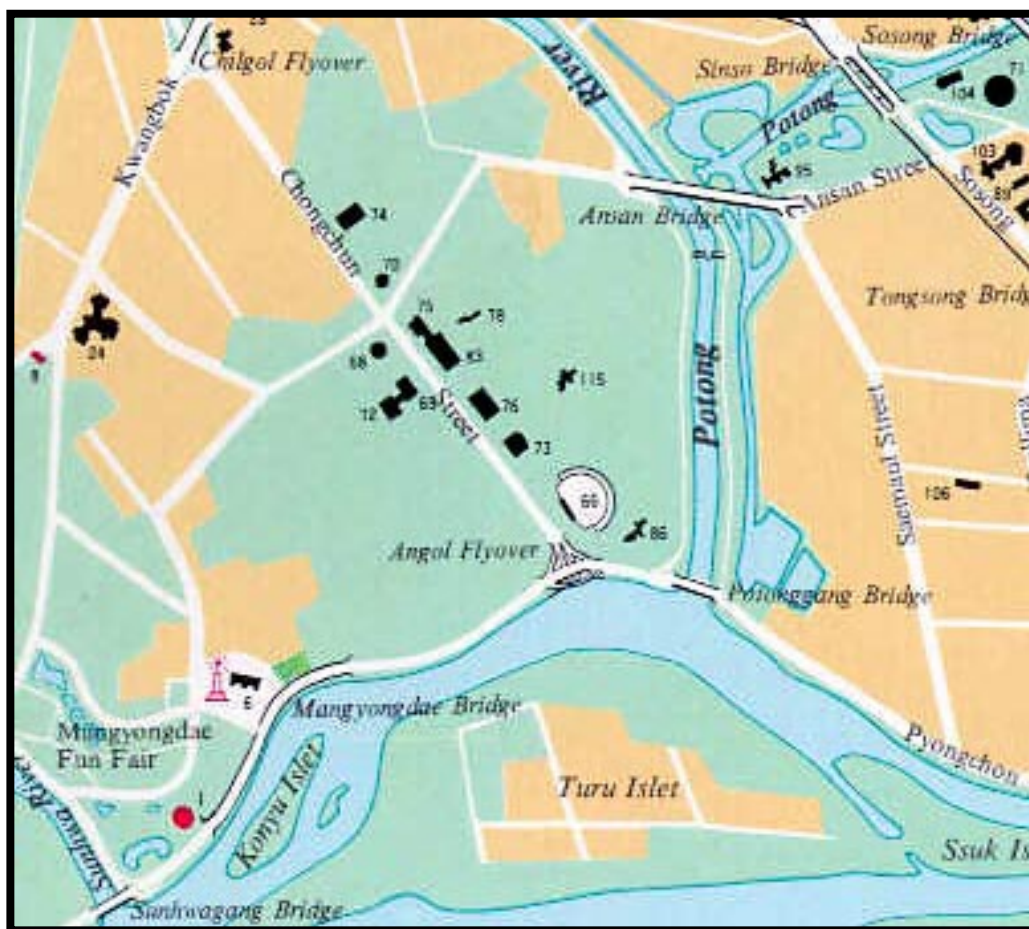

In the year of the Hague Secret Mission incident, students from Sunwha, Chuja, Chilgol and Sinhung gathered at Sulmae for an athletic competition. My father attended the gathering representing Sunwha. He competed in iron-bar, wrestling, running and other athletic events. He won all but the high-jump, because his hair knot caught the bar. He was so angry that he went to a nearby hill after the game and chopped off the offending knot. Tying up man's hair into a knot was a Korean custom several hundred years old and chopping it off without parents prior permission was a dead serious breach of filial piety. Upon learning of my father's act, Grandpa wailed as if the world was about to come to an end.

Father, realizing belatedly the seriousness of his misdeed, stayed away from Grandpa and spent the night hanging around outdoors. My great grandma saw him and took food out to him during the night. My father was her favorite offspring and she was the one who made it possible for my father to attend the school. She was the one who had persuaded Grandpa to send my father to school. Grandpa, a stalwart of feudality, did not think much of modern schools. Father started at Sungsil in the spring of 1911, a year after our nation was lost. In those days, Korea was still in Dark Ages and even rich yangban families were reluctant to send their kids to a modern school. Sending a kid through middle school education was, indeed, unusual, especially for such a poor household as ours that barely subsisted.

The school tuition was two won in those days. To get two won, my mother collected and peddled clams from Sunwha River, Grandpa raised sweet melons, Grandma worked fields and even my 15-year old uncle worked to raise my father's tuition. My father, too, worked at his school's experimental farm for long hours after the classes, after which he studied at the school library for several hour before walking 30 ri to home. He would have no more than two hours to sleep before the breakfast time for another grueling day.

Ours was a farm family, not uncommon in villages all over Korea. We were honest, hard-working, poor farmers. We had nothing outstanding; we were just a normal farming family. One thing different about us was that we were passionately patriotic, willing to die for our country. My great grandfather was a mere grave caretaker for a landowner, but he was an ardent nationalist. The General Sherman, an American merchant marine, invaded our land and sailed up Taedong River to Turu Island, killing many Koreans with rifle and cannon fire. My great grandpa was one of those villagers who gathered up straw ropes and strung them up across the river from Kongyu Island to Mangyong Peak, to blocked the escape path of the American invaders. They threw rocks at the invaders.

Lee Wha Rang notes: Modern Pyongyang maps show Turu and Konryu islands. The General Sherman was stranded near Turu, which sailed up this far on flooded Taedong River. Kim Il Sung's great grandfathers was among the villagers who helped destroy the ship. Kim Il Sung was born in Mangyongdae (bottom-left corner). At age seven, Kim Il Sung walked across a wooden bridge over Potong River to visit his father in prison. It is not clear which bridge he crossed.

The invaders advanced to Yang-gak Island, shooting cannon and rifles at the crowd, pillaging and raping along the way. Mt great grandpa led his villagers to the Pyongyang Fort and joined the soldiers and volunteers from other villages gathered there. They placed firewood on small boats and sent them burning to the enemy ship. The enemy ship and her entire crew were eliminated. After the Sherman incident, the American imperialists dispatched the warship Shenandoah, which pillaged our villages at the Taedong estuary. Once again, the Mangyong-dae villagers took up arms to repel the invaders.

Grandpa used to tell us - "It is proper for man to die fighting the enemy", and told us to serve our nation. Grandpa proudly sent his children and grandchildren to the battle ground of anti-Japanese movement.

Grandma taught us to be righteous and strong. For some time, the Japanese tried to snag me using my grandma; they dragged Grandma through the plains and mountains of Manchuria in dead-cold winter days and nights. Grandma was not intimidated and screamed and cursed at her captors. She showed them what a true mother of Korea was like.

My mother's father, Kang Don Wook, established a private school and educated young children. His life was dedicated to fostering our future leaders and helping the independence movement. His eldest son, Kang Jin Suk, was also a noted patriot.

Early on, my father instilled in me deep love for Korea and chose my name, Sung Ju, to firm up his belief that I would faithfully support our nation and become a foundation pillar of Korea. Sometime during his school days at Sungsil Middle School, my father planted three white poplar trees, one for himself, and one each for his two brothers, by our home. These were the first white poplar trees in Mangyong-dae. Father told his younger brothers that poplar trees grew fast and that they too should grow fast to fight for our independence. Soon after, my father left Mangyong-dae to fight for Korea, and uncle Kim Hyong Kwon, followed him.

Only one uncle stayed behind and the poplars grew into giant trees, and they cast their shadows beyond our property line, on a piece of farm land belonging to a landowner. The man claimed that the shadow cast by our trees harmed his crop and felled the trees, and there was nothing we could do to stop him. Such was the lot of poor farmers of Korea. When I heard of the trees upon my return home in 1945, I was infuriated at this injustice, insult on my father's idealistic symbolism. This was not the only injustice perpetrated against my family.

In my youth, there were several ash trees around my house and I spent many days with my friends climbing up the trees. When I came home in 1945, I noticed that one of the trees by our house was gone. Grandpa said that my uncle was forced to cut it down. Japanese police from Daepyong station kept constant vigilance on our house. Since the station was quite a distance from Mangyong-dae, the police used my ash trees, which provided cool shades during hot summer days, as their de facto office. The police sat around in the shades fanning themselves, took siestas, and interrogated villagers when they got bored. Occasionally, they cooked chicken and had drinking parties under my ash trees. Often, they slapped around my grandpa and uncle.

One day, my uncle, the most gentle and docile of the family, could not take it any more. He picked up an axe and cut the tree by the house in one giant swing. Grandpa nodded his silent approval. I had to chuckle sadly at my uncle's act when grandpa told me about my ash tree in 1945.

On account of their off-springs being in anti-Japanese movements, my grandparents had to endure countless hardships and tortures by the Japanese. But they stood their ground and refused to submit to the Japanese. During the waning days of the Japanese Empire, Koreans were forced to change their family names, but my grandparents refused to go along. Our family was the only one that retained the Korean name and all other families in Mangyong-dae had adopted Japanese names. My uncle was beaten and summoned to the police station numerous times, but to the end, he refused to change his family name. He would be told, "your name is no longer Kim Hyong Rok! You got that? Now tell me what your name is".

Uncle would say - "my name is Kim Hyong Rok", upon which the police would slap him a few times and repeat the process; with each refusal, the Japanese police became angrier and more vicious in their beating of my poor uncle. But, my uncle did not give in.

Grandpa was proud of Uncle's courage and stood behind Uncle's decision to hold onto our Korean family name. Grandpa told Uncle that it was not right to submit to the Japanese when I, Sung Ju, was leading an anti-Japanese movement; that it was better to be beaten to death than to submit to the Japanese.

When we stepped out of our family home gate, we swore that we would be back, but I was the sole survivor to return home. My father died at age 32 while fighting for Korea in a foreign land, far away from home. In a man's life, 32 is the prime. After his funeral, grandma came to visit her son's grave at Yang-ji, Musong. She cried her heart out, hugging the grave. To this day, I remember the scene as if it were only yesterday. Six years later, my mother passed away at Ahndo before she could return home. Soon after my mother's death, my younger brother, Chul Ju, a guerrilla fighter, was killed in action against the Japanese. I don't know his body was buried. (Photo: Uncle Kim Hyong Kwon in prison where he died).

A few years later, my younger uncle died from torture at the Mapo prison, while serving a long-term prison term. Our family did not have the money to recover his body for proper burial, and he was buried in common graves of the prison. In less than 20 years, most of my relatives in anti-Japanese movements died at various distant strange places.

When I returned home after liberation, Grandma rushed out to meet me at the front gate and cried out - "Where is your father, your mother? Why are you back alone? Could you not bring them home with you?" She broke my heart. I felt for grandma's sorrows and also, I felt greater sorrows over the fact that I could not bring home the remains of my parents and relatives, buried in forgotten unattended graves far, far away from home.

Since then at every front gate of every Korean home I have passed through, I have wondered how many patriots had left the gate never to see it again. Every Korean gate has witnessed tearful partings, painful longings for the loved ones, and heart-wrenching tragic endings. Tens of thousands of our fathers and mothers, our brothers and sisters have died fighting for Korea. It took 36 long years to regain our nationhood; through years of blood, tears and agonies, through clouds of exploding shells and rains of bullets, we returned home. Thirty six years of our struggle saw oceans of our blood and sweats, and cost generations of our youth. It was a horrendous and enormous price to pay, but without our sacrifices, we would not have today's Korea, Korea would still be a slave nation and her people living shameful miserable lives. The Korean people would have been slaves of foreigners for the whole of the 20th Century.

My grandpa and grandma worked the field all of their life and farming was the only they knew. They were simple, aged dirt poor peasants, but their love for Korea was deep and unshakable. They planted patriotism deep in my soul. It is easy to preach patriotism, but actually practicing it is an entirely different matter. My grandparents raised children to serve the nation, they had stoically endured countless ordeals and tribulations; they had looked after their children and their children without any complaint and with precious little reward. Engaging the enemy in pitched combats or serving prison terms were much easier than what my grandparents had to go through.

The tragic fate of my family was a natural consequence of our nation's downfall, but it was an insignificant paragraph in the annals of the Korean people's tragedy. Tens of millions of Koreans died from starvation, from cold, from fires and from tortures under the Japanese genocidal rule. When a nation falls, its people, rivers and mountains invariably suffer; even those traitors who sell out their own nation do not get to enjoy their loots for long, for sooner or later, the hands of justice will reach them. Stateless people may go through the motion of living, but their life is no better than that of the beasts. Mountains and rivers may continue to be, but they lack the spirit and shine.

Those who realize this cold fact of truth are called progressives; those who act to save their nation are called patriots; those who sacrifice their life in order to motivate others into patriotic actions are called martyrs. My father, Kim Hyong Jik, was one of the forerunners of anti-Japanese movements. He was born on July 10, 1894 at Mangying-dae and died on June 5, 1926 after a life-long struggle against the Japanese. I was his eldest son and was born on April 15, 1912, two years after Korea was annexed to Japan, at our family home in Mangyong-dae.

My Father and the Korean People's Association

My father lived by "ji-won", 'Righteous Aspirations', for all of his life. He preached his way of life not only to his family but also to his associates at Sunwha and Myongsin schools and other places. He exhibited his calligraphy of ji-won, two Chinese characters, whenever he had chance. Even today, his calligraphy of ji-won pops up here and there. He liked calligraphy. (Photo: My father's calligraphy - Ji Won).

In those days, people worshipped Chinese calligraphy and the works of famous people and authors were much valued; they were made into hanging picture scrolls or folding screens. It was a fad of the time. I, too, was swept up in this fad - I did not know any better then. My father posted his writings wherever he could without any framing or decorations.

When I was old enough, Father began to lecture me on the importance of patriotism; he taught me that in order to love Korea, I must think big. Ji-won, righteous aspirations, stands for grand ideas for doing good. There is nothing new or significant about a father teaching his son to have a grand vision. But realizing one's vision in a real world requires diligence and years of hard work.

'Righteous aspiration' has little to do with achieving worldly fames or getting rich and powerful, but rather, it deals with achieving happiness and satisfaction from fighting for Korea, year in, year out, from generation to generation, however long it may take to liberate Korea. It is the basic foundation of our revolutionary spirit.

Father had explained why one should have grand visions. The visions were for free and prosperous Korea, for the Korean people's fight for independence. The Yi Dynasty was weak militarily. Prior to the Yi Dynasty, Korea used to be a strong nation. It had powerful military might and its culture bloomed, spreading across the Korea Strait to Japan. But 500 years of reign by corrupt Yi kings bankrupted and emaciated Korea to the point that Korea could not stand on her feet, and fell, she did.

A few years before my birth, Japan conquered Korea with guns and sabers; there were Korean traitors who sold out their own country and people to the Japanese. The traitors sold our land to the enemy, but they could not sell our soul. Common people, all across Korea, rose up carrying spears to drive out the invaders and their puppets. Our independence army troops killed hundreds of Japanese invaders with muskets, and civilians, armed with no more than stones, fought pitched battles with heavily armed Japanese police and soldiers. They died shouting freedom and justice, appealing to the conscience of humanity and human rights advocates of the world, in vain.

Choe Ik Hyon, a Righteous Army leader, was captured and exiled to Formosa, which was under Japanese rule at the time. He starved himself to death than to eat Japanese food. Lee Jun committed suicide in front of a world meeting of imperialist powers. He demonstrated the Korean people's firm determination to regain independence. Ahn Joong Gun shot and killed Ito, the Japanese architect of imperialism, at the Harbin rail station. Ahn kept on shouting - "Long Live Korea". until he was subdued by the Japanese police. Kang Wu Gyu, well past 60 years of age, threw a bomb at Saito, Governor General of Korea. Lee Jae Hyong stabbed Lee Wan Yong, Korea's number one traitor. Min Young Whan, Lee Bum Jin and Hong Bum Do wanted to liberate Korea by military means. (Lee Wha Rang photo: Choe Ik Hyon, 1833-1907).

There was a nation-wide movement to raise money to pay back debts owed to Japan in the aftermath of the Russo-Japanese War. The Yi King borrowed 13 million won from Japan, but he could not pay it back and forced the people to shell out money for him. Korean men stopped smoking to save their tobacco money, King Kojong himself stopped smoking. Women skimmed on grocery bills to save money for the King, marriage-age girls donated their dowry; servants and maids working for rich people donated their meager savings; rice-cake vendors, straw-sandal hawkers, vegetable vendors - all of them chipped in to pay off our national debt. In spite of such outpouring of patriotism, Korea could not be saved.

The problem is how to unite the people and to build up military might strong enough to smash the enemy. People firmly united would open up the means to develop military might, and military might would drive out the enemy. Uniting the people behind a common cause cannot be done overnight; it is a long term project and one must plan ahead. Father gave me this lesson many times when he held my hand and climbed Mangyong Peak. His teachings were patriotism, patriotism and patriotism.

I remember Father saying in front of Grandpa and Grandma: "Why stay alive, if we cannot achieve independence? Even if my body is cut into pieces, we must win our fight against the Japanese. If I am killed by the Japanese, my son should take over the fight, and if my son is killed, his son should continue the fight - until Korea is free of the Japanese".

Years later, I realized that our war of independence would take much longer than 3-4 years we had anticipated and what my father was trying to say hit me. His saying applies equally well to our struggle to unite Korea after Liberation. My father's favorite words - righteous aspirations, faith and conviction, belief in Korea's independence - say it all. His attending Sungsil in spite of our family's dire financial status was based on his righteous aspirations. During the span of ten years from the Kap-oh Reform of 1894 and the Ulsa Agreement, Korea saw wave after wave of well-intentioned innovation and modernization moves.

Western-style schools such as Bai-je, Yi-wha and Yuk-young were established in Seoul, and American missionary workers established Sungsil Middle School for evangelic reasons. Sungsil recruited students from all parts of Korea. Youth thirsting for new forms of education flocked to Sungsil. Modern subjects such as world history, algebra, geometry, physics, health science, biology, athletics and music were taught at the school.

My father attended Sungsil because of the modern subjects taught there. He was not sold on the classical form of education learning the Chinese classics and ethics. Even though Sungsil's primary mission was evangelical, it graduated a number of prominent leaders of anti-Japan movements, including Song Jung Do, vice chairman of the state council of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, Cha Lee Suk, a council member of the Provisional Government; Yun Dong Ju, a gifted patriotic poet, attended this school. Kang Yang Yuk attended the special class of the school. At the time, this class was called Sungsil Vocational School, equivalent to a middle school, run by Sungsil School. Because so many patriots had graduated from it, the Japanese police called it the den of anti-Japanese rebels.

My father said: "Learn literature for Korea, learn scientific and engineering skills for Korea, have faith in Heaven for the Heaven over Korea." My father preached his gospel to his fellow students and bound together patriotic students into a close-knit circle of future leaders. Under Father's leadership, a book-reading club and a friendship club were organized. The clubs were to instill and ferment Korean nationalism, and also to engage in enlightenment activities in nearby villages. They believed that educating the mass, living in age-old darkness, was their sacred duty and obligation. In December 1912, the club members organized a mass student walkout in protest over the school's human rights violations and exploitation of the students.

My father spent his summer-breaks traveling to Ahnju, Kangdong, Sunahn, Yiju and other towns in Pyongahn provinces as well as to regions in Hwanghae, on mass enlightenment and recruitment missions. The most valuable thing my father gained at Sungsil was the comradeship of his friends, many of whom became long-term close personal friends and comrades-in-arms in his fight against the Japanese. They were bright, eager and magnanimous; the cream of a new generation of Korea. Among them was Lee Bo Sik from Pyongyang, who was active in both clubs at the school, played key roles in forming the Korean People's Association and the March First Movement. When we lived in Bongwha-ri, Lee Bo Sik came to see my father frequently at our home and also at Myongsil school where my father taught.

Baik Seh Bin (aka Baik Young Mu) from North Pyongahn Province was a close friend of my father. He came from Pihyon and acted as a guide whenever my father traveled in his area. He was a national and international liaison for the Korean People's Association. In December 1960, I heard that Paik Se Bin became an active member of the National Self Determination for Independence League in South Korea.

Park In Gwan roomed with my father when he briefly stayed at the school dormitory. In the spring of 1917, Park got a job teaching at Kwangsun school in Unyul, Hwanghae Province. While teaching there, he became an active member of the Korean People's Association. He was arrested while recruiting members in Songwha, Jaeryong, Haeju and other towns of the province and spent a year in the Haeju prison. "The Peninsula and Us", a thesis written by his students at the school is preserved and on display at the Unul library. The thesis is a witness to the revolutionary activities of the Association.

Oh Dong Jin was perhaps the closest associate of my father. He was a frequent house guest at our home going back to my father's Sungsil school days. Oh Dong Jin attended Daesung School in Pyongyang, which was established by Ahn Chang Ho. On account of their common ideology that transcended personal attributes, their camaraderie evolved rapidly. Oh Dong Jin met my father for the first time in the spring of 1910 at an athletic meet held at an old training ground of the Yi Dynasty army. Some 10,000 students from Pyongyang, Pakchun, Kangsuh, Youngyu and other towns were at the meet,

My father spoke at a speech contest held upon completion of the athletic events. Some speakers advocated that the best route for Korea to catch up with the rest of the world was to follow Japan model and adopt Japanese culture. My father vehemently denounce it and advocated that the Korean people alone were capable of uplifting themselves from poverty and backwardness. The crowd liked what they heard; among the crowd was Oh Dong Jin, who was so moved by my father's speech on that day, he devoted his life to patriotic activities. From 1913 on, Oh, using retail business as a guise, traveled to Seoul, Pyongyang, Sinyiju and other major cities in Korea and China. He used to drop in to to see my father and they would spend hours discussing anti-Japanese activities (Photo: Oh Dong Jin in prison).

By that time, Oh Dong Jin had become a household name. He was from a wealthy prominent family and he could have led a comfortable life, but instead, he chose the difficult and dangerous path of anti-

Japanese activities. Oh took up arms to fight the Japanese. Oh showed much respect for and devotion to my father. His home at Yiju had so many visitors seeking his advice that he set up a visitors quarter with its own kitchen staff. But my father was always welcome to the inner quarters and Oh's wife personally prepared meals for my father. Oh and his wife visited us once and Grandma gave them a rice serving bowl as a humble gift.

The reason why I write so much about Oh Dong Jin is not only because of his friendship with my father, but also because of his influence on me during my youth. I had developed a strong kinship to Oh when I was a young boy. Oh was arrested by the Japanese police when I was in school at Jirin (Kil-rim). Years later in March 1932, while I was trying to organize a guerrilla unit, Oh was tried at the Sinyiju court. They say Mahatma Gandhi's pre-trial records numbered 25,000 pages, but Oh Dong Jin's court documents were well over 3,500 pages in 64 volumes. His trial was delayed because of the huge crowd that came to see him. The trial was scheduled to start in the morning, but it had to be postponed till one O'clock. Oh denied the accusations and then jumped on the trial judge's stand, shouting "Long Live Korea!". He was escorted out and was sentenced in absentia to life in prison. Oh died in prison. News paper articles on his court trial and a photo of his travel to the Pyongyang prison were welcome inspirations for me during a time when I was struggling to form a guerrilla unit.

Many of my father's school mates of Sungsil became renowned revolutionaries and became the corner stone of the Korean People's Association. After my father quit Sungsil School, he taught at Sunhwa school in Mangyong-dae and Myongsin School in Gangdong. He was devoted to educating the youth of Korea and also recruiting new members for the Korean People's Association. He quit Sungsil so that he could spend more time for revolutionary works. In 1916, Father went to Kan-do during the summer break. I don't know how, but from there, he traveled to Shanghai and got connected with Sun Yatsen's Nationalist Party of China. My father thought highly of Sun as the forerunner of the progressive elements of China and said that the new laws of China that allowed one day of rest per week and cutting off the pigtails worn by men were realized thanks to the Chinese bourgeoisie.

Father liked the "Three-Min" slogans of Sun's party: people, people's rights and people's livelihood. He believed that Sun was a bright sincere progressive revolutionary. However, Sun's appointment of Wang Seik, an old general of the old Dynasty, was a serious mistake. My father told me about the Korean bourgeois movement when I was young. Father very much regretted that Kim Ok Gyun's reform movement had failed in less than three years since its inception; he believed that Kim's charters for human rights, equality, anti-illiteracy and equal opportunity were just right for Korea. Kim's covert attempt at breaking the age-old yoke of client state relation with China was patriotic. I believed that Kim Ok Gyun was a progressive patriot and I wondered if his reform movement had succeeded, Korea's history might have been quite different.

Years later, Kim Ok Gyun's movement was viewed in light of self-reliance (juche). Many of our history teachers branded Kim pro-Japanese and even after liberation, our historians tagged him pro-Japanese because he sought Japanese assistance in readying his reform. I think it is not right to label him so, and I have told the historians that although Kim's failure to mobilize the people behind his reform was a mistake, his reliance on Japanese was not by itself a bad thing. He used the Japanese to further his objectives and not to Japanize his reform. In view of the situations prevailing at the time, he had no other option and using the Japanese was the best tactic available to him.

Father said that one of the main reasons why Kim Ok Gyun's reform failed was his reformists did not trust the people's power, relying instead upon palace cliques. He said I should learn from Kim's error. I assume that my father went to Shanghai from Kan-do to see for himself our much rumored independence movements in China. He most likely wanted to coordinate his activities in Korea with those working abroad. Anti-colonial wars of liberation had not reached any degree of maturity at the time and there was no accumulated expertise on the subject.

When my father went to China, the Chinese revolution was fighting for its very survival. The Chinese revolutionaries had to fight military factions and warlords as well as foreign intervention forces from America, Great Britain and Japan. In spite of this state, many of our independence fighters were living under the illusion that some foreign imperial power would come to their assistance. My father returned home convinced that the Korean people must liberate themselves on their own, by themselves. After his trip to China, Father began to work more feverishly, often skipping meals and sleeps, to educate more youth and recruit more patriots. Our house was at Bongwha-ri at the time; my father taught school children during the day and taught adults during the evening and went to bed at late hours.

Once I read an anti-Japan article written by my father at a school event. Father wrote many revolutionary and anti-Japanese poems and essays for his students. Many independence fighters came to see my father at Bongwha-ri and he went to see them at various location of Pyongahn and Hwanghae provinces. He firmed up core cadres and laid foundation for mass movements. On March 23, 1917, my father together with Jang Il Whan, Bai Min Su, Baik Seh Bin and other comrades formally established the Korean People's Association at the home of Lee Bo Sik, located at Hak-dang-gol, Pyongyang. The charter members wrote letters of their allegiance in their own blood - "Korean independence and fight to the end."

The main theme of the Association was that the Korean people must unite and achieve independence on their own, and develop Korea into a strong advanced nation. It was a secret organization, about the largest of anti-Japan organizations in Korea around the time of the March First Movement. There were hardly any secret organization in 1917 in Korea. Organizations such as the Righteous Army, the Korean Independence Army and the Korea Restoration Society, which sprang up after the annexation, were gone by this time. They could not withstand the savage attacks by the Japanese security forces, which were quite effective in detecting and arresting anti-Japan activists. Consequently, few Koreans dared to even ponder doing anti-Japanese work. Even those who had the courage to oppose Japan could do little in Korea and some went abroad and formed secret organizations. Some people set up organizations, sanctioned by the Governor General of Korea and did what they could legally under the Japanese rule.

The Korean People's Association came into being in this kind of vacuum in Korea. It was an anti-imperialism organization. Its platform asserted that the US and Western powers would soon get into conflict with Japan, already entrenched in Asia, over hegemony in Asia. This would be an opportune moment for the Korean people to rise up and drive out the Japanese, and so, the Association members must work in unison and prepare for the moment. As is clear from this statement of its purpose, the Association believed that Korean independence could not be achieved by external forces and so, it should be accomplished by the Koreans themselves.

The Association decided to establish an operational base for anti-Japan activities at Gan-do and dispatched an advance team to lay the groundwork. The Association was organized meticulously. It chose and accepted members after lengthy investigation; only people with well established track records were invited into the Association. Members were organized in independent cells and secret codes were used for communications among the members. Secret documents were encrypted. The members got together once a year on the occasion of Sungsil school anniversary. It ran several front organizations such as Education Society, Stone Monument Society and Home Society. These legal open entities were used to cover the secret activities of the Society. Liaison offices were set up in Beijing and Dandong for external contacts.

The Association was established with full support of the people; its membership included workers, farmers, teachers, students, military (independence armies), merchants, religionists, businessmen and people from other socio-economic strata. The association's membership was not limited to people living in Korea and reached Beijing, Shanghai, Jirin, Musong, Rimgang, Jangbaik, Yuha, Kwangjun, Dandong, Hwajun and Hong Kong. My father recruited Jang Chul Ho, Kang Jeh Ha, Kang Jin Gun, Kim Si Woo and many other key members into the Association and they played important roles in the organization and expansion of the Association. Recruiting a member took a great deal of time and effort. Father would travel even one thousand ri in order to recruit one single member.

One day, Oh Dong Jin dropped in unexpected to see my father. Oh was on his way to Hwanghae Province. He was unusually quiet and had an air of tension. Oh said proudly that he found a good man for my father - "Gong Young from Byokdong is still a green young buck, but he is highly intelligent, tall and good-looking. He is trust-worthy and an martial art expert, too. In the olden days, he would have made a good marshal." My father was pleased and thanked Oh for a fine job well done. From the ancient times, it had been accepted that finding a talent was more important than the talent itself.

Upon Oh's departure, Father asked my eldest uncle to make him several pairs of straw sandals, and in the next morning, Father left home with the sandals. Father was gone for about one month. He had apparently walked long distances, for he wore out all of the sandals that Uncle made for him, but he came home with smiles on his face. Father met Gong Young on his trip and he was very satisfied with Gong. Father's way of caring for and nurturing his comrades was one of the most important lessons I learned from him in my youth.

For several years, the Korean People's Association spread its gospel in Korea and abroad. Its membership increased and its word got around. However, the Japanese got wind of it in the Fall of 1917 and started to dismantle it ruthlessly. On a windy day, three Japanese policemen burst into my father's classroom at Myonsin School and dragged him away right in front of his students. Mr. Huh followed my father to the river ferry, where Father managed to whisper a message to Huh. Huh ran all the way to my house and relayed Father's message and the news of his arrest. Father instructed Mother to burn documents hidden in the roof of our house. She climbed to the roof, recovered the documents and burnt them in her cooking fire.

In the morning after my father's arrest, the Christians of Bongwha-ri met at Myongsin School and prayed for the immediate release of my father. People from Pyongyang and Kangdong rushed to the Pyongyang police station and petitioned for my father's release. Grandpa heard of Father's impending court trial and sent Uncle to the police station to find out what could be done to help Father. Grandpa was ready to sell everything he owned to hire an attorney to defend Father in court. Father would not let Grandpa do such a thing. Father told Uncle - "Attorneys use their mouth for living and so do I. Why would you waste money, that you don't have, to hire an attorney?"

My father was tried three times in Pyongyang. At each court session, Father defended himself by saying - "I am a Korean and I have the right to love Korea and work for Korea. I have committed no crime and you have no authority to try me." After attempting three court trials, Father was convicted and sentenced to a prison term.

Soon after my father's arrest, Uncle Hyong Rok wanted us to move back to Mangying-dae and came with his brother-in-law, Kang Young Suk, to fetch us. Mother refused to move and told them that she wanted to remain at Bonghwa through the winter. Mother wanted to maintain contact with the Association members and other nationalists who might show up for messages. In the following spring, Mother moved us back to Mangyong-dae. By that time, she had managed to cover the base for Father. Grandpa and Mother's father came to get us with an ox-cart.

I was much depressed that Spring and Summer. Every time I asked Mother when Father would be back, she would tell me that he would be back in a few days. But days went by with Father still gone. One day, Mother took me to a play ground located at Mangyong Peak and got on a swing holding me on her lap. She told me: "Sung Ju - Your dad is not coming back, even after the ice in Taedong River over there is all melted gone. Your dad fought for Korea and he has committed no crime. You will have to grow up fast and get even with your dad's enemies. You must become a hero and recover our lost nationhood." I swore to her that I would follow her wish.

Mother had visited Father in prison secretly several times. She did not say a thing about her prison visits. One day, Mother took me to her parents' house in Palgol on the premise of picking up some cotton, but her real intent was to visit Father in prison with me. Mom's mother insisted that Mom should not take me to the prison, because I was too young. Seeing Father caged up in a dark prison cell would do much harm to my mindset, Grandma argued. I was seven at the time. But Mother persisted and prevailed.

Upon crossing the wooden bridge over Botong River, I noticed prison right away. No one had told me what a prison looked like, but I could tell it was the prison from its dark color and its stark, austere surroundings. The prison was indeed awe and fear inspiring, just being there would send chills running through any body. Its heavy iron gates, walls, watch towers, barbed wires and armed guards in dark uniforms and eyes indicated that it was a place of death and deadly venom.

We were led into a damp, dark room, filled with suffocating stench and stagnant air. There I saw Father smiling in the room. He was glad to see me and thanked Mom for bringing me along. I had some difficulty recognizing Father in prison garb and noticed that every part of his body visible - face, neck, hands and feet - was swollen and bruised. But Father was more concerned about his family than his broken body. Father said: "Yes, you have grown quite a bit since I saw you last. Pay attention to your elders and study hard, you hear?" Father talked calmly as if the prison guard watching us did not exist. Hearing his voice made me to break into loud sobs and I cried loudly - "Father, please come back home with us". Father was happy to hear my voice and nodded his head smiling. Father told Mother to take good care of brush and comb salesmen who might drop in. He was referring to the Association members and nationalists who may need help. (Photo: Pyongyang Prison).

Father's unyielding spirit even in prison etched indelible marks in me. Another unforgettable thing about that visit was running into Lee Kwang Rin, who was a member of the Association. She attended Pyongyang Girls Vocational School of Mechanical Engineering. Fortunately, the Japanese police had nothing on her. Lee and another Association member came to see Father on that day. In those days of strong feudal habits, young unmarried women visiting a prison was a taboo. If a young woman of marital age got caught frequenting a prison, she might as well kiss away any idea of finding a suitable husband. No man from a decent family would marry such a woman. Nevertheless, Lee, a modern progressive woman, extremely rare in those days, came to see Father in prison and the guards gawked at her and followed her every move. Lee's shining face cheerfully consoled Father and Mother.

Visiting Father in prison was one of the most significant events in my life. I understood why Mother chose to take me to the prison. Scars and wounds on Father's body pained me physically and I swore to get even with the Japanese devils, that were not human beings at all, but Satan. Father's wounds taught me about the Japanese imperialists far more than any number of political scientists or historians could have possibly taught me. Until that time, I had not witnessed police brutality, except those instances of the police on headcount and health investigation; once, a Japanese policeman got angry at us for some reason and cut up a door and smashed it onto a cooking pot, breaking its lid. This was nothing compared to torturing and maiming innocent people. I have never forgotten Father's broken body in prison. That image was always with me even during moments of heated combats.

Father completed his term in 1918 and came home. Grandpa and Uncle went to the prison to bring Father home in an ox-cart. Our neighbors gathered in Songsan-ri to welcome him back. Father could barely walk because of the tortures he had received in prison. He managed to walk out the prison limping.

Grandpa rushed to Father and tried to make him lie down on the ox-cart, but Father refused and insisted on walking. Father said: "How can I be seen lying down on an ox-cart while I am still alive. I don't want the Japanese to see me like that". Father walked all the way home on his own.

Upon returning home, he told his brothers (my uncles): "I struggled to stay alive while in prison. I ate and drank whatever in order to stay healthy and gain strength. The Japanese are the worst people in the world and we cannot let them be. You Hyong Rok and Hyong Gwung must fight the Japanese. You must fight blood for blood, death for death." I swore that I, too, would follow Father's wish and wage life and death struggles against the Japanese demons.

Father read books even in his sickbed. Father stayed with a relative, Kim Sung Hyon, well-known for curing eye diseases. Father got interested in medicine and began reading medical texts while in prison. Father learned medical skills from Kim Sung Hyon. Apparently, Father had decided to become a medical doctor while in prison. He believed that he could be more effective being a medical doctor than a school teacher.

Father would not stay in bed waiting for his broken body to heal. He dragged his aching body out of bed and walked to various towns in North Pyongahn Province and tried to rebuilt the networks for the Korean People's Association. Grandpa encouraged Father to stay the course and carry on. Before leaving home, Father wrote a poem titled - "The Green Pine Trees of Namsan": "Even if our body is broken into dusts, we will go on fighting generation after generation, without rest, until our three thousand ri land of green mountains and shining rivers is free and a new Spring comes here". It was Father's solemn pledge to fight on.

Long Live Korean Independence!

It was freezing cold on the day when Father left home. I waited and waited for his safe return home all during the Spring months. Our family did not have enough food to eat, not enough clothing to wear and not enough heat to keep warm. Winter was a cruel enemy to my shivering family.

Grandma worried that, with the spring thaw, my birthday would come upon her. On my birthday in the spring, flowers broke out everywhere and Father would be less cold in the north somewhere, but celebrating my birthday without Father and at a time when our food stock would be at the rock bottom. Even though my family's food supply ran out late in the Spring, Grandma managed to come out with bowls of white rice and a cooked chicken egg on my birthday - until that year. Even a single egg was a major food item in our household, as our daily menu was mainly bowls of thin gruel at best. Celebrating my birthday was the farthest thing on my mind in that Spring. I was still in shock from my father's arrest and I was worried sick about my father's being away for so long.

Not long after my father's departure, the March First Movement erupted on March 1, 1919. All the pent up angers and sorrows of living under the Japanese imperialists for ten long years exploded on that day. In ten years after the annexation, Korea had become a gigantic dungeon, no better than those of the Middle Ages. The Japanese colonists used naked military power to suppress the Korean people's aspiration to become free again. The Japanese took away our freedom of press, freedom to hold meetings, freedom to form organizations, and freedom to march. They took away our human rights and properties. The Korean people formed secret organizations, independence fights, mass enlightenment activities, and had built up considerable potential energy against the decade of plunder and exploitation by the Japanese.

Catholics, Protestants, Buddhists and other religious leaders, patriotic teachers and students had planned and executed the March First Movement. The Kapsin Reform, Kaboh Peasants War, Patriotic Mass Enlightenment and Righteous Army ensued one after another, and our nationalistic feelings were sublimated and ripe for kinetic explosion, like a volcano letting out the pressure built up over the years. Thus, at noon, March 1st in Pyongyang, church bells rang out in unison to signal the start of the march. Several thousands students and citizens gathered at the front yard of Sung-duk Girls School located at Jang-dae-jae. Declaration of Independence was read aloud and it was solemnly proclaimed that Korea was a free nation. The crowd began the march shouting "Long Live Korean Independence", "Out with the Japanese and their army". They were joined by tens of thousands of citizens.

The villagers of Mangyong-dae lined up in a file and marched into Pyongyang and joined the crowd of marchers already there. We got up early on that day and ate our breakfast; all of us joined the march. When we left the village, there were only a few hundred of us, but by the time we reached Pyongyang, our rank swelled to several thousands. We beat on drums and gongs and marched toward Botong Gate, shouting "Long Live Korean Independence!" at the top of our lungs.

I was only eight years old at the time, but I joined in the march wearing my worn-out shoes full of holes. I shouted and shouted with the marchers and reached Botong Gate. The marchers rushed inside the castle past the Gate; I could not keep up with them in my tattered shoes and so I took them off and ran after the marchers as fast as my little legs could move. The enemy mobilized mounted police and army troops to stop our march. They slashed and shot the marchers indiscriminately. Many of the marchers fell spilling blood. But the marchers marched on and fought the enemy with bare hands.

For the first time in my life, I witnessed people killing people, Korean blood staining our own land. My young mind and body was enraged. After the sunset, the villagers from Mangyon-dae went to Mangyong Peak and held a rally at the summit. Torches were lit and bugles blared. We beat drums and metal pans, making enough noise to wake up the dead. We shouted hurrah for our independence. This continued on for several days. Mother and her sister took me along when they joined the crowd at the summit. Mother was busy carrying drinking water and burning oil for the torches to the protesters at the summit.

The marchers in Seoul were joined by the people who were in Seoul to attend King Kojong's funeral. Several hundreds of thousands of people joined the march. Hasegawa, Governor General of Korea, ordered the 20th Infantry Division garrisoned at Yongsan to squash the movement. The Japanese soldiers attacked unarmed marchers with swords and rifles, turning Seoul into a sea of Korean blood. But the marchers stayed their course; when the vanguards fell, the next in line took the lead. The marchers pushed on stepping over their fallen comrades. People marched in all major towns and cities in Korea on that day.

Young school girls marched holding up Taeguk-gi. When their hand holding up the flag was cut off by the Japanese, they picked up the flag with the other hand. When both hands were cut off, they marched on until they dropped, shouting "Long Live Korea!" Even the most hardened Japanese savages were afraid of such determined opponents. The mass uprising in Seoul and Pyongyang soon spread to all of the thirteen provinces of Korea by the middle of March. It had spilled over to Manchuria, Shanghai, Siberia, Hawaii and other foreign places. The uprising was a true pan-national movement, of all Koreans, all overseas Koreans, irrespective of their gender, age, religion and vocation. Every one was welcome to join. Even the lowly women servants and entertainment maidens (kisaeng), the bottom echelon in the feudal society, formed their own formation and joined the march.

For over a month or two, the Korean peninsula resonated with shouts for independence. Spring passed and Summer came, and the ardor of the uprising gradually subsided. Many Koreans mistakenly assumed that the Japanese would get out, if they marched for several months shouting slogans. They were sadly mistaken; the Japanese were not about to leave Korea on account of mere marches. Japan fought three major wars over Korea.

About 400 years ago in 1592, Toyotomi Hideyoshi sent Gonishi Yukinaga to conquer Korea with several hundreds thousand troops. The Japanese conducted scorched-earth campaigns and torched Korea from Pusan to Pyongyang to Hamhung. In the 19th century, after the Meiji Reform, the Japanese formulated a plan to take Korea by force. It was asserted that Korea was essential for the Empire to expand. Some Japanese were opposed to this plan of naked aggression and a quiet civil war broke out in Japan that lasted for half a year. The war faction was led by Saiko Takamori, whose stature still stands in today's Japan. Japan fought war with Russia and China over Korea. America and Great Britain supported Japan in these two wars.

Nationalist leaders being crucified.

The bestiality of the Japanese troops was fully exposed in the Russo-Japanese War. Maresuke Nogi commanded Japanese Third Army in the Port Arthur battle. He had dead corps piled high and used them as stepping stones to attack the "203 Meter Hill" (Lee Wha Rang note: the Hill fell on December 5, 1904. The Russian general Anatoly Mikhailovich Stösel surrendered on January 2, 1905.). Some 25,000 were killed for Nogi's human ladders. The Japanese suffered heavy losses and won the war, but they failed to take Manchuria or Siberia. Angry war widows and orphans of the soldiers who died for Nogi gathered to confront him. But the crowd fell silent when they saw that Nogi wore three crosses, one for each of his own sons killed in the war. I do not know how accurate this story is, but the point is that the Japanese had paid for Korea dearly and they were not ready to cough up Korea.

The elite of Korea who organized and led the March First Movement failed to see this lesson from history. The March leaders erroneously opted for non-violent marches, totally ignoring the people's burning desires for action. All they accomplished was to publish a declaration of independence, that gained precious little for the Korean people. They did not want the people to go beyond peaceful demonstrations.

Some of the leaders believed that Korea could be freed by sending petitions to other nations. They took and swallowed US President Woodrow Wilson's "Doctrine of Self Determination" and expected the United States and other Western Powers to pressure Japan into freeing Korea. They wrote petition after petition, becoming laughing stocks of the imperialists. Kim Gyu Sik and associates begged and pleaded with representatives of the imperialist nations, who were more keen on grabbing more colonies for themselves than freeing any colony.

It was a mistake for those Korean leaders to take Wilson's self-determination doctrine at its face value. The so-called doctrine was nothing but an American ruse to counter the October Revolution in Russia and to dominate the world. The American imperialists used the doctrine to stir up divisive forces in the Soviet Union and prevent it from assisting colonies fighting for independence. The doctrine was also a scheme to take over colonies of the nations defeated in World War I.

Early in the 20th Century, the United States signed the Taft-Katsura Treaty whereby Japan was given a free hand in Korea. To expect America to pressure Japan to give up Korea was ludicrous. There is no record of any strong nation helping a weak nation, presenting its people with freedom and independence. A nation's nationhood can be maintained or regained only by the people. This is a truth proven throughout the history. During the Russo-Japanese War and the Portsmouth Conference, King Kojong dispatched emissaries to the United States and pleaded US help in keeping Korea independent. The fact of the matter is that the United States sided with Japan during the Russo-Japanese War and did everything it could to ensure Japanese victory. After the war, the United States in effect negotiated on behalf of Japan and injected issues favorable to Japan. US President Theodore Roosevelt refused to accept King Kojong's letters claiming that they were not 'official' documents.

King Kojong dispatched secret envoys to the Hague Peace Conference. Kojong declared that the Korea-Japan Ulsa Agreement of 1905 was illegal, void and null. He appealed to the world conscience and humanitarianism, believing that Korea would be helped doing so. The Japanese countered Kojong's moves with false propaganda and other world powers ignored the King's pleas. The emissaries suffered tearful rejection after rejection by the delegates. Because of the secret emissaries, Japan forced King Kojong to abdicate and his son Sunjong ascended the throne.

The Hague emissary fiasco was a loud warning bell that shook the very foundation of Korea's feudal ruling class, rooted deep in toadyism (Lee Wha Rang note: sah-dae ju-i - worship of the powerful; also, flunkeyism). Lee Jun, Kojong's secret emissary, cut his stomach open at the Hague Peace Conference and stained the conference hall red with his Korean blood; it is a tragic lesson that Korea should not count on other nations for independence, because they did not care. In spite of this sad lesson, some of our nationalist leaders clung to the naive notion that the United States, with its 'doctrine of self determination' would free Korea; it shows how toadish they were; how deep-rooted their pro-Americanism was.

The failure of the March First Movement showed that the Korean bourgeoisie nationalist leaders could not lead our anti-Japanese independence movement. The social class mix of the march leaders was such that they were not totally opposed to the Japanese rule of Korea. Their objective was to extract concessions from the Japanese authorities so as to protect and enhance their class standing in the Korean society. The fact that many of the leaders became after the march pro-Japanese collaborators and social reformists under the Japanese rule supports the above assertion..

At the time, Korea had no progressive elements that were strong enough to counter reformism. There was no major industrial proletarian class consciousness that could fight against bourgeois reformism at the time. Our toiling mass was still untouched by Marxism-Leninism and lacked organized leadership. It would be years before the Korea's working class had at last a vanguard that fought for and protected its class interest; it had to make a long hazardous journey. In the aftermath of the failed March First Movement, the Korean people came to realize that a strong leadership was needed to gain independence. Although, millions of Korean people joined the movement, there was no people's organization or class-root leadership and the movement was hampered by divisiveness and ineffectual spontaneity.

The failed March First Movement taught us that in order to win our fight for independence and freedom, we must have effective revolutionary leadership and organizational structures; we must use the right tactics and strategies; and we must debunk toadyism and build up our strength on our own.

The March First Movement, even though failed, showed to the world that the Korean people did not wish to be slaves of other nations, that they were strongly self-reliant and self-deterministic, that they were willing to die for their country. The March First Movement shocked the Japanese imperialists into imposing harsh martial laws and brain-washing indoctrination policies.

The March First Movement put an end to Korea's nascent bourgeois nationalist movement and the Korean people's struggle for independence entered a new stage. The loud hurrahs for independence that shook our land of misfortune and reverberated throughout the world kept on ringing in my ears all through that summer; the ringing forced me to grow up faster. The Potong Gate boulevard, shrouded in smoke and sparks of intense fighting between the marchers and the Japanese police, opened a new venue in my world-view. Shouting "Long Live Korea" squeezed between grownups and on my tiptoes to see between their legs ended my age of innocence; my childhood ended abruptly on that day.

The March First Movement placed me in the rank of the people and left an image on my eyes of the true nature of the Korean people. Whenever I hear the echo of the March First hurrahs in my mind's ears, I feel so proud of the Korean people's unbending determination and heroism.

A letter from Father arrived in that Summer. Along with the letter, there was a "Goldfish" calligraphy set of a brush and ink, made in China. Father wanted me to become proficient in writing. I immediately put the set in use, I ground out some ink in water, dipped the brush in it and wrote out three large letters - "Ah Buh Ji" (father). That night, the family gathered around a dim kerosene lamp and read Father's letter over and over again. Uncle Hyong Rok read it three times. He was normally restless and vibrant, but he was slow and deliberate like an old man while reading the letter. Mother quickly glanced over the letter and handed it me, asking me to read it aloud for Grandpa and Grandma. Even though I had not started my formal schooling, Father had taught me how to read.

Gen. Hong Bom Do and aids in Siberia.

Sooner I had started to read the letter loud and clear than Grandma stopped her spinning and asked - "Does it say when he would be back?" and before I could answer, she muttered to herself - "Is he in Siberia or is he in Manchuria? He has been gone unusually long". Seeing that Mother did not get to read the letter in detail, I recited the letter from memory for her after we went to bed. Mother would never read Father's letter in front of Grandma and Grandpa, instead she would tuck the letter under her sleeve and read it alone during rest breaks from her daily farm chores. Mother said - "Ok, that's good enough. Now you better go to sleep" - and rubbed my forehead.

It was not until the Fall of that year when Father returned home to take us with him. He had been gone for a year. During his absence from home, Father was busy rebuilding the Korean People's Association; he traveled to Yiju, Chang-sung, Byukdong, Chosan, Junggang and other towns in North Pyongahn Province and Manchuria. Father convened Chungsu-dong Conference in November 1918. Representatives of the Association in the province and liaison agents from various sites met there to discuss future actions to rebuild the Association and organize the poor working mass.

Father talked about events in Manchuria and Russia. He was quite enthused about about Lenin and the October Revolution. He said that in Russia, workers, peasants and other toiling people were in charge; he was envious of that. He was angry at the White reactionaries and the 14 nations that had sent intervention troops to Russia to topple the new government of Russia. Since what he said was true and factual, I believe Father had been to Siberia. Like Manchuria, Siberia was a base for national movements and an important gathering place. Several hundred thousands of Koreans were resident in Siberia at the time of the March First Movement.

Many patriots and nationalist leaders fled there. Lee Jun's secret mission stopped in Siberia on their way to Hague. Yu In Sik and Lee Sang Sul established the "13-Province Righteous Army" headquarters in Vladivostok. It was in Vladivostok that Korean progressives under Yi Dong Whi founded the first Korean socialist organization and began to propagate Marxism-Leninism. The Korean People's Assembly in Russia established the Korean Provisional Government in Far East Russia. Hong Bom Do and Ahn Jung Gun had military units in active operation in that region.

The Korean exiles in Siberia formed numerous independent groups for Korean independence. Korean nationalists in Russia crossed the Russo-Korean border and attacked Gyongwon, Gyonghum and other Korean towns under Japanese rule. They fought Japanese police and military and inflicted heavy casualties. Korean nationalist troops from Manchuria and Russia worked hand in hand with the Soviet Army and fought the enemies of the Soviet Union. The imperialists attempted to topple the new Soviet government and poured in billions of dollars and tens of thousands of their troops in Russia. They armed Russian reactionaries. Several thousands Korean nationalists rushed to the aid of the struggling Soviets. Many fought as partisans and many joined the Red Army. Monuments in Siberia honor those Koreans who died for socialism.

Hong Bom Do, Yi Dong Whi , Yuh Woon Hyong and other nationalist leaders conducted intense military campaigns for Korean independence from military bases in Russia. They met Lenin and discussed Korean independence. Their fight for Korea had ended in a sour note at Free City; factionalism, foreign intervention and egoism culminated in the shameful fratricidal self-destruction in the Free City Incident (also known as the Amur River Incident - see Chapter 9, Section 4 for more on this incident). Nevertheless, their contributions to Korean independence should not be ignored.

Gen. Yi Dong Whi

My presumption that Father had been to Siberia looking for new members for the Korean People's Association is not unfounded. Father told us about the demonstrations by the people in northern border regions and we told Father about the heroic activities of the villagers during the March First uprising. I still remember my father saying: "An armed robber in your house will not spare your life, just because you plead for your life. Other armed robbers standing outside will not rush inside to help you no matter how loud you scream. If you want to live, you must fight off the armed robber yourself. Armed robbers must be fought with arms."

I could see that Father's mind was set on a new course for Korean independence activities. I learned later that during the March First uprising, Father observed the events unfolding in Korea from various locations in the northern border regions and southern Manchuria. His thoughts were on changes in the class structure in Korea. The March First Movement taught us that you cannot free your country by merely shouting and marching around. The March turned Korea into a gigantic Japanese prison, buried under forests of Japanese guns and bayonets and it would take superhuman efforts to fight the Japanese. We must learn from the Russian revolution and mobilize and arm the people of Korea, in order to free our nation and build a new Korea of equality, freedom and justice for all. This is the gist of Father's new way of thinking - proletarian revolution.

Father saw that the Korean independence movement was not going anywhere; all it had done was to leave bloody tracks of meaningless sacrifices; he realized that a new strategy was called for. Father saw hope in communism in light of the Bolshevik revolution in Russia. The March First fiasco convinced him that we must change our nationalist movement into communist revolution. Father argued for toilers' revolution at the Chung-su Conference in July 1919. He convened a conference of the Korean People's Association cadres, liaison officers and leaders of other nationalist organization in August at Hongtong-gu, China. At the conference, Father expounded his belief in transforming our nationalist movement into communist movement. He emphasized that the movement must defeat the Japanese imperialists by our own power, adapting to the prevailing world situations and work to build a society that protect the proletariat.

Formulating concrete steps to go from nationalist movement to communist movement was one of my father's achievements in our struggle for independence. Father explained his idea of proletarian revolution is to build a new society wherein those without food are given rice and those with nothing to wear are given clothes. He awakened workers, peasants and other toilers by setting examples; he united various organizations and groups into a united front and nurtured it into a powerful organ of revolution.. Father advocated that petitions and diplomacy would not bring us freedom and we must rely on military forces to gain freedom. He began to organize new military organizations. Father wanted to train nationalistic youth from farming families on military tactics and leadership and to indoctrinate the existing military leaders and junior officers. They would form the core of a new army of workers and peasants. Father dispatched members of the Korean People's Association to various military organization to spread his new military doctrine; he directed arms procurements and education of military officers.

Father endeavored to unite military groups. At the time, there were many groups competing to expand and this was the most agonizing defect of our independence movement to my father. In Kan-do and Siberia, there were a host of armed Korean camps. Almost every day, a new "Korean Society", "Korean Freedom Corps", "Korea Corp" and so on popped up. There were at least 20 of such armed groups in southern Manchuria alone. They might have achieved something significant, if they got together and coordinated their actions. But the fact of the matter is that they betrayed each other and vied for dominance.

Father feared that this sad situation, if continued, would alienate the Korean people and help Japanese wipe out the camps. Father learned that Korean Independence Youth Corp and Kwangje Youth Corp were at each other's throat; he rushed to Kwangje and called on the leaders to bury the hatchet and work together for common cause. Thanks to Father, Hong-up Corps, Gung-bi Corps and other armed groups in the Yenan-Yalu region merged into a united national army.

Transforming extant armed groups into a people's army of workers and peasants and embarking on the road of communist revolution was one of Father's agenda. This new direction would help unite the armed groups and minimize contentious rifts amongst them. Father worked tirelessly to redirect our military activities until the day he died. He was struck down with an incurable disease. After Father's announcement of the new direction at the Kwanjun Conference, ideological splits among the nationalists intensified. Even among those who had supported Father's plan when he was alive deserted after his death. Some of them were captured by the Japanese, some became turncoats, and others scattered away. Few took up the banner of revolution when Father fell. The conservatives in the nationalist camp built walls around them and kept to their old ways; but many progressive leaders chose the new way and later joined in our communist revolution.

Father's belief in communist movement provided much needed nourishments for my growth.

Father changed his operations base often and so, my family moved several times when I was young. The first move was when I was five. In the Summer, we moved to Bongwha-ri, leaving behind Grandpa, Grandma and other close relatives. Because of my tender age, I felt no sad feeling parting with them. I was too excited about our new home.

But our move to Jung-gang in the Fall was entirely a different matter. It was a sad move. Our relatives were sad that we were moving so far, to the northern tip of the country. Grandpa, who normally stood behind Father and supported his decisions, was aghast at Father's decision to move us away more than a thousand ri. Father saw what was going through Grandpa's mind and did his best to calm him down. Father sat next to Grandpa and helped with his handcraft work for the last time and said: "Dad, I am on the blacklist of the Japanese police and I cannot do anything in Korea. They told me to stay home and work the farm when I was released from prison. I will go on fighting, even if they jailed me ten times more. Japanese are savages and merely shouting for independence will not bring it."

Uncle hugged Father and told him to write often, if he moved far away, too far to come home; he begged Father never to forget the home and wept openly. Father held onto Uncle's hands for a long time. Father consoled Uncle: "Hey, I will never forget our home. How on earth can I forget our home? We are forced to part because of the bad times we are having, we shall meet again when Korea is freed and live happily together again. Since our childhood, you have been cleaning up the mess I created and now I am leaving and you have to be the man of the family now. I am very sorry."

"Dear elder brother, don't talk like that! I will care for Mom and Dad and you don't worry about them. You keep your mind on your work and make sure you succeed. I will be here waiting for your success."

I was moved by their tearful farewell and wept with them. Although Mother told me that we would be back home when Korea became independent, I wondered when that will be. I had no clear idea. In fact, Father and Mother passed away in foreign places and this was their last moment with the family.

I kept on looking back toward our old home; I did not want to leave Grandpa and Grandma behind. I did not want to leave the home, the mountains and rivers I grew up in, but I was happy that we were moving far, far away from that prison in Pyongyang. Even after Father was released from prison, I was uneasy about that prison. I feared that Father might get arrested and jailed there again. I was so naive that moving to a remote village, away from Seoul and Pyongyang, we could find a safe haven from the Japanese savages.

I asked how far Joong-gang was from Pyongyang and was told that it was one thousand ri. This sounded like a safe distance because I thought no Japanese would come that far to get Father. It was said that Joong-gang is the coldest place in Korea, but I did not mind as long as Father was safe there. I could stand cold. Our family possessions were meager: mother's bag containing a rice cooking pot and a few spoons, and Father's sack; that was all. When we moved to Bongwha-ri, we had chests, a desk, brass utensils and pots, but this time, we had very little to carry.

A friend of Father came with us. We rode a train to Sinahnju and from there, we walked to Joong-gang, passing through Gaechun, Hichun and Kang-gye. There was no railroad in that area in those days. Father worried that I might not be able to keep up with them; Mother, too, worried that I might fall behind. I was eight at the time and too old to be carried. I hitched rides on passing ox-carts now and then, but I walked most of the distance on my own feet. It was the first major physical endurance test in my life. We arrived at Kang-gye and spent a night at a lodging outside its south gate. We took off next day. The owner of the lodging and some undercover members of the Korean People's Association welcomed us with open arms. Joong-gang was about five hundred ri from Kang-gye. We had to climb several mountains and pass through scary uninhabited areas.

Lee Wha Rang note: Kim Il Sung and his family rode a train from Pyongyang to Sinahnju (near Ahnju) and then traveled on foot to Joong-gang (Chungang on this map) after staying over one night at Kangye.

Note the rugged terrain. Later, Kim Il Sung's family moved to the Chinese town of Lim-gang (Linjiang) across Yalu.

Crossing Mount Bainang was hard on Mother. She carried my 3-year old brother Chul Ju on her back and a bundle on her head. Her shoes wore out and her feet were a mess of bleeding blisters. Joong-gang was a letdown for me. It was teaming with Japanese, not much different from the Hwang-gum or Sehmun regions of Pyongyang. While we Koreans were forced to leave our home villages and wandered around in alien places, why do these Japanese follow us even to the most remote boondocks and lord over us? •Father told me that everywhere Koreans are, Japanese are there, too. I saw that Joong-gang had a Japanese police station, a jail and a military police station. Joong-gang made me realize that all of Korea was a gigantic dungeon.

More than half of Joong-gang was occupied by the Japanese immigrants and there was Japanese school, a Japanese hospital and Japanese shops. I learned from Jung-gang residents that the Japanese occupation began some ten years ago. Japan took over the rights to our timber in Ulsa Agreement and set up a timber processing plant at Sinyiju and a branch at Joong-gang and brought Japanese woodcutters to settle in Joong-gang. Among the woodcutters were many battle-hardened Japanese army veterans and they were in fact paramilitary units ready to do battle at any time. In addition, there were a number of armed Japanese police and regular army troops.

The main reason why Father moved us there was because Joong-gang was a hub of Korean nationalist movement. He wanted to set up a hospital there and promote anti-Japan activities. He believed that being a medical doctor, he would be less subject to Japanese surveillance and would have more degree of freedom to move around; also, being a doctor would make it easier for him to see people.

We moved in Kang Ki Rak's lodging house. Kang gave us the cleanest and quietest room he had. After getting out of prison, Father traveled in Kan-do and stayed in the this very room whenever he came to Joong-gang. Kang Ki Rak ran the lodging "Yuh In Hotel" and also, a dental clinic and a photo shop. He was a liaison for the Korean People's Association. Father operated from Kang's hotel room and maintained contacts with Korean nationalists in Lim-gang, Jang-baik, Joong-gang, Byuk-dong, Chang-sung. Chosan and other towns in the Yalu region.

Kang Ki Rak was well known in Joong-gang and visited the town hall at will. He passed on whatever intelligence he gathered from the unsuspecting town officials to Father, which was invaluable to Father's work. I worked for Father as a lookout and took care of the nationalists who came to see Father. I also carried secret messages to Joong-sang and Joong-duk for Father.

One of the most memorable events in Joong-gang that I recall is the wrestling match I had with a Japanese fellow. He was much bigger than I was but I won the match by doing a belly-throw on him. I was called in to go after any Japanese kid that hassled Korean kids, which made the lodging proprietors fear for Japanese reprisal. Father told him that we should never kowtow to anyone who look down upon us, and he blessed my actions.

Joong-gang was a hotbed of nationalist activities at the time; anti-Japanese leaflets were everywhere, students boycotted classes and many Korean puppets of the Japanese were killed. Soon the Japanese got wind of my father's activities and suspected that he was behind the anti-Japanese activities in Joong-gang. The Japanese police received police dossiers on him from the Pyongyang police and placed him on their blacklist. While hanging around the myon office, Kang Ki Rak happened to notice a red line across my father's name, a clear sign of an impending arrest of Father. Kang hurried home and warned Father. At about the same time, a Joong-gang policeman leaked that Father would be arrested at any time. Father decided to leave Joong-gang at once.

Once again we packed and left our home away from home; this time, we were forced to move to a foreign land, Manchuria. You take one step from Joong-gang and you are in China. We boarded a ferry at Joong-duk pier and crossed Yalu. I cried all during the passage aboard the ferry. It was our fourth move. I thought Joong-gang was a foreign place, but moving to China was overwhelming to my young mind and Joong-gang looked like home to me. After all, Joong-gang was a Korean town. Mangyng-dae was my cradle and sang me slumber songs and gave rides in swings; Joong-gang and Bongwha-ri taught me that all of Korea was a Japanese prison.

The day of our departure from Joong-gang was unusually gloomy. Fall leaves of trees fell everywhere and the winds blew the fallen, helpless leaves around. Flocks of migrating birds headed south in the skies over us. They made me sad, I did not know why. This was the last step on the Korean soil for my mother; my brother, Chul Ju, too, would never set his feet in Korea again.

Man's life is full of sorrows and, of all the sorrows, the sorrow of losing one's country is the worst. Deserting one's own country is the saddest thing on one's life. Leaving one's home is a sorrowful thing but it pales in comparison to the sorrow of leaving one's motherland. If your home were your mother, your place away home in Korea were your step-mother, what would a strange foreign land be?

Thinking about moving to a foreign land, without being invited, with no one to welcome us, with no knowledge of the language spoken there, I was numb with the fear of unknown. But we had to overcome and stand behind Father and support him in any way we could. The ferryman told us that more or more people were crossing the river to Manchuria. He lamented why the Korean people had to endure so many tragedies. Father said tens of thousands of Koreans have fled Korea, leaving behind everything they had.

Even before the annexation, many farmers were forced to leave Korea and seek a better life in China and Siberia. They did not want to leave their homeland, but they were starving in Korea and had no choice but to desert their fatherland. They left their home villages risking brutal punishments and death, if caught; it was a life and death move for them. Starving Koreans migrated as far as Mexico and Hawaii. "Flowers bloom four seasons, year long; cotton flowers blossom on their own once seeded; you will become rich in three years after working only three hours a day" - is how they deceived our starving people and gold-diggers. They were enticed into the stark cotton fields of Hawaii, where they were treated as ignorant savages; they ended up working at food stalls or as house servants of wealthy Americans. They were forced to work long hours on hot steaming farms like so many slaves.

But, at least, these immigrant laborers had a country of their own in those days. After Korea fell, several hundreds of thousands of our farmers lost their farms to the Japanese and had to move to the distant barren plains of Manchuria and Siberia. Get-rich-quick artists and other con-men from Japan swarmed over Korea like so many hungry vultures and drove out Korean farmers off their farms they had owned and tilled for generations. The landless peasants were forced to leave their motherland and wander around in foreign places. Their lot was like that of fallen leaves or papers in the wind. Today, descendents of these homeless vagabonds return home seeking the land their forefathers left behind. Every time I meet them, I recall the homeless people crossing Yalu.

We arrived at Lim-gang, China; everything looked strange to me but there was one bright spot: I could see only a few Japanese in that town. Lim-gang was a transportation hub linking Korea and China. It was a thriving commercial center. Japan had little clout in Manchuria at the time and it had to use covert means to attack Korean nationalists based there. For this reason, Lim-gang was safer than Joong-gang. Soon after we settled down in Lim-gang, Father hired a Chinese tutor for me for a half year and had me enrolled in Lim-gang elementary school. I had to learn Chinese in earnest. I continued my study at Paldogu Elementary School and later at Muson First Middle School. Thanks to Father, I became fluent in Chinese.

I did not know why Father had me enrolled in Chinese schools and made me learn Chinese at the time, but the reason why became clear in my later years. It was in line with his ji-won, righteous aspirations; my fluency in Chinese helped me greatly during my 25 years of stay in China. If I had not learned the language, I would have been much less effective. To be frank, since most of our armed activities were in China, I would have had less contacts with our Chinese host and it would have been difficult to mount joint operations with Chinese comrades. Without Chinese expertise, we would have had little chance to survive the relentless Japanese pursuit. I was clad in Chinese clothing and spoke fluent Chinese; and even the Japanese detectives, that were more effective than hunting dogs, and Manchurian police mistook me for a Chinese. My Chinese fluency helped our cause significantly.

Father rented a house with the help of Roh Gyong Doo, a friend of his, and set up a medical clinic. One of the rooms was made into a storage room of medicine as well as a patient treatment area. Father hanged a large sign, Sunchun Medical Clinic, on the wall outside. He displayed his "Severance Medical School" diploma on the wall. I believe one of his friends forged this fake diploma for Father before Father left Pyongyang. Within a few month, the news of Father's medical prowess and miraculous cures began to spread like a wild fire. Father's medical credential was limited to reading a few medical books and his medical expertise was more personal relations than any medical know-how. Father always respected people and did his best to take care of our nation-less lost people in China.

Many of Father's patients had little or no money, but they came to Father seeking medical help. Father not only treated them free but also gave them money for medicine. He told them that they could pay him back after Korea became free again. He told them that the day of liberation was near and that they should persevere and hang in there until that time. Just like our house in Bongwha-ri, we had many visitors at our Lim-gang house. Most of the patients were Korean nationalists fighting for our independence.

About this time, Kang Jin Suk, Mother's brother, moved to Lim-gang. Uncle Kang formed Baik-san Musa Dan, Mount Baiktu Warriors Corps; 'white mountain' referred to Mount Baiktu. The group was made of nationalists from Pyongahn provinces. Mount Baiktu was a popular and sacred word to the Korean nationalists active in Manchuria. The Korean school in Musong was named Paiktu Elementary School. The youth group we formed in December 1927 was called Mount Baiktu Youth League. Mount Baiktu Warriors Corps was of the larger units among the many armed groups in Lim-gang and Jangbaik regions. Its main base was in Lim-gang Province and it operated in Joong-gang, Chosan and Huchang in North Pyongahn Province and Pyongyang, Sunchun, Kangsuh in South Pyongahn Province.

Uncle Kang was active in a secret youth organization in Pyongyang prior to his move to Manchuria. Until he organized Mount Baiktu Warriors Corps, he stayed with us, working as a woodcutter now and then. After forming the Corps, he worked restless, undercover, raising money for his army and doing propaganda in Pyongahn provinces. Uncle came to our house often with the Corps commanders such as Byun Dae Woo and Kim Si Woo, the Corps finance officer. Sometimes they stayed overnight at our house. Guests usually slept upstairs, but Uncle Kang was the exception and he slept downstairs with the family. Uncle slept with a pistol hidden under his pillow.

In those days, Father devoted a great deal of his time on readying armed actions for independence in accordance with the Kwangjun Conference proclamation. He went to Hongto-ae frequently to consult with Mount Paiktu Warriors Corps leaders. One night I woke to see Father and Uncle Kang disassembling a pistol under a lamp. The sight of the pistol reminded of the scene I had witnessed during the March First Movement in the Botong gate area. I remembered that our people were armed only with wood sticks and stones. One year after that incident, I saw Uncle Kang holding a pistol. The lesson of losing tens of thousands of our unarmed patriots had made our leaders to turn to armed struggles.

A few days later, Father sent me to Joong-gang to fetch a load of bullets and gun-powder in my school bag. Customs inspectors checked every inch of grownups but children were examined less thoroughly. I picked up the cache in Joong-gang and returned home safely. Japanese police watched people crossing Yalu like hawks but for some reason, that did not scare me.

Uncle Kang left Lim-gang and returned to Korea to raise money for armed actions. In less than a month since his departure, Sgt. Kim Duk Soo of Joong-gang military police came to our house with the news that Uncle Kang was arrested. Sgt. Kim worked for the Japanese but he tried to help Father as much as he could. Sgt. Kim was a good man. On that day, I came from school and found Mother in tears. Gloom settled in our house over Uncle's misfortune.

After leaving Lim-gang, Uncle Kang and a small band of armed men operated in Jasung, Gaechun and Pyongyang. In April 1921, they were captured while operating in Pyongyang. He was sentenced to 15 years in jail. He was released after serving 13 years and eight months. He died in 1942. Originally, Uncle Kang was engaged in mass enlightenment movement in Korea. He formed Mifung Association and campaigned against gambling and heavy drinking. My father and his father, Kang Dok Woo, talked Uncle into switching to armed activities.

Revolution is not done by a handful of any particular persons. With proper perception and nurturing, any one can accomplish revolutionary tasks that reshape the world. After Uncle Kang's capture, Japanese dispatched numerous spies and plainclothes police detectives in order to arrest Father. Father slept at a friend's house outside of Lim-gang and came home at day break. It was clear that we could no longer stay in Lim-gang. Once again, we were forced to pack up and move from one alien location to another. Every member of the family carried loads and left Rim-gang. There was no way we could carry everything; Bang Sa Hyon, a Christian minister, was kind enough to load up a sleigh and pull it all the way to our new house in Paldo-gun, Jangbaik Province, a distance of 250 ri.

Like Lim-gang, Paldo-gu was also located by Yalu. Just as Japanese security forces were in Joong-gang, a Korean town opposite to Lim-gang, there were Japanese police and military stationed in Popyong, a Korean town opposite to Paldo-gu. Even though Popyong was a remote town, it was heavily guarded and spies, military police and police swarmed all over Paldo-gu in search of Korean nationalists. Our house was situated near the confluence of Yalu and Paldo River. Father hang a new business sign - Kwangje Medical Clinic. The Kims, members of the Korean People's Association, lived next door and another Kims, noodle merchants, were also our next door neighbors. The Kim brothers, who donated money for arms and ran a business, lived near us. Thus we were surrounded by good Kim's.

There was one problem, however. Our house was owned by Son Seh Sim, a spy for the Japanese police, which fact we learned later. Son lived in Joong-gang; he was ordered to follow us to Paldo-gu and spy on Father. Father met with various persons in Paldo-gu. Among them was a Mr. Whang, a politician. While working as a clerk at Namsa Timber Yard, he was moved by progressive ideologies and joined the rank of revolutionaries. Whang secretly worked for Father. Father sent Whang on various secret missions and sometimes, he stayed at our house between missions. At times, Whang and Father debated over some published articles in Asahi-sinbun or some other papers or magazines, while sharing a bottle of sake.

Mr. Whang accompanied Father on fishing excursions. He would take a jar of hot bean pastes, use fishing nets to catch fish and clean them. They had picnics feasting on the fish. He frequented our house for three years; once celebrating Chusok with us. Mr. Whang introduced Father to the workers at Namsa Timber Yard, some 200 ri from us. Father went there several times to indoctrinate the workers and organized an anti-Japanese group of the workers. Father gave guidance to the teachers of Rajuk Middle School, whose students staged a general walkout, that shocked the people in that region.

One of Father's favorite places was Popyong Church. Even though it was called a 'church', it was no tall pointed building with a large cross on top; it was in fact a normal tile-roof house. The only thing unusual about it was that the room dividers were taken out to make room for a worship "hall". Since Father's arrival at Paldo-gu, the church became the meeting place for Korean nationalists. On every day of worship, Father went to the church and preached anti-Japanese philosophy; on occasions, he played an organ and taught them songs. When Father was unable, Mother or Uncle Hyong Kwon took his place and preached nationalism. My younger brother and I attended the Church meetings and Father taught us how to play the organ.

Father had several secret meeting places in Popyong. The janitor at Popyong police station worked for Father. This man took intelligence data to the man in charge of mail, who in turn relayed the data to Father. I, too, had carried secret messages for Father many times. Once I smuggled food and clothing to some nationalists incarcerated at the police station. The mail depot was the most often visited place for me. Father wanted me to pick up Dongah-ilbo, Chosun-ilbo and other newspapers and magazines, miscellaneous publications at the mail depot. Father ran a branch office of Dongah-ilbo under Uncle Hyong Kwon's name. He received no pay but he got to read the papers free.

I went to Popyong twice a week to pick up Father's mail. Going to Popyong was not easy unless Yalu was frozen over. When the river froze, I walked across the river every other day. When I was busy with school work, Uncle Hyong Kwon went in my place. When Father had much mail, Uncle and I went together to fetch the mail, mostly packages, magazines and medical publications from Japan.

Hong Jong Woo, an aid to Japanese military police, helped us on many occasions. He was in fact a revolutionary pretending to be a pro-Japanese. He was one of those converted by Father. Hong was not always a revolutionary. Paldo-gu was under the jurisdiction of Popyong military police. Popyong police and customs officials reported to the military police. In those days, military police was the king and wielded enormous power. Father and his associates kept a close watch on the military police and they in turn watched us non-stop.

When Hong Jong Woo, in Japanese military uniform, walked in our medical clinic for the first time, I was alarmed; Father and Mother were on guard. Hong looked around the room abject and then slowly spoke: "The reason why I came to see you today is to deliver a message from Jang Sun Bong of Ahnju. When I got transferred to the border post, he asked me to look up his friend, Kim Hyong Jik. I myself wanted to meet you in person and learn from you." For a man in military police uniform, he was unexpectedly polite and humble. However, Father was suspicious and did not trust Hong and said: "You used to be close to Sgt. Kim Duk Soo in Joong-gang. Why do you talk like this?"

When Hong left, Mother told Father - "Mr. Hong's military police uniform reminded me afresh of the Pyongyang prison." Father said it was not proper to treat Hong like that; he said Hong came to us with good intentions and we should treat him better if he came back. Hong came back several times. One day I heard Father telling Mother - "If Hong came here to spy on us, I will use him to spy on the military police. If anything goes wrong, I will be the only one in danger; but if we turned him around, he could become valuable to us. We have Kim Duk Soo in Joong-gang and now Hong Jong Woo in Popyong. Kim Hyong Jik will have help from the Japanese military police everywhere."

From that day on, Father focused on Hong Jong Woo. He wanted to convert Hong. Hong was warmly received as a fellow countryman, not treated coldly as a Japanese military police aid. Hong gradually relaxed and opened up; he was in fact a nationalist from Suncheon, South Pyongahn Province. He was a farmer but could not make ends meet; he wanted to improve his lot and took exams for a military police aid purely for financial reasons. After witnessing the inhuman acts of the military police during the March First Movement, Hong changed his mind and decided to stick with farming. But he was accepted and received the order to join or else. That is how Hong became a Japanese military police aid.

The Japanese imperialists introduced "martial rule" and "cultural rule" in Korea in the aftermath of the March First Movement and under 'administrative reforms', military police were cut back and civil police were beefed up in Korea; at the same time, military police in the border regions were beefed up. Most of the Koreans military police aids were either absorbed into civil police or transferred to the border area. Hong Jong Woo was one of those sent to the border region.

One day, Hong Jong Woo came to see Father and told him about his plan to steal weapons from his military police unit. Father commended him for his courage and said: "It is great that you have decided to join our revolutionary ranks. Just because one wears Japanese military uniform does mean his soul is soiled. We have 5,000 years of history behind us and should not remain slaves to the Japanese for ever and we must stand up and fight. However, you can do more for us in your current position." Hong Jong Woo stayed with the military police and helped our cause on many occasions since then.

Hong would inform Father when he would be manning the watch on the Yalu crossing and asked Father to have his people cross the river on his watch. In this way Hong helped many nationalists cross the river safely. Father himself narrowly escaped dangers thanks to Hong. Whenever Hong got wind of an impending police raid across the river, Hong came over and tipped Father off. If Father was not home, he told Mother - "Please, tell Master to go back to the country side and keep low for a few days".

One day, Hong was ordered by the military police commander to cross the river and spy on Korean nationalists in Paldo-gu. He happened to see Father being led away by a policeman from Popyong. Hong jumped in front of the policeman and said: "This man works for the military police. Why the hell have you arrested him without notifying us first? If you have any qualms about this man in the future, consult with us first. Don't mess with our work again. Do you understand?" The policeman apologized profusely and unbound Father. Thus, Father escaped from another mortal danger.

Once a military policeman, after making a round in our area, reported to his commander that Doctor Kim in Paldo-gu should be brought in for questioning for possible political crimes, whereupon, Hong Jong Woo showed page after page of police "intelligence reports" and asserted that the information came from Doctor Kim; that, in order to spy on political criminals, one must be able to talk and act like one. Doctor Kim has been a great help to us". The so-called 'intelligence reports' were fakes made up by Hong.

The Japanese military police auxiliary system was abolished in May 1923 and Hong Jong Woo's days as a military police aid ended. Hong wanted to move his family to Manchuria and join the fight for independence. Hong did not wish to stay in the enemy camp any longer. Father did his best to change Hong's mind. He told Hong that he would be helping our cause much more by returning to his hometown and joining the police there. Father asked him to visit his parents in Mangyong-dae on his behalf and relay his greetings. Hong accepted Father's council and returned to his hometown. The first thing he did upon his homecoming was to visit our family in Mangyong-dae and relay Father's messages to Grandpa and Grandma. Hong became a policeman in his hometown; he petitioned for and was reassigned to the Daepyong police station in 1927. The first thing he did at Daepyong was to have a police orderly carry a basket of rice wine, pork and tangerines to my grandparents as Lunar New Year presents. Mangyongdae was under Daypyong police.

Hong Jong Woo followed Father's teachings and stayed a true patriot; he looked after our family in Mangyong-dae. The main reason why he moved to Daypyong was to protect our Mangyong-dae family. Grandpa and Uncle Hyong Rok were safe when Hong was around. The station chief told Hong that Kim Hyong Jik's family was anti-Japanese and should be watched carefully and the family house should be thoroughly searched often. But Hong reported there was nothing going on at the Kim Hyong Jik's household.

When liberation came, people all over the country hunted down pro-Japanese Koreans and beat them up. But Hong Jong Woo was not touched. Even though he had worked for the Japanese police, he had done no harm to his fellow countrymen and looked other way when he saw anti-Japanese deeds. Nevertheless, because of his police work, he was shunned as a pro-Japanese and mistreated. He could have contacted me to clear his record, but he kept silent. Years after the Fatherland Liberation War, I sent my workers to find Hong in Soonchun. By this time, Hong was an old man of past 60. He was sent to a provincial party cadre school for education. After graduation, he continued to live his life simple and humble. For the rest of his life, he spent his remaining energy digging up information on my father's work. People like Hong Jong Woo, who had decided to live with true love for Korea and the Korean people, whatever uniforms or badges they wore matter little. What matters is not one's signboards or uniforms, but his ideology and spirit.

Father was very keen on educating new generations in Paldo-gu. Even after switching his profession from teaching to medicine, Father spent a great deal of effort on education. Father believed that in order to recover our nationhood and to build a strong Korea, the mass must be educated and mobilized through educational programs at public and private schools. In the Summer of 1924, there was a summer training camp for teachers of Korean elementary schools, held at Samwon-po. Father wrote the lesson materials and made a list of the songs for the students.

Father was instrumental in establishing a Korean school in Paldo-gu. Many young boys from Popyong came to the school to learn Korean. They would carry heavy sacks of rice on their back from home and cooked their own meals in order to attend this school. Father repeatedly said: "Education of new generations is the very foundation for independence and nation building. Ignorant persons are not much better than wild beasts. Education makes you human and will help you restore our nationhood." I took Father's sayings seriously and studied hard. The Paldo-gu elementary I attended was a 4-year Chinese school and Chinese language was used for all things.

There was no Korean school in our town at that time. After school, Father gave me lessons. He taught me Korean language, geography, and Korean history; He gave me lessons on Leninism, China's Sun Yatsan ideology, George Washington and other famous world leaders. He gave me progressive novels to read and had me write reviews. I read "Great Koreans", "Korean Heroes", "History of Russian Revolution and Lenin" and other books as well as newspapers and magazines. Father was dead serious about my education. Father punished us severely when my brother Chul Ju or I did poorly in school; he did not spare the rod on us. He would even hold his younger brother, Uncle Hyong Kwon, accountable for our education.

Mother, too, helped me with my education. After school, I would go to the mountains to gather firewood for her. Mother wanted me to stay home and study instead. I felt sorry for Mother; she did everything for us and did not possess even a single set of decent clothe for herself; I constantly looked for ways to please her. Once, she gave me money to buy a pair of shoes for myself, but I went to Popyong and bought a pair of rubber shoes for Mother. She was in tears and said: "You are young in age but mature in thought. I can live with any kind of shoes; the best way for you to please me is to study hard and grow up fast and strong."

Mother did her best so that I would grow up with bright spirit and pleasant personality. I grew up with no malice in heart and optimism as the guide. Looking back, I played around the most in Paldo-gu. Sometimes I took adults' tong lashing for horsing around too rough. Childhood with no play is no childhood. Once, I cut out a hole about one meter in diameter in the frozen Yalu River; a bunch of kids lined up and jumped across the gaping hole in a friendly competition. This and other childish plays during that winter in Paldo-gu bring back my childhood memories 70 years past I declared that those kids who could not jump over the hole would never make it into the Korean Army when they grew up. Every kid mustered all the courage and attempted to jump over it, because none of them wanted to be left out. Some kids were too small or too timid and splashed into water and they ran home half-frozen. Their parents were irate and blamed that boy from Pyongyang, Sun Ju, for the near drowning and freezing death of their kids. I was known as the Paldo-gu gang leader and parents blamed me for the misdeeds of their kids.

Some days, we played war games late into the night in the mountains near Paldo-gu. Our parents thought we were lost and spent sleepless hours in worrisome agony looking for their missing kids. After a few plays like this, parents kept closer watch on their kids, but a child's vivid imagination and mind cannot be shackled. I remember my school friend Kim Jong Hang. One day, he took a dynamite fuse from his father's warehouse in order to impress us. His family supplied arms and clothing to our nationalist forces and the warehouse was chock full of weapons, uniforms and footwear. Kim Jong Hang's brothers ran branch offices of Japanese firms and acquired supplies for our armed fighters. They had two ships and horses and were busy procuring and distributing goods in large volumes. We sat around a bonfire and ate roasted pumpkin seeds. Kim put the fuse in his mouth and whistled. Somehow the fuse got lit and exploded injuring him grievously. His brother carried him on his back and rushed to Father's medical clinic. Father feared that the news of a fuse explosion might alert the Japanese police and hid Kim Jong Han in our house for more than 20 days. That is how I got to know that Kim Jong Hang's family supplied arms to our independence fighters.

The Song of Yalu

Early in 1923, Father asked me what my plans were after my impending graduation from the elementary school. I told him that I wished to go on to a middle school. That was what my parents had been saying all along for some time. I thought it strange that Father would ask me a question like that.

Father stared at me with a serious look on his face and said that it would be good for me to continue my study in Korea from now on. It was totally unexpected; it would mean I would have to leave home; I had never thought of living without my parents. Mother, who was busy sewing, heard Father and cut in and asked Father, since I was so young, he should send me to a school nearby. But it was clear that Father had his mind made up. He said several times that even though it might be tough initially, Sung Ju must be educated in Korea. Father seldom repeated himself, but this time he did.

I had suffered many hardships moving around with my parents, but I might face more severe hardships in Korea. Father had made up his mind to send me back to Korea. He said "You are a son of Korea and you should get to know Korea. Just finding out why Korea went down will justify your return home. You should see with your own eyes how much the Korean people are suffering. Then, you will know what to do next". Father was dead serious.

I told Father that I would go to Korea to study as he wished. In those days, kids from rich families left Korea to study abroad. It was fashionable to study in Japan or in the United States. People believed that was the only way to get educated and to learn modern technology. While everybody was heading out, I was heading in. Father had some strange way of looking at things. Today, thinking back, I believe Father had done the right thing for me. It took courage for Father to send his son, not quite 12 years old, on a thousand ri journey, all by himself, through regions that were barely inhabited. But Father's strong character gave me strength and faith.

Honestly, I had some mixed feelings. I liked the idea of studying in Korea, but I hated to leave my parents and my kid brother behind. I was excited about going back to my old home. I was caught between the sorrow of getting separated from my family and the excitement of returning to Korea. I was in deep thought several days.

Mother counseled Father that he should wait for warmer months to send me away. Sending her young boy alone on a 1,000-ri journey worried her. But Father did not agree and Mother began packing my bag, working late into the night. She made me a new coat and cotton-padded socks. Mother knew Father too well to argue over a matter already settled in his mind. That was the way Mother was.

On the day of my departure, Father asked me if I could make the 1,000-ri trip from Paldo-gu to Mangyong-dae by myself. I told him - no problem. He drew a map with detailed instructions: stay at so and so place in Huchang, such and such place in Whapyong and so on; he even jotted down the distance between my two stops - the first in Kangye and the next in Pyongyang. I left Paldo-gu on March 16, 1923. Heavy snow and strong winds raged since the morning hours. My friends from Paldo-gu accompanied me all the way to Huchang after crossing Yalu. They kept on walking with me and finally, I had to talk them into returning home.

Once I was alone on the road, many thoughts hit me at the same time. Out of the thousand ri, about 500 ri would be through uninhabited wild mountains and forests. Passing such wilderness was not an easy thing to do. The path from Huchang to Kangye was infested with wild beasts lurking on both sides of the path even in broad daylight. I did suffer numerous hardships on my 1000-ri journey. Going over the Jik and the Gae mountains was really scary. It took me a whole day to climb over Mount Ohga. I walked and walked, there was no end in sight, and new mountains popped up in my way.

By the time I made it over Mount Ohga, my feet were shot with blisters. Fortunately, I ran into an old man at the foot of the mountain, who kindly burned off the blisters with matches. After Mount Ohga, I walked through Hwapyong, Hoksu, Gangeh, Sung-gan, Junchun, Goin, Chungwoon, Hoechun, Hyangsan, Gujang and Gaechun. I got on a train at Gaechun and rode it to Mangyong-dae. The rail from Gaechun to Sinahnju was narrow-gauge, and a tiny British engine called "Nikisha" pulled the train. From Sinahnju to Pyongyang, wide-gauge rails, like the ones used today, were in place. The train fare from Gaechun to Pyongyang was one won and 90 jun in those days.

During my 1000-ri journey, I met many good people. Once my feet hurt so much and a farmer let me ride on his oxcart. I offered to pay for the ride but he refused to accept any money from me and instead, he bought me sweet taffy to eat. The most unforgettable was the hotel proprietor in Kangye. I arrived late in Kangye and found the hotel. He rushed out to greet me. He was short in stature, had neat Western-style haircut and was nattily dressed in traditional Korean clothing. He was kind and pleasant. He said that he had received a telegram from Father and had been expecting me. He called my father "Master Kim" and his mother remembered me from four years ago when we stayed there on our way to Joong-gang. She said I had grown quiet a bit since then and treated me as if I were her own son. She warmed up a bowl of short-rib soup and broiled a herring for me. None of her own kids was so lucky. She gave me a brand-new blanket. I was treated like a royalty.

Next morning, I went to the post office and sent a telegram to my parents in Paldo-gu - as instructed by Father. Each character cost 3 jun and 1 jun more if there were more than six characters, and so I wrote out "got to kang gye O K" - six characters. Next day, the hotel owner went to a car business trying to get me a ride, but the only car they had was in repairs and it would be ten days before the car would be up and running. He went on to say - "Hi, why not pretend you are visiting with relatives here and stay with us until the car is ready?" I thanked him for his kindness, but told him that I had to push on. He saw that I was determined and gave me two pairs of straw sandals and got me together with an oxcart team going in my way.

The owner of Suhsun Hotel in Gaechun was also kind to me. Upon arrival there, I ordered a 15-jun meal. He had several meal options and mine was the cheapest. However, he served me his best meal, a 50-jun item. I told him that I did not have 50-jun for the meal, but he told me to eat it. He charged 50 jun for two blankets and a comforter, but I could not afford two blankets and asked for just one. The owner gave me two blankets and a comforter, saying, everyone else had them and there was no way he would let me sleep with one blanket, money or no money.

Though the Korean people lost their country and lived in a living hell, their traditional kindness and ethics remained undiminished. Many people traveled penniless up until early in the 20th century. Villagers fed and housed poor travelers passing through their village - free of charge. Such was our custom, envied even by the Westerners. My 1000-ri journey made me realize how pure and ethical the Korean people were. The owners of Susun, Kangye and Joong-gang hotels all were under Father's direction and spell. As I had noticed during our journey to Joong-gang when I was eight, Father had devoted friends and comrades everywhere he went. When I saw people who treated us like their long lost kin, I often wondered how and when Father had managed to make so many friends, how hard he must have worked at making friends. Having so many friends at so many places made Father's travels less burdensome. I, too, was helped by Father's friends.

Another unforgettable memory of my 1000-ri journey was Kangye's streets; four years earlier, they were lit dim with kerosene lamps but on my second passing through, they were lit bright with electric lamps. The Kangye citizens were happy with electricity, but I felt uncomfortable at the sight of Japanese wind sweeping through the town. I understood the reason why Father wanted me to be back in Korea and to observe Korea suffering under the yoke of foreign domination. My 1000-ri journey taught me many valuable lessons; it was an open classroom for me.

Nineteen days after leaving Paldo-gu, in the sunset hours of March 29, 1923, I set my reached my old home. Grandma, who was doing laundry, saw me coming and rushed out shoeless and hugged me. "Who else is with you?", "How did you get here?", "Your mom and dad OK?", she asked me non-stop. Grandpa, who was making straw mats, jumped up and ran toward me. Grandma could not believe that I came all by myself and asked: "Do you really mean you made the journey all by yourself? Your dad must have a rock in head!"

The relatives gathered around and listened to my story all night long. I found the mountains and rivers unchanged, as beautiful as ever, but there were more signs of poverty here and there in my home village. After resting several days in Mangyong-dae, I moved in with my mother's family in Chilgol. I was enrolled in the 5th grade of Changduk Elementary School, where my grandfather, Mother's father, was the principal. Thus, my formal education in Korea began.

My mother's family was in no financial position to support an extra mouth. They were troubled by Uncle Kang Jing Suk's arrest. Since his imprisonment, the Japanese police watched them closely and harassed them. Uncle Kang's health was getting worse in prison and they feared for the worse. They lived on watered-down meals and bean curd dregs. It was hand-to-mouth living. My second Uncle did labor to supplement his farm income. Nevertheless, they tried to hide their dire financial strait from me and let me concentrate on my school work. They gave me a room, placed several lamps, and a mat on the floor. They did not mind my friends dropping in threes and fours at the same time.

Changduk Elementary School was private, set up by Grandpa Kang and other progressive residents of Chilgol. It was part of their patriotic enlightenment and independence movements. During the waning years of Yi Dynasty and after the Korea-Japan Annexation, the wind of education for liberating Korea blew strong. Our leaders had realized that it was because of our poor education and ignorance that we lost our nation; education was the key for regaining our freedom, for modernizing our society. Private schools popped up all over Korea.

Among the leaders fighting for better education were Ahn Chango Ho, Yi Dong Whi, Yi Sung Whoon, Lee Sang Jae, Yu Gil Soon and Nam Goong Ukh. Old traditional schools in the countryside joined the mass education movement. Soon, several thousands private schools were in operation and the Korean people were finally awakening from years of darkness and bondage of feudalism. Even those who used to teach Confucius and Menfius promoted modern education and turned their old-fashioned schools for modern one. Fever of modernizing our educational system swept the nation. (Lee Wha Rang Note: Photo: Do San Ahn Chang Ho, 1878-1938 - Kim Il Sung respected Ahn.)

Our nationalist leaders, without exception, believed education held the key for our freedom, and devoted financial resources and efforts to establishing modern educational institutions. Even Kim Gu, who used terrorism to strike fears at the Japanese, who was behind the heroic deeds of Lee Bong Chang, Yoon Bong Gil and other martyrs, started as an educator in Hwanghae Province. Ahn Joon Gun established a school in Nampo and taught there; he was a teacher at first. Best known among the new schools were Ahn Chang Ho's Daesung School in Pyongyang and Lee Sung Hoon's Ohsan School in Jungju. Ohsan was funded by Lee himself. These schools graduated many noted nationalist leaders and intellectuals.

Lee Wha Rang note: Kim Gu helped found Bong-yang Institute in 1903, where he taught. Kim Gu was once engaged to Ahn Chang Ho's younger sister, who became a Kim Il Sung supporter after Liberation.

Grandpa Kang told me that he would be honored if his Changduk school graduated just one patriot like Ahn Joong Gun and asked me to study hard and become a fine patriot. I told him that I could never become as famous as Ahn Joong Gun, but I would devote my life to Korean nationalism. Changduk was relatively large in size, as the schools in the region went, and more modern; it boasted more than 200 pupils. This size of student body was not small in those days. Once a school was set up in an area, it became the center of enlightenment activities in the area. Thus, Changduk was an important place for the people of Pyongyang and the surrounding regions. They supported this school in many ways and in whatever way they could.

Baik Sung Haeng donated a fortune to Changduk. She went more by "Baik The Widow" than her name. She was well-known for her charity work in Pyongyang before liberation. She was widowed in her late teens and led a frugal life into her 80s. She became wealthy by saving pennies; she had an uncanny nose for making money in business deals. The coal mine sites of today's Songho-ri Cement Plant used to belong to her. She bought the barren mountain that no one wanted for a song and then sold it to Japanese capitalists many times what she had paid. That is the origin of the coalmine sites. When traitors sold out Korea for a mere piece of paper and the whole country was in shocks, this humble woman, who didn't even know how to use the abacus, managed to beat sharkish Japanese businessmen in their own game, and made a fortune. She became a heroine as the woman who had outwitted Japanese sharks.

People respected BaikSun Haeng for her many good deeds for our nation. Even though she was wealthy, she never flaunted her fortune and she lived a humble, frugal life. She willingly and freely donated her life-long savings to just causes. Her generosity included a bridge and a public meeting hall. Baik Sung Haeng's hall still stands in front of Young-kwang Station.

Several days after I started the school, Grandpa Kang brought me a sack of textbooks for my 5th grade school works. I was much excited and went through the books, opening one by one. I came to a book titled "National Language" in Japanese. The Japanese forced their language on us in order to make us Emperor's subjects. Soon after the military rule went into effect, all official functions, court trials, and schools had to use Japanese, and Korean language was forbidden. I asked Grandpa Kang why the Japanese language was called the "national" language; he was spellbound and could only sigh. I took a knife and scratched out the letter "national" and penciled in "Japanese" in its place. My anti-Japanese sentiment made me do it.

After a few days at the school, I noticed that some kids spoke Japanese in classrooms, streets and the playground. I saw kids teaching Japanese to other kids. Few kids seemed to feel any shame or regret in using Japanese. The kids acted as if Korea was already dead for good and that there was no sense in using Korean any longer. I told those kids struggling to learn Japanese that Koreans ought to speak Korean.

The day I moved to Chilgol, after returning home from Paldo-gu, the village neighbors gathered at the house eager to hear the news. Since I had lived in Manchuria for years, they figured I must be very good at Chinese and wanted hear me speak in Chinese. My Changduk school mates wanted to learn Chinese from me. I told them - "Why use Chinese when we have our own language" and refused to go along.

I spoke in Chinese only once in Korea. One day, Uncle Kang decided to take me on a site seeing trip to Pyongyang. He thought it was about time he and I spent some time together; he wanted to treat me to a fine meal in Pyongyang. After touring the city, we stopped by a Chinese restaurant in West Pyongyang. There were many Chinese eateries there in those days (today's Bongwha Hotel site.) The Chinese hawked their fares in intense competition; they stood out and bowed to passersby pleading, "Please, welcome", "Please, welcome". We picked a shop and entered. The owner asked us in broken Korean what we wanted to eat. I told him Chinese that we would like two plates of stuffed pancakes. He was surprised to hear Chinese spoken and asked me if I were a Chinese student. I told in Chinese that I lived in Manchuria for several years and that I had managed to pick up a word or two. The Chinese owner was impressed that such a young boy could speak Chinese so well; he was elated to hear a Korean speak Chinese so well; he was visibly moved and had tears in his eyes, thinking of his own home in China. The Chinese restaurateur brought out our pancakes and other dishes we did not order; he insisted that we ate them and we obliged reluctantly. He would not even think of getting any money from us, not even for the pancakes we ordered. Uncle Kang said on our way home that his treat had turned into my treat; he told everybody in the village about my adventure.

My wish to be enrolled in Kang Yang Ok's class was realized. Kang Yang Ok quit Soongsil School and got a job teaching at Changduk shortly before I moved to Chilgol. Kang was forced to quit his education at Soongsil because he could not pay his tuition. He was extremely poor and once he had to send his wife, Song Suk Jung, away to stay with her family. His in-laws were unhappy that their son-in-law was not smart enough to support his own spouse. "There are many poor people here, but how many of them are as poor as you?", "We thought, once you got married, you would be living a comfortable life". Kang had to beg his in-laws' pardon and retrieve his much harassed wife. Such was Kang's poverty. (Photo: Kang Yang Ok at graduation).

We called Mrs. Kang Yang Ok, Aunt Sookchun, because she came from Sookchun, South Pyongahn Province. She cooked us the most delicious meals of bean curd dregs and rice. After Liberation, I met her at a birth celebration of Kang Yang Wook and recalled her dregs meals during our Changduk school days. "Aunt Kang, I still remember your bean curd dreg meals in Chilgol. I cannot tell you how much I had enjoyed and appreciated your meals. I am sorry that it has taken me 20 years to thank you. I wish to thank you now." She said: "I wish I could have served you proper meals of rice; I was ashamed that all I had was dregs for you, and it you who must forgive me", and she cried. She insisted on preparing a sumptuous meal for me, saying "You must allow me to make it up for having treated you so shabbily".

Some time later, she sent me a bottle of "one hundred flowers" wine on my birthday. This wine was made from one hundred kinds of flowers. Knowing of her abject poverty, recalling that she has lived semi-starved for all of her life, without having tasting a single bowl of rice, I could not bring myself to drink her unusual wine. I felt in my bones the sorrow of being stateless; every tree, every blade of grass, every ear of grain appeared many times more precious to me. My teacher Kang Yang Ok taught us Korean nationalism. I was inspired to be patriotic both at home and in classrooms. Mr. Kang took us on many excursions and long-distance picnics.

An excursion to Mount Jungbang in Hwanghae Province was one of the most memorable. After Liberation, Kang Yang Wook became Secretary of the Korean People's Supreme Council and Vice Premier of the People's Republic; we have had many occasions to work together and we often shared our memories of that memorable excursion to the Sungbul Temple at Mount Jungbang. Another memorable event from my Changduk school days is the music lessons of Kang Yang Wook. His music class was one of most popular classes at the school. His musical voice would have made even professional vocalists envious. He would belt out in his clear booming voice "The Marching Song", "The Youth Patriots" and other popular songs of the time, and the room would fall silent hushed. Looking back, his songs instilled patriotism in us. During my anti-Japanese guerrilla war, I often sang some of the songs I learned from Mr. Kang. Those songs - both the words and music - remain fresh in my memory even after so many years.

It was clear that people's livelihood became much worse than it was before I left home. During the planting days in spring, kids from poor farming families had to work in the fields and missed classes. In order to supplement their falling farm income, farmers raised various cash crops such as water guji, mothers-hearts, and mehssak. On market days, poor farmers sent their kids to sell garden vegetables and buy food items with the proceeds. School kids often stayed home to baby-sit their younger siblings while the adults worked in the fields. Poor kids' lunchbox normally contained millet, Kaoliang and other items unfit for human consumption. Even worse, there were many kids who had absolutely nothing to eat.

In Chilgol and Mangyong-dae, many families could not afford to send their kids to school. I felt sorry for those children who had never seen the inside of a classroom. During vacation months, I taught evening classes for these kids. I started out with a first-grade class on Korean language; Korean history, geography, arithmetic and music followed. This was my first humble attempt at enlightenment.

My friends and I went to Pyongyang often and I had noticed that the people there were no better off than people of Mangyong-dae and Chilgol. Among Pyongyang's population of 100,000, only a handful, mostly Japanese and Americans, lived well. Americans occupied Sinyang-ri, the choicest sites in Pyongyang, and lived like kings. Bonjung and Hwang-gum districts were taken over by the Japanese. In the American "Foreign Village" and Japanese quarters, brick buildings, churches and shops sprang up, while the rest of Pyongyang was turning into an urban ghetto.

Today, along Botong River, we have modern streets like Chulri-ma, Gyonghung and Bong-hwa, and People's Palace of Culture, Pyongyang Athletic Club, Ice Sport Ring, Exhibition Hall, modern high-rise apartments and other sky-scrapers, and it is impossible to visualize what it was like in the olden days. When I attended Changduk, Pyongyang was a city of shacks, made of cardboard boxes and four-by-fours.

In the year I returned home (1923), there was an epidemic in Pyongyang and its adjoining regions. To add insult to injury, unusually heavy snow falls caused floods; the people's sufferings were indescribable. Dongah-ilbo reported that some 10,000 homes, about one half of Pyongyang, were under water during the flood. Today, a 105-story hotel building, Riugyong, the tallest hotel in the world, is going up in Botong River Square. It would be hard for today's young people to believe that our grandfathers and grandmothers lived in shanty hovels and eked out living of unimaginable hardship. Mine eyes have seen the misery and poverty of our forefathers and I made a solemn vow to fight for the working poor of Korea; my hatred of the Japanese imperialist exploiters, Korean landlords and capitalists intensified.

On September 1, 1923, a strong earthquake devastated Japan's Kanto plain. Ultra-rightist Japanese spread rumors that Koreans caused the earthquake and that Koreans were about to riot.irate Japanese hunted down and killed several thousands of the Koreans living in Japan. The news of this massacre reached us in Chilgol and I was enraged. It made me realize that Japan's "Korean-Japanese equality" and "Korea-Japan union" policies were fig leaves covering Japanese contempt of the Korean people: Koreans were no better than beasts as far as Japanese were concerned. I decided to go on the offensive. Japanese police rode bicycles in those days and I buried wooden boards with sharp nails sticking up along the path used by the police; many a Japanese police lost his tires on my nails.

We put together a musical play called "Thirteen Collection"; this play had 13 players on stage singing and each kid carrying a cardboard map of a province. The players danced around and arranged themselves in the shape of Korea with 13 provinces. The play was intended to inspire patriotism and promote hatred toward Japan. We staged this play during the Fall athletic meet of 1924; halfway through the play, a group of Japanese police rushed in and stopped our play. Even a small athletic meet had to have a prior permit from police and even with a permit, you had to have a policeman present. I went to see our teacher Kang Yang Wook and asked him what was wrong with our singing and dancing; I said that we should go on with the play. Mr. Kang and other teachers sided with us and told us to continue our play.

Patriotism ran high even among young school children. It goes without saying that it ran much higher among the grownups. In the Summer of the year I returned to Korea, the workers at a Pyongyang socks plant staged a general strike. Newspapers headlined this strike. I figured that in spite of Japan's "cultural" rule of Korea, sooner or later, the Korean people would rise up on a scale much larger than that of the March First Movement.

I studied for two years at Changduk and had only a few more months to go to graduate when Grandpa Kang gave me the bad news of my father's arrest, his second. The skies fell on me; I shook with anger and boiled with hatred for Japan. My relatives in Chilgol and Mangyong-dae were shocked and did not know what to say to me. I had to make a do-or-die decision, to punish my father's enemy, my family's enemy and my nation's enemy; I had to do something now. I started to pack up my things to leave Korea.

Grandpa (Kim Bo Hyon) weaving straw mats and Grandma (Lee Bo Ik) doing needle works

Grandpa Kang and other relatives told me to finish my schooling and then leave next year. Grandpa in Mangyong-dae, too, advised me to stay a few more months to graduate, and by then, it would be warmer for my long trip back to Paldo-gu. But I could not stay there any longer. A misfortune befell on Father and how could I study here as if nothing had happened? I had to go back and help Mother and my young brothers. Grandpa, seeing that my mind was made up, encouraged me to leave right away, saying "Now that your dad is incapacitated, it is your turn to take care of things". I left next day. Grandpa and Grandma wept; Uncle wept; everyone of the family wept. Uncle Kang Chang Suk came to see me off at the rail station; he wept unreliably; my school friend, Kang Yun Bum, too, wept seeing me off.

Kang Yun Bum was the closest friend of mine from my Changduk school days. I was his best friend and we spent many hours together roaming the streets of Pyongyang. When my train was about to pull out, my friend Kang handed me a lunchbox and an envelop. He said: "We may not meet again and I wrote down a few things for you to read. Open and read it after you leave here". Soon after my departure, I opened the envelop: it had a piece of paper with Kang's writings and three won. No one could imagine how moved I was by that letter and money.

Three won was a huge sum of money for a young school kid in those days. It took a special friendship to give that kind of money to a friend. I took off to avenge my father's enemies but I was ill prepared for my journey; my pocket was basically

Kang Yun Bum came to my rescue with his three won. It was not easy for him to raise three won. After Liberation, Kang came to see me. I thanked him for his money and told him what it had meant to me 20 years ago. He confessed that he had to pull some strings to raise that money. The three won meant more than a million won to me. It represented his deep and pure friendship for me and no amount of money could buy that kind of friendship. Money does not get you friends, but friends get you money. Friends make things possible.

Kang Yun Bum said: "You, General Kim, fought for Korea in the mountains, but I had done very little." I told him we should work together to build a new nation. I told him that one of our most urgent tasks was to build schools for education and asked him if he would take care of some building projects. He accepted the challenge and built a school in Jochon. He asked me to name it and I came out with "Sam Hung", Three Joys - wisdom, virtue and health. Profound knowledge, lofty ethics and healthy body make a whole person. Later, Kang Yun Bum helped build a university. Today, building a college campus is a child's play, but in those days, we had no money, no civil engineers; building a college campus had many difficulties; from time to time, Kang asked me for advice and sometimes he stayed at my home; he and I had discussions late into the night.

Kang Yun Bum was my friend and comrade, who saw me off on the road of independence war. Even today, I vividly recall Kang Yun Bum waving goodbye with tears in his eyes at the Pyongyang rail station. "Sung Ju, I cannot bear parting with you; I cannot help but cry. When shall we meet again? Let's stay in touch no matter how far apart we are. Don't you ever forget our school days together. Don't forget your home, your country." This is what he wrote to me. His friendship energized me and helped me cross rivers and rugged mountains. After 14 days of journey, I arrived late in the evening at Popyong. I got to the ferry station but I could not bring myself to cross Yalu and wandered along the shores. The rivers and the mountains of Korea held me back.

I remembered Grandma and Grandpa rubbing my hands, fixing my clothe, worrying about my journey, all while weeping. I hated to leave them behind and cross that river in front of me to a foreign land. Bone-chilling winds blew along the border and my mind's eyes saw Korea's rivers and mountains, groaning under the Japanese occupation, begging me to stay. My stay in Korea was cut short to two short years, but I had seen and learned many lessons during that time. Most importantly, I learned the true color of the Korean people; our people are simple and diligent, yet courageous and strong-willed. They are persistent and overcome problems and tribulations. They are keen on fairness and warm-hearted; they fight injustices relentlessly.

Some reactionary enlightenment leaders pushed for self-rule under the Japanese, but the majority of the Korean people - workers, peasants, youth and students - fought the Japanese occupiers with their blood. They taught me that no force on earth can shatter our national pride and iron will for self-determination. I had learned that the Korean people were the best people in the world and that there was nothing we could not do as long as we are properly organized and mobilized.

I saw Korea turning into a Japanese prison under the guise of 'cultural rule'; police and military were building more and more prisons in Korea. I saw Japanese trains and freighters carrying away our national treasures and resources. I was convinced that Japan was our enemy number one; the most cruel and cunning stranglers and merciless exploiters and thieves. The unbelievable sufferings of the Korean people convinced me that armed struggles were the only one way to free our fatherland. I realized that Korea must be freed soon and that we must ensure that Korea remain free for eternity.

Avoiding the watchful eyes of police, I walked away from the ferry pier to Jul-mok. Yalu was frozen there and I would be able to walk across Yalu. Yalu was less than 10 feet wide at that point. Paldo-gu was 10 feet away and my home was in Paldo-gu. My feet refused to get on the ice because I might not feel the soil of Korea again. I turned around and picked up a small pebble and held in my hand tight. I wanted to take a piece of Korea with me; I wanted something that would remind me of Korea. That moment at the Yalu bank was one of the most heart-wrenching of my life. It left a permanent scar on my soul. I talked about this moment at my welcome-home gathering after Liberation; it was the first thing I said.

I slowly crossed the frozen Yalu, humming the Song of Yalu to myself:

*March 1, 1919 was the day I crossed Yalu,
Every year this day returns but I shall not return until my work is done,
You blue waves of Yalu, rivers and mountains
Please, tell me when I could return,
My wish is to free my country and even death shall not let me forget this wish.*

I kept on looking back at my motherland with tears in my eyes. "Korea, Korea - I must leave you now. I cannot live without you even for a short moment, but I am crossing Yalu looking for you. Yonder is a foreign land, but I shall forget you not. Korea - wait for me - I shall return." I hummed the Song of Yalu again. While singing, I wondered if I would ever feel our land again, when would I be returning to the land of my forefathers. I felt sad and determined. I swore that I shall never return until Korea was freed.

My Mother

By the time I reached Paldo-gu, it was already dark after sunset. After my uneasy 1000-ri journey, I became tense as I got to the door of our house. I opened the door and found Mother unexpectedly calm and well composed. She hugged me with her arms firmly around me and said, "I could not have done it myself but you have made the 1000-ri journey alone and came back. You are a boy alright." She was happy to see me.

Mother (Kang Ban Suk).

After briefly giving her the news from back home, I inquired about Father. She whispered to me that he was OK. That was all she said. I could tell from her expression that Father had evaded a crisis but he was still in danger. I understood that we had to watch out for probing ears and eyes. I saved some of the travel money from Mangyong-dae and bought cookies for my brothers. After handing them the cookies, I was ready to unpack and spend a quiet evening with Mother and my brothers. However, things did not turn out that way.

After serving me dinner, Mother dropped the bombshell on me: she said I must leave right away because Japanese spies were watching us like hawks; she did not say where but I should go to a safer place Father had gone to. Mother had been always soft in talking to me in the past, but her voice had steely finality; she was in effect kicking me out with no regard to the fact that I had walked 1000 ri through winter storms and in bad need of rest. What kind of mother would kick out her own son she had not seen for two years in the middle of a cold night, after a 1000-ri journey? On top of that, Mother told me to take my brothers with me!

I was dumbfounded. I did not know what was happening. All I could say was: "Mother, what are you going to do?" She replied: "I will wait here for your uncle, who went to Sinpa. When he is back, I will take care of things here and see you. You must hurry and leave now." Mother told me to go to Roh Gyong Doo's place in Lim-gang; she said we must sneak out without being seen or followed. She had arranged a sleigh-ride for us with Song Sip Jang. Song was more than willing to take us to Lim-gang. Song's real name was Song Byong Chul, but he went by his nick name Song Sip Jang - Song the Boss - because he liked to boss people around. My brothers and I arrived at Lim-gang safely on Song's sleigh.

I have been in many different situations in my life, but this was the most unusual event in my life. Making another journey right after a fifteen-day walk home and without even a night's rest made me think about my mother. She was a gentle and kind woman. Father, being a revolutionary, was ice-cold and strict with us. It was Mother whom I turned to for love and warmth; When I left two years ago to study in Korea, Mother was the only person who was reluctant to let me go. Grandma in Mangyong-dae said Father was more fearsome than a tiger and I could see why Mother kept her mouth shut and went along with Father - Mother did not dare to step on a tiger's tail. I wondered how many times she wept in silence.

If Mother had seen another family's boy of 14 passing by her door at dusk, she would have taken him in and given him hot food and warm lodging. Such was her personality. In one Spring, a young boy from Huchang across the river, suffering from serious wounds on his neck and thigh, was brought in by his uncle. His parents were divorced over family problems and he was being raised by his uncle. His was a sad situation. After examining the boy, Father told Mother that the boy needed a surgery on his leg and that he won't be able to walk for awhile; and so he had to stay with us until his recovery. Father asked Mother if she had any problem with that. Mother said - not at all. After surgery, Mother helped Father clean the boy's festering wound and applied medicine - honey mixed with flour and baking soda. Mother showed no qualms about draining smelly puss.

After several days of treatments, the boy was well enough to go home. His uncle came to fetch the boy; he had only one won for his nephew's medical bills. He told Father: "Master Kim - if I had the money I will be more than happy to pay you any amount you want, but I am just a poor peasant and this is all I have. Please take it and buy yourself a glass of wine,,," - he was choked up and could not finish his sentence. Mother cut in and said: "Nonsense! People with no money don't have to pay for medical treatments. We won't take your money. I just wish that I could have taken a better care of your boy."

But the man insisted that we took his money. The man worked hard to raise that one won; he spent hours collecting wood chips in the mountains and sold them in town. It was a large sum of money for him. Father was hesitant to take his money but he did not wish to offend him either. Father was in a dilemma and turned to Mother for her advice; she said, "We have to accept his money". She took the money and bought five ja of Chinese cotton (Lee Wha Rang note: 1 ja = 0.33 meter) for the boy. She said: "Here - this is just for you for the Spring Festival (Lee Wha Rang note: "dan-oh, Spring Festival, is celebrated on the 5th day of the 5th Lunar month). Make some new coats for yourself." Cotton cost 35 jun per ja in those days and Mother paid 1 won and 75 jun for the boy's clothing - 75 jun over and about what the poor peasant paid us.

Even though our family was strapped for money, Mother was not keen on counting money and had no yen for getting rich.

She philosophized: "People do not die for lack of money but people die because of their fate. Money comes and goes; you have it one moment, then it is gone next moment; it is gone one moment, then it is back". Mother was a gentle and kind person. When Father got irritated by some things and faulted her, she calmed him down saying: "I am very sorry, dear", "I will do better next time, dear". Mother never confronted Father direct. When I came home with soiled or torn clothe from horsing around or when I broke something or made a mess, Grandma would scold Mother: "Why don't you ever spank that kid?" Mother would demur: "Well, he will not do it again. There is no sense in spanking him now".

Purely from a woman's point of view, Mother's life was nothing but hardships, one after another. She knew that being a revolutionary's wife was not easy and she stuck by Father. Mother had little time together with Father for any semblance of normal family life. Father was away doing independence work most of the time, and Mother had to tend her family all by herself. The year when Father worked teaching in Kang-do was probably an exception and Mother got to see Father almost daily. Perhaps, Mother saw Father often during the one or two years they lived in Paldo-gu.

Father was in jail for several years and even after being released, he was sick in bed for some time. Father moved around trying to dodge police. After Father's death, Mother lost me to revolution and I could not care for her properly. She spent her lifetime worrying about her family's safety. She never got to enjoy life as normal people do. When we lived in Mangyong-dae, she had to care for our extended family of twelve, because she was married to Father, the eldest son. She tended to her husband and in-laws' needs; she cleaned the house, inside and out; she did the family laundry and worked the weaving machine; she worked in the field during the day with no break even to gaze at the sun; feudal customs reigned in those days and being married to the first-born son of a family came with awesome burdens. Her meals were nothing more than food scraped from the bottom of the cooking pot and her bowl of gruel was the thinnest.

When things got really bad, she and my aunt went to a Christian church in Songsan. There is a military academy there now, but in those days, there was a Presbyterian church there. There were quite a few Christians in Nam-ri and the adjoining regions at the time. Many people believed that they would go to Heaven if they followed Christ's teachings; Jesus would save them from their misery on Earth; faith in Christ would give them a better life after death. Children attended church services with their parents. The church membership grew rapidly. Occasionally, the church gave candies and free books to the kids, and hordes of kids went to the church on Sundays for the gifts.

Occasionally, my friends and I went to the church in Songsan, more for curiosity than faith in Christ. The preacher's sermons, intended for grownups, were way over my head and the solemn rituals were too much for a restless boy. I found church services boring and attended them only occasionally. Once I asked Father, while eating a corn taffy Grandma gave me - "Dad, this is Sunday, are we going to the Church today? Church services are no fun for me." Father lectured me: "Going to church is up to you. There is nothing, really, in a church and it is OK not to go there. You must have more faith in our nation and our people than in Jesus Christ. Serving our nation is more important than serving God." When I attended school in Chilgol, the school was funded by Christians and we were expected to attend religious services. But I managed to stay away. I thought Christian doctrines were too far off mark to suit our misery and problems; even though Christianity had many things to offer as far as humanitarianism was concerned, it had little to offer for Korean independence.

Ideologically speaking, Father was an atheist, even though he graduated from Soongsil, which taught theology. Father had many Christian friends and associates. Some people think that I must have had Christian influence in my childhood. The fact of the matter is that I have received many humanitarian helps from Christians, but not any religious help. I have influenced Christians' ideologically but not vice versa. I see no contradiction between Christian doctrine of 'peace on earth and good will for all mankind' and my 'juche' doctrine of self-determination for all mankind.

I went to the Songsan church only when Mother went. Mother attended church meetings but she was not a believer. Once I asked her: "Mom, do you go to church because there is really God in that church?". She smiled, shaking her head sideways: "I go to church not because anything is there. What will I be doing in Heaven after I die? To be honest with you, I go to church to rest from my toils at home." That made me feel sorry for Mother. Mother was so tired from her household chores and often dozed off during sermons; when the congregation stood up shouting "Amen", she would wake up. There were times when the "Amens" did not awaken her and I had to shake her awake.

One evening, my friends and I were passing by the funeral home located by a hill near Mangyong-dae. The home was a place where the village funeral hearse was stored. When I was a kid, I was scared death of that funeral home. When we were about to pass by the place, one of the kids screamed - "Hey, there is a ghost coming out of there!" We thought we saw something, too, and took off running for life. I did not notice that my shoes came off my running feet. Losing one's shoes was like losing one's fortune. I dared not to go home without my shoes. I stayed at a friend's house that night and recovered my shoes next morning. When I told Mother what happened, she said: "Sung Ju - next time you pass by that place, sing. Singing scares away ghosts". Since then I sang when I walked by the funeral home, and I was no longer scared.

Mother was normally gentle and calm, but she was a tigress when faced with enemies. The police who arrested Father in Bongwha-ri, came back several hours later to search our house. They turned over every thing looking for hidden documents. Mother was angry at the police and tore out clothes, saying - "Hey, look all you want". The police gave up the search and left.

Such was my mother. That night, when Mother told me to leave with my brothers in Paldo-gu, was cold and windy. Winds howled strong as if they were about to blow away the forest and wild beasts roared in the dark, cold forest. Once again, it reminded me of the misery of a stateless vagabond and I felt sharp pains in my soul. I held my two brothers, shaking with cold and fear, close to me and rode in the sleigh on the icy road along Yalu to Lim-gang. I realized that revolution was no picnic and that Mother's love did not grow on trees.

All three of us got under a heavy quilt and shivered from the cold weather. It was pitch dark and my young brothers were sacred and clung tightly to me for dear life. We stayed over at Ohgu-bi on the Korean side of Yalu that night and arrived at Lim-gang next day. It turned out that Roh Gyong Doo was the same person who had helped Father when we lived in Lim-gang. He used to visit with father to talk politics. He owned a lodging, where we stayed. He treated us as if we were some royalty. The lodging had seven guest rooms and we were given the second room, the most quite one. There was a kitchen between our room and other quest rooms. The rooms were full of people on their way to Korea and people coming from Korea. They usually stayed over at this lodging. Roh Gyong Doo's lodging was in effect a dormitory of Korean nationalists.

Roh Gyong Doo was an ardent Korean nationalist; he was gentle but firm and strong-willed. He funded nationalists with income from his lodging. He was not rich and sold meals, eking out a hand-to-mouth precarious livelihood. That was his labor of love for our revolution. I don't know for sure how he got to Lim-gang. I heard that he was caught smuggling contrabands in order to raise money for our fighters. He escaped to Daedong and hid out there until things settled down, and moved to Rim-gang.

He was originally from Ha-ri, Goh-pyong Myon, Daedong County. Ha-ri and my home place of Ham-ri is separated by Soon-wha River. Roh was a honest, hard-working farmer in Ha-ri, until he met Father. After getting connected with Father, Roh hit the road for independence work. He was seldom home and his family hated him for neglecting his farming. At low tides, he would cross Soon-wha to visit with Father in Nam-ri. It was probably because of this kind of relation with Father that Roh treated us like his own.

Roh helped me and my family in many ways. He was God-sent for us. We were his guests for about one month, during which Roh gave us all he had without any hesitation and always smiling. Once, he used his own money to pay for our long-distance phone call to Father in Musong. Thanks to Roh, I got to talk on the phone for the first time in my life. Father wanted to hear from all of us and we took turns talking to Father - my two brothers and Mother.

Earlier, Mother and Uncle Kim Hyong Kwon had joined us in Lim-gang as she said she would. Upon their arrival, Mother took us out to a sight-seeing walk. She took us to a Chinese restaurant and treated us to dumplings. She asked us questions: at first, I thought she just wanted to feed us special food to make up for our month-long separation, but it became clear that she wanted us away from the lodging so that we could talk freely. She asked us if we had seen any suspicious characters looking for us at the lodging; how many people knew that we were staying at Roh's place; she told us not to tell any soul that we were Kim Hyong Jik's boys; we were to keep our mouth shut until we moved to our new home.

Mother was always on the lookout; she slept with one eye open and jumped at the slightest noise outdoors. She did not want any harm coming to her sons; and I could imagine the agony she must have felt when she had to let us go on that day when I returned from Korea. She was a true mother of Korea, a true revolutionary.

There is no love more permanent, genuine, warm and beautiful in this world than the love of a mother. A mother's love makes her spankings and tongue-lashings painless. A mother's love makes her do the impossible for her children. There is no price tag on a mother's love.

In my dreams today, I see Mother in those days of agony.

Father's Legacy

Mr. Whang, who used to visit us in Paldo-gu, played several key roles in Father's life. He was the man who saved Father from Japanese captors at Hoochang. Father was arrested in Popyong while trying to contact certain Korean nationalists there. He went to a secret meeting place near a noodle shop, but Japanese police were waiting for him. The man who tipped the Japanese was one of our neighbors, a traveling salesman named Son Seh Sim. Son came to our house often and hanged around Father, calling him Master Kim. Father had no inkling that Son was a Japanese spy.

My father's arrest was kept secret by the Japanese in order to snag Father's associates. The Japanese Governor General in Seoul dispatched special investigators to North Pyongahn provincial police headquarters to interrogate Father. Akisima, chief of Popyong police station, was ordered to escort Father to Siniju. The reason why Akisima was so eager to move Father from Popyong was because there were many nationalists in that area and he was afraid that they might try to free Father by force.

No visitors were allowed to see Father at Popyong station and so, we did not know that he was being moved to Siniju. Mr. Whang told us about the move. "Mrs. Kim - I will hire a lawyer to defend your husband even if I have to sell all of my properties. I will follow your husband to Siniju and take care of him there; so you don't worry about a thing. Please give me some bottles of sake, if you have them." Mother gave him bottles of strong liquor and some dried pollack fish. He put them in his sack and trailed Akisima's party, which left early in the morning. Akisima stopped at a Youngpo-ri eatery for lunch, and Mr. Whang caught up with them there.

Mr. Whang sat down next to Akisima and took out the drinks and dried fish, offering some to the Japanese fellow and his Korean helper. At first they declined, saying they were on duty escorting a prisoner, but Mr. Whang persisted and they accepted his drinks and fish. Mr. Whang said that even a prisoner got to eat and talked the Japanese into taking off handcuffs from one of Father's wrists. Mr. Whang was a heavy drinker and he kept on drinking and offering drinks to the Japanese, who fell asleep after a few drinks, at which moment, Mr Whang sprang into action and took off with Father.

Lee Wha Rang note: Kim Il Sung's father escaped at Yongpo-ri (Yonp'ung ni on the map). Kim Il Sung's family moved from Joong-gang (across from Lingjiang = Lim-gang), to Lingjiang, and then to Paldo-gu (Sidaogou on the map). Not shown on the map is the Korean town of Popyong situated on the opposite bank of Sidaogou. Yalu is a small stream at this location, not far from Mount Baiktu. Kim Il Sung's government moved to Kanggye during the darkest hours of the Korean War.

They ran toward Byojok peak across from the eatery. They reached its summit when it began to snow. Soon the police woke up to find Father gone; they found the tracks and ran after Mr. Whang and Father shooting at them. In the confusion, Father and Mr. Whang got separated, never to see each other again. After Liberation, I looked for Mr. Whang everywhere but to no avail. The man who risked his own life to save Father was nowhere to be found. Mr. Whang would have died for Father, a true friend and a comrade. Father could not have survived without devoted friends like Mr. Whang. Father's friends often joked that Father was born with friends. Father's devotion to Korean independence made him many friends and comrades.

During our retreat in the 1950 War of Unification, Lee Guk Roh told me about my father's escape. Early in the Fall of 1950, the People's Republic sent out cabinet members to countryside to promote collection of taxes in kind. Lee Guk Roh, minister of state without portfolio at the time, was sent to North Pyongahn Province. By the time, Lee had completed his task, we began a general retreat and I was in Kanggye. One day, Lee came to see me on the pretext of making a report on state matters. He told me about the eatery in Youngpo-ri. After completing his job in Hoochang-gun, he headed out toward Kangye with the county security chief and made a stop at the eatery. He found the eatery was still there. Kanggye and Hoochang were in North Pyongahn Province at the time.

Lee Guk Roh spent most of his life in South Korea and abroad until he came north just before the Republic was established. Hearing about the Yongpo-ri eatery from Lee was totally unexpected. In those days, few people knew about my father and the Yongpo-ri eatery's significance. I was curious and asked Lee: "Master Lee, how do you know so much about my father?". Lee said: "I had heard about Master Kim Hyong Jik twenty years ago. Someone in Jirin told me about your family. When this war is over, I would like to write a book about your father, but I am hesitant to undertake such an important task." Lee was normally quiet and cool, but he was visibly agitated on that day. Lee and I left the room where the cabinet members worked and took a walk outdoors for an hour or so.

Whang Baik Hah, Whang Gui Hyon's father, told Lee about my father. At that time, Lee represented Sin Gan Association in Manchuria. His mission was to provide assistance to the Korean victims of the May 30 and August 1 riots. Lee met Choe Il Chun in Simyang, who told Lee to look up Whang Baik Ha in Jirin. Lee followed Choe's suggestion and met Hwang, who helped Lee with his rescue efforts and also told him about my father. At that time, Youngpo-ri was part of Hoochang gun, an important base of my father's activities. Sin Gan Association sent Lee to Manchuria because he had spent many years there doing educational work. Lee was an instructor at an independence army training school in Naedosan. Lee also taught at Baiksan in Musong and Dongchang in Whanin Province. Therefore, it was not surprising that Lee had heard about my father.

Lee told me angrily: "That county security chief did not know a thing about the eatery and I yelled at him that it was the county's shame. I told him to make sure that the eatery was preserved as a historical site." Lee Guk Roh said that unless the new generations learned about their forefathers' revolutionary activities, they would become lazy bums and I am afraid that our cadres are not doing a good job in teaching our revolutionary history".

At a time when the two-year old Republic was fighting for its very existence, when most people had written it off as a goner, it was mind-lifting to hear Lee talk about upholding our revolutionary tradition. I could never thank him enough for his timely inspiration. I felt as if the spirits of those patriots who had died for our country spoke to me in unison, "You must fight on to win, You must defend our country to the end". When people were saying that the Republic was finished, Lee Guk Roh's inspirational talk reinforced my resolve to fight on.

After getting separated from Mr. Whang, Father wandered around the mountain for some time and luckily, ran into an old man living in a hovel built into a cave in Gaduk-ryong near Yongpo-ri. He asked the old man for help. It turned out that the old man originally came from Junju, Chul-ra Province, the place of origin of Father's. The man was happy to meet a distant relative and proud to hear that Father was a revolutionary. The cave man, Elder Kim, helped Father all he could. He hid Father in a bush near his cave. Father's feet and knees, the lower part of his body, were frostbitten by then. He hid in the bush exposed to the elements for several days unable to move his limbs. Elder Kim fed father rice balls and baked potatoes, and kept him alive.

Akasima was severely reprimanded by his superiors and the provincial police sent special units to hunt down Father. They blocked all crossing points across Yalu and sent out search parties combing the area. For some reason, they did not bother with Elder Kim's cave; Father picked his hiding place wisely. Elder Kim went to Yalu looking for ways for Father to cross it undetected. The river was not quite frozen over yet and there was no way Father could walk over the thin ice. But Elder Kim devised an ingenious method for Father. He showed Father how to use wooden poles to crawl over the half-frozen river. The poles spread his weight over a larger area and made it possible for him to cross the river. The poles could also be used to float in case he fell through the ice.

Father followed Elder Kim's instructions and crawled across the river on the poles Elder Kim gave him. It was indeed a smart way. But it took Father a long time to make it across the river and by the time he had made it, he got third-degree frostbite from crawling on his belly on the wet ice. A year later, Father would die from his frostbite among other ills. He made it to Toroz, where he was treated for his frostbite, after which Gong Young and Park Jin Young took him to Musong. These two were members of Muson detachment of Jang Jin Young's Jungyi Bureau army.

This Gong Young was the very same Gong Young Father met years ago through Oh Dong Jin as I mentioned in an earlier section. Gong Young was originally from Byuk Dong county. He joined Byokdong Youth Corps and became an independence fighter under Father's tutelage. He and Father had met many times earlier and he often came to our house and was fond of me, calling me "Hey, Sung Ju". I called him "Uncle Gong" then, and years later. Comrade Gong after he became a communist and joined our rank. After Father passed away, Gong Young, based in Malri Province, came to see us once a week. He brought us rice and firewood, and comforted my widowed mother. Gong's wife came with him carrying a load of wild greens on her head. He mourned Father's death for a long time. (Photo: Gong Young).

Father and his two escorts ran into a near fiasco on their way to Musong. Near Mangang-gyong, they were captured by Chinese bandits, mah-juk. In those days, bandits roamed the countryside at will and warlords fought for supremacy everywhere. Many people became bandits because there was no other way to survive, it was their last resort. Furthermore, Japanese imperialists infiltrated bandit groups and manipulated their leaders to use them against Korean nationalists; in addition, Japanese organized bandit groups of their own. Chinese bandits pillaged villages and robbed unwary travelers. If things did not go in their way, they chopped off hands and even heads of their victims.

Father tried to talk his way out of his predicament. He told his captor bandits that he was a medical doctor, but the poor ignorant bandits thought Father, being a doctor, must be rich, good for ransom, and did not budge. Father pleaded that he was a poor doctor and that he charged just enough to live; he offered to give free medical treatments to any member of the bandit gang. Father told the bandits that he would not inform the police about them and so it would be safe for them to let him go. But Father's pleadings fell on deaf ears.

Seeing that Father's tactics did not go anywhere, Gong Young went into action. The bandits fell into happy stupor after smoking opium. He snuffed out the lamp and helped out Father and Park Jin Young; he then killed the bandits with martial arts and rejoined the group. This was a dramatic scene more intense than any action drama one can possibly dream up. Father had talked about Gong's heroism in this incident. Gong Young was willing to die for his comrades; he was a true revolutionary and a comrade-in-arms.

Several days later, Father met Jang Chul Ho in Musong. Until a few years ago, Jang worked as a surveyor but he became a fearless warrior and commanded a company of an independence army. He was concerned about Father's poor health and arranged a safe house for Father to rest until he regained his health. Other people advised Father to do the same. Father was, in fact, in a poor shape; Father probably was aware of his poor physical condition. It was winter, about the coldest winter for that region. But Father refused their hospitality and pushed on.

Commander Jang Chul Ho escorted Father to his destination. Father went to Whajun and Jirin. The reason why Father went there, in spite of his poor health, was to help unite anti-Japanese groups in those areas. Father knew that there were dissensions in the ranks of Korean nationalists. As people became more enlightened in political ideology, political parties had become dominant in governing bodies. Both Bourgeoisie and communists formed political parties to promote their political beliefs. The October Revolution in Russia gave rise to communist movements in nations of Asia; communist parties popped up everywhere in Asia. The new way of thinking spread throughout the world and the era of political parties dawned over Asia. Thus, in 1921, the Chinese Communist Party was born.

In this kind of atmosphere, our progressive leaders vigorously laid ground for a political party to lead our independence movement. Political parties must be based on ideological principles and a firm foundation of beliefs; their aim should be to promote what they believe in. Without these essentials, no political party can last long. It is true that bourgeois democracy had a bright chapter in Korea's history and led our nationalist movement at one time, but they failed to organize an effective political party and their nationalist movement got fragmented and fizzled. In this vacuum, communists stepped in and took over the leadership of our nationalist movement. Communism spread like a wild fire among our progressive nationalist leaders and many of the progressive bourgeois leaders joined the communist camp. The communist manifesto of the Kwansun Conference effected formation of communist leadership and mass organizations. Oh Dong Jin led the effort to put the manifesto into practice. Oh Dong Jin's camp of nationalists had many converts to Leninism-Marxism. Japanese imperialists tagged this new locus of power in Korea, "the Third Power".

It was mid-1920 when Father went to Jirin via Muson after escaping from the Japanese police custody. Our nationalists were split into two camps: a progressive camp for communism and a conservative camp opposed to changes. These two camps were tearing up our nationalist movement. Father judged that the time had come for an effective political party. The Korean nationalists in Manchuria in 1920s were primarily concerned with freeing Korea; they concentrated on armed activities, education and welfare on the basis of self-determination. They had no political party to lead them. Father saw this weakness and worked to unite all progressive elements of Korean nationalists, armed groups and other Korean organizations, by providing political leadership.

For this purpose, Father convened a meeting at Uhmahang in Jirin Province in early 1925. It was held at Park Gi Baik's (Park Il Pa's father) home. Attending the meeting were Yang Ki Tak, Hyong Ha Jook, Oh Dong Jin, Jang Chul Ho, Goh Won Ahm, Kwak Jong Dae and other nationalist leaders. They agreed that a united front was needed and unanimously passed a resolution to form a political party. They debated over details of the party. According to Lee Kwan Lin's recollection, the attendees spent a great deal of time on the name of the party; some wanted to call it "Korean Revolutionary Party" and others wanted to call it some other names, and there was no consensus on the name. It was agreed to call it "Korean Revolutionary Party" for now and move onto the party platforms and political agenda.

One year after this meeting, they met with representatives of progressive Catholics in Korea, social welfare organizations, and nationalists in Siberia and established the Korean Revolutionary Party whose platforms included "eliminating private properties, dismantling extant national structure and building a unique communist nation in the world". Father was too ill to attend this meeting.

Father toured Buksan and Kangnam parks and met with leaders of Sinahntun Youth Corps, after which he returned to Muson and phoned us, still in Lim-gang, to join him in Musong. We left Lim-gang and on the way, met two nationalist fighters wearing straw hats sent by Commander Jang Chul Ho. The straw hats were disguises to evade Japanese spies. We got on the horse wagon they brought and headed to Musong. Father walked some 40 ri to greet us at Daeyoung. Father was pale from illness but he broke out in smiles as soon as he saw us. Seeing Father, all of my worries seemed to melt away. I ran to him pulling my brothers. They climbed all over Father and opened up their sorrows of the past two years before I could say a word. Father patiently listened to them while staring at me. He said: "Water in Korea must be good; I have stayed awake many nights worrying about you since the day I sent you back to Korea, but now I see that you have grown up quite a bit". He was happy to see me again.

That night we stayed up all night trying to catch up. Father told me about Elder Kim, from our place of origin Junju, and Mr. Whang who helped him escape and saved his life. That night, Father told me about Gong Young's heroism that saved Father from Chinese bandits. While telling him about my days in Korea, I said that I would never cross Yalu again until Korea was freed. Father was impressed and said that was a proper attitude for a true son of Korea. He told me that Changduk was not the end of my education on Korea and that I must continue to learn about Korea even in Manchuria. Several days later, I was enrolled in the First Elementary School in Musong. Jang Wool Wha was my best friend at this school. He was Chinese and his family was the second or the third wealthiest family in Musong. Jang's family had scores of private armed guards. His family owned most of the ginseng farms in Donggang, Musong Province. Every Autumn, the Jangs loaded up ginseng on horses and mules and sold the plant in the surrounding regions. The Jang's ginseng caravan stretched ten ri heavily guarded by a private army.

Jang Wool Hwa's father, though rich and famous, hated imperialism and was a good-hearted patriot of China. So was his son. Later during my years of war against Japan, the Jang family came to my rescue at moments of crisis.

Among the Koreans at the school were Goj Jae Bong, Goh Jae Ryong, Goh Jae Lim and Goh Jae Soo. I was close to them. Father clanked up his nationalist activities in Musong; at that time, China's reactionary warlords began to curry favors with Japanese imperialists and obstructed Korean nationalist activities. It was a tough time for Korean nationalists. Japanese police tortures in Pyongyang and Popyong finally caught up with Father and his health began to deteriorate fast; but Father kept on fighting. Father hung up a new signboard "Murim Medical Clinic" on the front of our house at Sonam-mun street. Father was in no condition to cure other people; he needed more medical attention than his patients. But, Father hit the road again.

Everyone was against Father's trip. Jang Chul Ho, Gong Young, Park Jin Young and other nationalists counseled him not to go; Uncle Hyong Gwon and I begged him not to go, and even Mother, who had supported his every move in the past, was against Father's decision this time. Father left Musong anyway. Korean nationalists in Naedo mountains could not work together and split into several competing camps. Father knew of this situation well and went there to smooth things out. Jang Chul Ho arranged a guide to lead Father to Ahntong. Father and his guide packed up hulled millet and a jar of bean pastes to eat on the road and tucked in an axe and a pistol. They had to walk through a wilderness of several hundred ri. They went through many hardships on their journey. They built bonfires during the cold nights and slept leaning against trees with no blankets to shield them from the elements. Father coughed all night long and his guide could not get much sleep.

Father's coughs persisted even after he returned from Ahndong. Several days after his return, he ran around trying to reopen Baiksang School. The school was established years ago by Korean émigrés, progressives and peasants of Musong during the era when fervors for private schools for national enlightenment were intense. The school had many years of fine records. In the beginning, the school was basically a small study room, no larger than the traditional classics study room, Songwha suh-dang, Father attended in Mangyoing-dae. The school was the size of two rooms of a farm hut. It was forced to shut down for lack of operating fund. By the time we moved to Musong, there was an active fund-raising campaign to reopen the school. The pro-Japanese Chinese authorities refused to reissue the school license, and Father was trying to change their mind.

Father was a firm believer in education and had built a number of schools. Father and Jang Chul Ho had student desks built by carpenters and took them on a horse wagon to the school. Although he hung up a sign, "Murim Medical Clinic", he had little time for his medical practice and spent most of his efforts for the school. He became the honorary principal of the school but did not teach any class. He did, however, give occasional lectures and organized extra-curricular activities. Father wrote the Korean language text used by the school. He met Park Ki Baik (Park Bum Jo) in Samwon-po, Yuha Province who printed the textbook for Father. Father composed texts, which were taken to Park for printing. His texts were sent out to various sites in Manchuria. The printing was done professionally using an offset press and Korean schools in Manchuria used textbooks printed by Park.

Father held several meetings on education in Musong. He dispatched able people to Ahndong, Hwanchun, Donwha, and Jaingbaik regions. He wanted schools and adult-education centers established in every Korean villages in Manchuria. Yukyoung School in Dukhyong-ri was established at that time. Lee Jeh Woo and Kang Don, cadres of the Korean Revolutionary Army of later days and members of XX, were both graduates of the school.

After getting Baiksan School restarted, Father traveled to various towns in Manchuria to promote nationalist movements. His main obsession was uniting the factions among the nationalists. The task of redirecting our nationalist activities toward political party movement faced resistance and many obstacles, and Father devoted his remaining years working on this task. The sundry groups of Korean nationalists operating in the three provinces of North East Manchuria formed the "Three Province" alliance, but in each of the three provinces, there was an independent organization that did not see eye to eye with other provincial organizations; so-called "Justice", "New People" and "Truth" organizations failed to work together and drew criticism from the Korean people.

Father convened a conference of Korean nationalists in August 1925 in Musong. He realized that forming a united front was the most urgent task facing Korean nationalists at that moment and invited nationalist leaders from China and Korea. The Committee to Promote a United Front was formed at the meeting. I believe Father planned to evolve this committee into a full-fledged political party that would lead Korean nationalists. Father apparently knew that his days were numbered and worked more feverishly than ever before.

Father passed away soon after. Starting in the Spring of 1926, Father became bedridden. Many people came to see Father after hearing about his situation. When I came home from school, I would see many pairs of strange shoes at the door step. They came with medicine supposed to cure Father's sickness. They comforted and cheered him on. Even the poorest visitors brought a Ginseng root or two. However, Father's condition was beyond any help and no medicine or medical treatments could do much for him. Spring brought life to millions of plants and animals but it had no gift of life for Father. I lost my interest in school and one day, I was on my way to school but turned around and returned home; I was worried about Father and wanted to be with him.

Lee Wha Rang note: Kim Sung Ju, aka Kim Il Sung, circa 1926

Father was angry that I did not go to school and said: "Why aren't you at school?" I was choked up and could not utter a word. I sat by him and sighed. He said: "You go back to school now. You cannot be like this if you want to become a great man". He made me return to school. One day, Oh Dong Jin and Jang Chul Ho came to Father from Jirin. Oh Dong Jin's effort to form a united front in accordance with the Musong manifesto was not going anywhere and they wanted Father's advice and, of course, they wanted to comfort Father, too. They were unhappy about those nationalists who opposed a united front. Jang Chul Ho, known for his hot tempers, argued angrily that those conservatives should be left out and ignored. Father, after listening to the two men, grasped their hand, one by one, and said: "Oh, no. Don't do that. We must form a united front, no matter what. Unless we get united and fight together, we would never gain freedom for Korea".

After they departed, Father told me about the factional fights during the Yi Dynasty, explaining that factionalism brought down the nation and lamented that today's nationalist leaders had not learned this lesson. He was concerned and sad about the situation; he said unless we got united, there would be no enlightenment, no freedom for Korea; he told me that the Korean people must rise and put an end to factionalism in Korea once and all. Every time I sat next to his sickbed after school, Father told me many things: he told me of the things in his life.

One of the lessons Father gave me in his sickbed was the Three Resolves a revolutionary must have: "A revolutionary must be ready for three things, no matter where he might be - he must be willing to starve to death; he must be willing to be beaten to death; and he must be willing to freeze to death. He must never abandon his faith in revolution". These words are etched on my mind.

Father gave me a lesson on friendship: "Man should never forget his childhood friends. Man relies on his parents while at home, but once out of the house, he must depend on his friends. Friends who stay with you through life or death hardships are more dear than a man's brothers." He gave me examples of this lesson. Father's revolutionary life began with struggles to find and make friends. There were nationalists who had started by acquiring money and six-shooters, but Father's struggles began with recruiting friends and comrades. Lifelong friends do not grow on trees; just as one would dig through tons of earth for an ounce of gold or a diamond, one must diligently search for and cultivate friends. Thus, Father traveled all across Manchuria and Korea in search of friends, and Mother had to help out. If you are sincere in working for the nation and people, you will find many good friends. The main thing is one's intent and mind. You don't need money to make friends; all you need is a common cause. You cannot win friendship with one million won, but you can with one swallow of shared drink or one shared potato.

Father was neither a capitalist nor a power-monger, but he had many friends and if one were to measure one's wealth in terms of the friends he had, he would be the wealthiest man. Father did everything for his friends and his friends did everything for him - even to the point of dying for him. It was thanks to his friends, that Father managed to stay alive so long and could achieve so much for Korea. In his deathbed, Father told me that the thing he missed the most was his friends and told me to make many friends: "Friends who are willing to die for friends are the only friends." I remember this very well.

Mother nursed Father, in bed struggling for his life, as well as she could. Her dedication would be hard to replicate or surpass, but even her super-human efforts could not save Father. On June 5, 1926, Father took his last breath, several thousands of ri far away from his home in Korea, under a tiny roof in a foreign country, still mourning the sorrow of losing his nation

Father told Mother: "When you and I left home together, we said we would be back together after achieving independence, but it appears I won't be going back with you. When Korea is freed, you follow Sung Ju home. I am very sorry that I won't be with you. Please, take care of Sung Ju. I wanted to send him through a middle school, but I won't be around to see to it. I don't know how, but you must see to it that our son, Sung Ju, finishes middle school, even if you have to live on bowls of gruel. Sung Ju then should take over and take care of his brothers." That was Father's last will and testament.

Father handed Mother the two pistols that he carried with him always and said: "After my death, please bury the guns and give them to Sung Ju when he is old enough to join the fight for independence." He then turned to his three sons and gave us his last instruction: "I am leaving this world without realizing my dreams. I trust that you will realize them for me. Don't you ever forget that you are sons of Korea. You must recover Korea even if your bones are smashed and your body is cut to pieces." I started to cry with all my heart. My father's death had, once again, reminded me of the misery of losing one's nation and all the pent-up angers and sadness exploded at the moment Father died.

Father dedicated his body and soul to Korea's independence. Even when his body was broken from repeated tortures and freezing, he pushed on and led his comrades and people onward. When he was exhausted, he leaned on canes, when starved, he ate snow; he kept on marching, never looking back or faltering. Father was never part of a group or a faction. He never sought any power; his sole interest was restoration of our statehood and Korean people's happiness. Father never hungered for wealth or personal gains. When he had money, instead of buying candies for us, he saved it for a school organ. He put his fellow countrymen ahead of him, the nation ahead of his family. He walked, in snow and sleet, all his life, to save Korea. He lived an honest life of a human being and an honorable life of a revolutionary.

I had never heard Father talk about our family affairs. I inherited many things on ideology and politics from Father, but there was no money or tangible assets of any sort he left behind for me. Even the items on display at Mangyong-dae belonged to Grandpa and Grandma - none of the items came from Father. The ideals of ji-won, righteous aspirations, Three Resolves, and Friendship and two revolvers were the entirety of my inheritance from Father. I could not have asked for any more valuable inheritance than this.

My father was buried in a public funeral. On the day of funeral, Sonammun street was filled with mourners, who came from north and south regions of Manchuria; many friends and comrades and former students came to pay last respects. Father's former patients came in streams to see him. The Musong Provincial Governor came and lit a funeral incense and prayed for father's soul, making deep bows with tears in his eyes.

Father was buried in Yangji village on Singwha riverbank, some 10 ri from Sonam-mun. Father had spent many days there. He gave medical treatments and political lessons to the residents of that village. He was like a member of their family. Thus, Father's body rested among his friends. The ten ri road from Sonam-mun to Yang-ji rang with cries of sorrows on that day. Father's bier was carried by his closest comrades, who wept. Korean women in Musong wore white bands on their hair for fifteen days to mourn Father's death.

That was how I lost Father. In one swoop, I lost a father, a teacher and a leader. Father brought me into this world and nurtured me to become a revolutionary. His passing was a huge shock to me. It left a large gaping hole in my heart. Many times, I sat alone by Yalu and wept looking at my fatherland across the river. Looking back, Father's love for me was unusual. He started to talk about Korea as soon as I was old enough. He was extremely strict but immensely considerate; that was his way of loving his sons. But he was gone, and I had no one, did not expect to find anyone, to love me or lead me as Father had done.

Father left me, but his legacy lived on; his legacy got me out of my mourning and put me on the path of revolution. Righteous Aspirations, Three Resolves, Friendship and a pair of revolvers - this legacy from Father pointed me in the direction of revolution amidst the abyss of despair, fear of the unknown and one of the worst tragedies in my life.

The Whasung Military Academy

After Father's funeral, several of his close friends got together to discuss my future. It was decided that I should attend Whasung Military School in Whajun and I left home in mid-June 1926.

Korea was in turmoil again in the aftermath of the June 10th anti-Japan mass demonstrations which was organized and led by the newly emergent Korean communists. March First Movement had ushered in communism in Korea and from that time on, communists became vanguards of Korean independence movement. The March First showed that Korean bourgeois could not lead us to independence, and many Korean nationalists turned to political organizational activities following the world trend of that era. Marxism-Leninism spread fast in Korea.

In the year following March First Movement of 1919, a worker's organization, Laborers Mutual Assistance Association, appeared in Seoul. It was followed by farmers' unions, youth organizations, women's organizations and other mass organs for the working poor. Under the leadership of these groups, mass struggles against exploitation of the working class and Japanese imperialists began in 1920. Dock workers staged a general strike at Pusan Harbor in 1921 and it spread to Seoul, Pyongyang, Inchon and other industrial centers; farmers staged campaigns against Japanese landlords and evil Korean landowners. Students walked out classrooms en masse protesting colonial education and demanding freedom on campus.

Japanese imperialists hid their military rule under the cover of "cultural rule"; they empowered pro-Japanese traitors to maintain a facade of equal treatments of Koreans; they allowed a handful of Korean newspapers and magazines to be published. But the Korean people did not buy into the Japanese schemes and continued to fight for Korean independence. Labor and other mass movements against Japanese imperialists were in need of a political party for leadership and so, in April 1925, the Korean Communist Party was established in Seoul. During this time periods, proletarian political parties emerged in Europe as well. The Korean Communist Party lacked any guidelines that met the needs of the Korean people; the Party was fractional and lacked grass root support of the people. Even though the Party failed to lead the mass movements, its formation was an important step in labor, farmer, student and other mass movements and anti-Japan activities in Korea.

The last King of Yi Dynasty, Soon-jong, died during this period of mass unrest. His death rekindled Korean people's hatred of Japan. Upon hearing the news of his death, Koreans put on mourning clothes and wailed, men, women, children and adults alike. The King, although deposed, was the last symbol of Yi Dynasty and his passing put an end to the Dynasty. The Korean people's sorrow over losing their nation erupted into a rage. Students marched singing and the mass wept.

*Farewell, Changduk Palace, for ever, for eternity
To the north Manchuria, I am going, to lonely foreign lands*

When I could return, I know not Long live my 20 million fellow Koreans.

Korean people's cries hit the Japanese occupiers like a bomb. Japanese mounted police and troops viciously scattered mourning crowds with sabers and clubs. They beat and slashed unarmed Koreans mourning their last king. The Japanese attacked little elementary school children with clubs. The Korean people were not allowed to weep over their lost nation or their king. Such was the naked truth of Japanese government's "cultural" rule of Korea. It was a brutal military rule under the cloak of a 'civil' cultural rule.

Japan's brutal barbaric suppression of the Korean people mourning their king's death added fuel to their simmering hatred of Japan. The Korean Communist Party seized this opportunity and secretly planned a mass demonstration against Japan on the day of King Soon-jong's funeral. However, a fractional group within the Party leaked this plan to Japanese police and the Japanese security forces mounted massive suppression campaigns. In spite of this, Korean patriots pushed on with the preparation.

On June 10, King Soon-jong's bier passed through Jong-ro, Seoul. Tens of thousands of Seoul citizens hit the streets of Seoul, shouting "Hurrah for Korean Independence!", "Go home, Japanese troops!", and "Korean intendance workers must unite!" Seven years of suppressed anger at Japan exploded in "Long live Korea!" all across Korea on that day. Even 12-year old school children joined the march. The unarmed marchers fought pitched battles with heavily armed Japanese.

The June 10th uprising failed because of the treachery of the factionalists within the Korean Communist Party. The movement was savagely put down. While the toadism of the Korean bourgeois was one of the root causes of March First Movement's failure, fractional in-fights among Korean communists in the early days were the main reason why the June 10th movement failed. The Whayo faction within the Party led the uprising while the Seoul faction sabotaged it. Most of key leaders of the Korean Communist Party were arrested after the June 10th incident.

The June 10th incident exposed the truth about Japan's 'enlightened, cultural' rule of Korea. It hid Japan's brutal, hideous suppression of the Korean people. The Korean people demonstrated that they would continue to fight for freedom no matter what. If the Korean Communist Party had been united and provided more effective leadership, the June 10th uprising would have expanded into a pan-Korean mass movement. The failure of the June 10th incident showed that unless we formed a united front, communism and nationalism in Korea were doomed.

When I learned about the June 10th, it struck me odd that the its organizers had not learned any lesson from the March First and repeated the same error of mounting a peaceful demonstration. There is an old saying, "One thousand days to train a soldier, one day to fight". One must organize, educate and train the people over a long period of time in order to mount an effective uprising. The organizers of the June 10th demonstration did not have any adequate preparation and placed unarmed people in front of armed enemies; it was inevitable that the leadership's ineptitude resulted in tragedies.

When I thought of the tens of thousands of our patriots who were butchered by Japanese like so many sacrificial lambs and not much to show for their heroism, I became so angry at the inept leaders who led their followers to the killing fields for no tangible gains, that I stayed up all nights planning revenge. I swore to myself to get the most out of my study at Whasung; I swore not to forget Father's legacy, Mother's wish and the Korean people's expectation.

Whasung was a 2-year military-political academy founded in early 1925 by Jung-yi-bu. It trained independence army officers. Korean nationalist leaders, patriots and enlightenment activists had founded schools for mass education; they also founded military academies. Among the military academies were: Sinhung Training Center in Yuha Province, Sipripyong Officers School in Wangchun Province, Sosaha Training Center in Ahndong. Yang Ki Rak, Lee Si Young, Oh Dong Jin, Lee Bum Suk, Kim Gyu Sik, Kim Jwa Jin were among the nationalist leaders active in military education of our patriots.

Whasung accepted students from the ranks of Jung-yi-bu soldiers with combat experiences. Once the enrollment size was set, each combat unit was allocated so many candidates to select. Upon completing the two-year curriculum, the graduates were assigned to various duties based on their class performance. The school occasionally accepted students from other sources, but such was an exception. Many young boys aspired to enter this school. Today, few of my classmates from Whasung are alive.

When Father was alive, I did not have to worry about my upkeeps or my family's livelihood. But after Father's passing, I had to worry about my own and my family's financial affairs. Amidst of my sorrow and agonizing over Father's death, I spent days thinking about how I could live up to Father's legacy, how to continue my education. Father in his deathbed asked Mother to send me to a middle school, but Mother had no financial resources to do so. She supported her family by doing laundry and sewing for other people, and she could hardly save enough money for my tuitions.

After Father died, Uncle Hyong Kwon, who had worked as Father's medical helper, lost in effect his job. By the time Father died, there was hardly any medical supplies left to sell. It was under these circumstances that Father's friends recommended that I should attend Whasung Military Academy. Before his death, Father told Mother and Uncle to make sure that I got at least middle school education and that they should write letters to his friends asking for assistance. Accordingly, Mother wrote to some of Father's friends; we could not survive even one day without our friends' compassionate aids in those days. After Father's funeral, some of his friends got together to map out my next move.

Oh Dong Jin said that he had sent a letter of recommendation to Choe Dong Oh on my behalf so that I could attend Whasung, that learning military science would be good for me; "Your father used to say that just talking about it will not get us freed from Japan. After you finish the school, we will pay for your education, if you want higher education. Make sure you study hard at the school." They wanted to train me; they were keen on educating the next generation of leaders to follow in their footsteps. (Photo: Oh Dong Jin).

I accepted Oh Dong Jin's suggestion. I was appreciative of their concerns for my future. Their idea of sending me to a military school gibed well with my ambition to fight for Korea. I believed that only military means could free Korea of Japanese, and that only military leaders could lead our fight for independence. My dreams were about to come true. I believed that Whasung Military Academy was the ticket for my fight for Korea and started to pack my bag.

Once, a world leader asked me why I, a communist, had attended Whasung, run by conservative nationalists, a reasonable question. I had not yet started my communist career when I entered Whasung. At the time, my grasp of Marxism and Leninism was superficial. My communist reading was limited to two booklets, "Socialist Ideals" and "Lenin's Life Story"; I read about the advances being made in the Soviet Union and admired the Soviets; that was the extent of my education in communism at that time. I was surrounded by more nationalists than communists. Most of my school teachers taught more nationalism than communism. We were in the threshold of a new revolutionary era, but we could not ignore the achievements of Korean nationalists for the past 50 years.

There were many fine youth at the Academy, which offered free education in political science and the art of war. It was an ideal place for me because I could complete my middle school education there and at the same time I would be trained to become more effective freedom fighter. Frankly speaking, I looked forward to attending the school; two years of free lodging and education, with military training added, sounded too good to be true. But once I stepped out of my house on my way to Whasung, other thoughts flooded my mind. I slowed my pace and glanced back. I gazed at Jang-ji where Father was buried and saw Mother and my young brothers still waving at me in far distance, I was overcome with sadness. I wondered how Mother could manage to feed my young brothers by herself in a place like Musong. Mother's admonition, "Don't look back, once you start a journey", rang in my ears and I hastened my pace.

Whajun is about 300 ri from Musong. People with money traveled in style in a hired carriage, but my near-empty pocket did not allow such a luxury. Whajun was a mountain town, located about 50 to 60 ri from confluence of Songhwa River and Whibal River, in Jirin Province. It was one of the key bases of Korean nationalists in south Manchuria. A nationalist in Muson warned me that life at Whasung would be Spartan; he said that independence fighters were short of cash, and so, the living conditions at the school dormitory might be tough. I was used to wearing rags and going to bed hungry, and his warning did not scare me. I thought how could anything be worse than our days in Mangyong-dae?

The only thing that worried me was how I, a young boy without any military experience, would fit in there with those old veterans? I was comforted by the fact that Kim Si Woo, one of Father's best friends, lived there; Kang Je Ha, another friend of Father's was at the Academy. After arriving at Whajun, I looked up Kim Si Woo, as instructed by Mother. Kim ran the Korean Help Center in Whajun. The Korean Help Center was created by Korean nationalists to provide assistance to Korean in need. Musong, Bansuk, Kwanjun, Wangchun-mun and Samwon had a branch.

Kim Si Woo and Father worked together for many years. He came to China after March First Movement and was active in Rimgang and Dandong. He moved to Whajun in 1924 and set up a rice-polishing business, a grain storage, called "Young Pung Millry". He provided financial aids to independence fighters and was active in mass enlightenment campaigns. He donated food and money to Whasung Military Academy as well as a Korean school in the region. I met him in Rimgang and admired his masculine airs, typical of people in northern regions. He treated me as if I were his own son or nephew. (Photo: Kim Si Woo).

When I showed up, Kim and his wife were busy repairing a chicken coup. They had chickens everywhere in their yard. As soon as they saw me, they ran to me shouting my name. Kim Si Woo took me to the Academy. I could smell the order peculiar to rice millers. Whasung Military Academy was located by the Whibal River bank. The school building had a sharp-angled straw thatch roof and bricks wall, typical of village buildings in Manchuria. I spotted the school through Zelkova trees that surrounded the school. There was a large school yard and a dormitory for the students. Both the school building and the dormitory were much shabbier than I had anticipated. But I told myself that what mattered was what went on inside, not what the building looked like. The school yard was the exception - it was large and well-kept. I recalled Oh Dong Jin and Father talking about establishing this school in Paldo-gu. Oh showed up hatless on a cold winter day to see father about the school. Now, I was there at the very school Father had helped to create.

The director, a short balding middle aged and pleasant man, greeted me in his office. He was the famed Yisan, Choe Dong Oh. Choe was a student of Son Byong Whi, one of the 33 leaders of March First Movement, and the third head of Chundogyo, a religion rooted in Korea. After graduating from Son's private school, he returned to his home town of Yiju and started a private school for children of Chundogyo followers. He participated in March First, after which he came to China and founded a Chundogyo school. He had been active in patriotic works. The director regretted that he could not attend Father's funeral. He and Kim went into a long reminiscence of Father.

Director Choe Dong Oh gave me an importance lecture on that day. "Sung Ju, you are here at an opportune moment. Our independence move is in a dire need of new talents. The frontal attack days of Hong Bom Do and Ryu Rin Sik are over. Japanese use new tactics and weapons against us, and we need new tactics and weapons to counter them. Who can do this for us? Young people like you must come out with solutions for us." Director Choe went on to say that the living conditions there were not ideal and that I must bear these hardships for the sake of Korea. He was gentle in his manners and eloquent in his talks.

His son, Choe Duk Sin, also worked for Kim Il Sung. Another nationalist, Yu Dong Ryol died of cancer en route to meet Kim Il Sung early in 1950. Yu's daughter, married to Choe Duk Sin, worked for Kim Il Sung.

That evening, Kim Si Woo invited me to a simple dinner at his house. I was awed to sit with a friend of Father, man to man. I noticed a small table with wine at a corner and figured it was for the adults, but I was taken back when Kim offered me a drink. I did not know what to do, but I accepted the cup with both hands. I had never been offered a drink by a grownup until that time. During Father's funeral, someone offered me a drink, but that was expected in funeral situations. Kim Si Woo treated me like an equal. His tone of conversation with me changed from 'talking to kid' to "talking to friend".

He said: "When I heard of your coming here, I thought of your father a lot. That is why I have this wine for you. When your father came here, he sat where you are sitting now and drank from the same cup you are holding. Today, you take your father's place. Now that your father is gone, you are the head of your family." I took the cup but I could not bring myself to drink the wine. It was a tiny cup but it seemed to weigh a ton, it was heavy with symbolism. It was clear to me that Kim Si Woo was telling me that I was no longer a boy; and that I should act like an adult from now on for Korea's sake. He made a room available for me to stay during my education at the school. He said that he had already discussed this with the Director and I would be staying at his house, instead of the school dormitory. He said Master Kim Hyong Jik in his deathbed asked him to take care of me and he was duty-bound to do so.

This was the way Father's friends took care of me in Musong and Whajun. They were paying back Father's friendship, which was based on their common cause of Korean independence. They helped me because doing so might help their cause. They expected the younger generation to grow up and carry the torch. I renewed my vow to study hard and grow up fast.

My schooling started next day. Director Choe took me to the classroom. The students thought I was a boy warrior and expected to hear a heroic tale; they thought I was perhaps a battle-worn boy messenger from a combat unit, a son of a battalion. There were about 40 students in the room, none as young as I was. Most of them appeared to be in their 20s. There was even a bearded father. They could have been my elder brothers or uncles. When the director told the class that I was Kim Hyong Jik's son, they clapped their hands wildly.

I was assigned to a desk in front by the window. Seated next to me was Park Cha Suk, a soldier from Company A. He would whisper to me the background of our instructors before their classes began. Lee Woong was his most respected instructor. Lee taught military science and was a member of the general staff. Lee attended the famed Wampao Military Academy and was quite a character. Lee's father ran a large drug store in Seoul and sent him ginseng regularly. His only fault was that he tended to be officious, but he knew his subject well and could do nothing wrong.

Park Cha Suk told me that the school offered classes in Korean history, geography, biology, mathematics, athletics, and world revolution. He wrote out our daily schedules for me. Years later, Park Cha Suk betrayed me to my greatest sorrow, but our friendship started as classmates. That day, Choe Chang Gul from Company Six visited me at Kim Si Woo's house with 10 of his comrades. Apparently, I gave them a good first impression. They were curious about their young boy classmate and wanted to find out more about me.

Choe had a large scar on his forehead. He had thick dark eye brows and a large forehead. He was tall and muscular. He would have been a handsome fellow but for the scar. I was impressed by his manly mannerism. He said to me: "I hear you are only fifteen, but you act much older than that. Tell me which battles were you in? How did you get in the school?" I answered honestly and truthfully. When I said that Kim Hyong Jik was my father, they were impressed. They asked me questions about conditions in Korea. After fielding their questions, it was my turn to ask him questions.

I wanted to know about Choe's life in the army. Choe began with how he got his scar. He always talked in third-persons, instead of saying "I did that", he said "Choe did that". Thus, he told me: "Choe was a soldier in Yang Se Bong's army at the time; I caught a spy and was escorting him to Gaewon. That stupid Choe dozed off at a lodging after walking several tens of ri. The damned spy managed to free himself and hit Choe with an axe and escaped. Fortunately, Choe was not killed but Choe had to wear the scar as a badge of shame. If you are not careful, you will end up like Choe." For two hours, we talked. During my lifetime, I have made several thousands of friends, but Choe was the only one who talked in third-person.

Later on, I learned more about Choe's past. His father ran a small lodging in Muson. Choe's father expected him to help out, but Choe left the house and joined an independence army. His grandmother visited him several times trying to talk him into returning home, but Choe rebuffed her saying that at a time when our nation needed him, he could not sit around at a lodging.

I met at the school Choe Chang Gul, Kim Lee Gap, Geh Young Chun, Lee Jeu Woo, Park Gun Won, Kang Byon Sun, Kim Won Woo and many other patriots. Every evening, they came over to see me at Kim Si Woo's house. I was glad to have so many classmates coming to see me; it was unexpected. That was how I got to be friends with people who were five to ten years older than I was; that was why I had so many older comrades during my guerrilla days.

After a few days, I found that Whasung Military Academy was in a much worse shape, financially, than I had anticipated. The school's assets amounted to some old desks and chairs and some beat-up exercise machines. But that did not discourage me. Even though the building was small, dank straw-thatched, its students were bright and shiny; even though it had little money, it was rich in students. I was happy to be there.

Disillusion

Soon I got the daily routines at Whasung Military Academy down pat. After a couple of weeks of study, I found the course works not so taxing at all. My classmates found mathematics difficult. One day, I solved a lengthy fourth-order problem with ease. Several of my classmates could not solve it even after numerous hints. That was understandable because they quit schooling in order to fight the Japanese years ago and they were quite rusty. After my day at the blackboard, these bearded old men asked me for help with math problems. They paid me back with their life stories, many of which were memorable; they also helped me with tough military exercises that exceeded my physical stamina.

We shared our inner thoughts and deep friendship evolved. Initially, some people feared that I, a young kid among the grizzled war veterans, might become a burden to the student body, but I was able to carry my own weight and got along well with my old classmates. I had no complaint as far as this went.

As time went, the classes became boring and I began to lose interest in school activities. The school was established and run by Father's friends and I felt some affinity to it, but I found its curriculum outdated leftovers of the old ideas and methods. Although bourgeois nationalist movement was several decades old, the school curriculum accepted blindly the old ways and did not analyze or critique any of the old practices. The bourgeois nationalist leaders, even after decades of having led our nationalist movement, had not written any guidelines or textbooks for new generations. Various nationalists leaders and army commanders came to our school and gave speeches blowing hot air about 'fighting for independence', without being specific on how we could become independent. No one talked about organizing the people and forming a united front. Combat tactics and strategies taught at the school were unimpressive and outdated. Korean history lessons were based on royal archives and the world history was pure bourgeoisie history. All I was getting at the school was obsolete nationalism and military training tainted with old Yi Dynasty army tactics.

My instructors were ardent nationalists and talked much about being anti-Japanese and self-determination, but they were awfully short on practical realistic methodology. The school invited war veterans to share their exploits with us. Most of them talked about individual acts of terrorism much like those of Ahn Joon Gun, Jang In Whan, Kang Yu Gu, Lee Jae Myong and Nah Suk Ju. The school was called "Military Academy" and its mission was to train military officers, but it had no bullets or real guns and we used toy rifles made of wood in our military exercises. My classmates complained, "How in hell, can we defeat the Japanese with what we have?"

One day, a student asked our military instructor, "When will we have modern weapons?". The instructor sighed and said, "Our army command is doing its best to raise money to buy weapons in America, France and other countries. You will have modern weapons soon, I hope." The army could not get hold of a few rifles here and now; instead, it was hoping for a miracle in a Western land tens of thousands of ri away.

Every time I was made to run with sand bags wrapped around my legs, I had to wonder, "How on earth, will this help me defeat the Japanese?" Years ago, Jun Bong Jun's Donghak peasant army of ten thousand men was defeated by a Japanese regiment of 1,000 men or so at Ugumchi. Japanese troops had modern rifles. The Tonghak army outnumbered the Japanese ten to one and it could have easily squashed the Japanese and marched to Seoul, if only they had modern weapons and effective commanders.

The Righteous Army (yibyong) was no better than the Donghak army in weaponry. Although some yibyong soldiers had modern rifles, the great majority carried spears, bow and arrows and ancient firearms. Their fight was muzzle-loaders against Japan's Model 38 rifles. Yibyong fighters struggled to light their guns with matches, while Japanese rifles fired more than 10 rounds per minute. One cannot imagine the frustrations of our fighters and tragic consequences of such uneven contests. In the beginning, Japanese soldiers ran away when they heard our muzzle-loaders boom, but soon they found out that the Korean guns were relatively harmless and began to laugh at them. Yibyong commanders, mostly from the elite, yangban, wore traditional horse-hair hats and bulky ceremonial robes in battle fields. Japanese mowed down Korean troops with machine guns and modern artillery.

Japan's military had expanded in size and weaponry many fold since the days of Righteous Army. I wondered how the military training offered at my school could help us defeat Japanese tanks, artillery, warship and warplanes. Running around with sandbags was no way to get ready to fight an imperialist army backed by modern heavy weapons mass produced.

The thing that disappointed me the most was the backwardness of political indoctrination at the school. Old-fashioned Korean nationalism was the only 'ideology' allowed at the school. Some students believed in restoring the old monarchy; some believed in American-style democracy. These ideas came up in our political science class. Most students regurgitated lecture materials, toting capitalism, without any critique. I was not happy with this kind of robotism. The course had nothing on Korean independence or problems facing the Korean people. It was mere presentation of stale materials by the text and instructor and rote memorization and regurgitation. There was no emphasis on applications of any political science theories to Korean problems.

During a class debate, I popped a question, "What kind of society should Korea be after independence?" A student answered without hesitation that Korea should be capitalistic, because, he said, the reason why Korea was eaten up by Japan was that Korea was ruled by feudalists bent on isolation, while Japan and other nations became capitalist societies; in order for us not to repeat this mistake, Korea must become capitalistic, he argued.

A number of my classmates asserted that the old royalty should be restored. None of my classmates pushed for democracy or proletarian society wherein the working class would be the boss. At the time when national liberation movement was changing from pure nationalism to communism, the political science class was still in the 19th century. Some said that it was premature to talk about what kind of political system Korea should have before we achieved independence; it was a waste of time, they said. Such debates firmed my belief that the school's education was anachronistic, to the say the least. Talking about bringing back the defunct Yi Dynasty or introducing capitalism in Korea sounded so unreal.

I could not remain silent any more. I stood up and said: "Korea is in no condition for European-style bourgeois revolution and also Korea should not bring back the old royal rule. In both capitalist and feudal societies, rich people get richer by exploiting the poor working class. We should not establish any such unjust society in Korea. Looking at industrial advances and ignoring evil aspects of capitalism is wrong. Restoring our old monarchy is a nonsense. Who would want the royal family, who sold out our nation, back in power again? What have the kings done for Korea? All they did was to skin our farmers alive and vanish loyal subjects who had dared to speak out. After liberating Korea, we must establish a society with no class exploitation, no oppression of any people, and enough food and shelter for all working people."

Many of my classmates nodded in agreement. Who would be against establishing a society in which all people are equal and no class is oppressed or exploited? At the end of the class, Choe Chang Gul grasped my hand and said it was a good debate and liked what I had said. He laughed saying: "You did a good job of preaching communism without mentioning 'communism'". (Photo: Choe Chang Gul).

The shortcomings of Whasung Military Academy was symbolic of the shortcomings of Korean independence movement in general. I got to learn more about our nationalist movement while studying at Whasung. In those days, our army did nothing but fractional infighting. In early 1920s, Korean armed forces battled and won significant victories over Japanese troops in regions inside Korea and Manchuria along Yalu. But now, our armed forces hunkered down in safe areas and concentrated in raising money for their comforts and easy life.

Even the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, which called itself "government of all people of Korea", was manned by "self-determinists", "independentists", and other factional groups; the "government" was in name only and its leaders were more interested in selling their virtues than fighting for the Korean people. The "government" leaders came and went; in one year, the entire cabinet was reshuffled twice. Such was the shameful state of that "government". The United States and other nations used illegal means to prevent our petition for freedom from being discussed at the Paris Peace Conference; but, in spite of this fact of history, Shanghai Provisional Government sent, shamelessly, petition after petition to the very same nations that had denied our petition at the Paris Peace Conference. They even went to the extent of spending a fortune on expensive ginseng and other gifts for an American Congressional delegation that toured Shanghai and occupied Korea. The Shanghai Government virtually ceased to function in the 1920s for lack of operating funds and became dependent on Chiang Kai Sek for its upkeep.

Many of the nationalist leaders, who came from wealthy families, preferred to life under Japanese to life under the working class. They opposed and feared proletarian revolution much more than Japanese imperialism, and deserted our nationalist movement and joined Japanese military and police in droves. They turned from patriots to traitors and fought against our independence, working as toads and running dogs of Japanese occupation force. These traitors danced to the Japanese tune of "self-rule" under Japanese, "self-enlightenment" and "self-development"; they pushed these deceptive Japanese programs in Korea and helped Japanese Empire to extent its power into other regions.

The wind of "reformist" treachery touched Whasung Military Academy as well. My room at Kim Si Woo's house teamed with visitors wanting to discuss politics with me. Kim Si Woo's library included many books on Marxism and Leninism and I got to read them and so, I could talk about communism and socialism with some degree of authority. When I was in Musong, I got to read "Lenin's Life Story", "Socialist Ideals" and some other books, but I had many more books to read in Whajun. Previously, I merely read the books without giving much thought what to the authors were writing about, but now, I spent more time thinking about how what I read could be applied to solve problems in Korea. I had many questions on how to carry out Korean revolution.

Japan must be beaten and Korea must be freed, but how? What should be our targets and what methods should we employ? What path should we follow to achieve socialism and communism in Korea? I was not sure and I wanted answers. I read books looking for answers. I read and reread paragraphs on colonialism ten to twenty times. Colonialism was one of the hot topics in my room. We talked about the world news and the USSR the most. My visitors were deeply affected and stayed late in my room for more information. They were more interested in learning about the new ways of thinking than hearing about restoring monarchy, capitalism or reformism. Many of my classmates became more keen on political ideology.

Whasung Military Academy forbade any mention of Lenin or the Bolshevik October revolution. My faith in Whasung began to crumble and I became more and more disillusioned.

"Down With Imperialism" Association

Whasung Military Academy's anachronism convinced me that I must find a new way of fighting for Korea. A dozen or so persons, armed with a handful of rifles, crossing Yalu to kill some miserable police and collecting a few won now and then, would never get Korea freed. It was clear to me that there must be a better way and that we must find it soon. My friends agreed with me. Most of my classmates, however, refused to go along and they either opposed my notion or sat on the fence.

Whasung students were not allowed to read communist publications. One day, I took "Communist Manifesto" to class and my friends warned me that I should not have done it. The school was quite strict on leftist documents on campus and punished violators severely by expelling or reprimanding. But I was not afraid of getting booted out for reading a book I believed in. I found "Communist Manifesto" in Kim Si Woo's library, which had many other books on communism. I saw from the books he had that Kim Si Woo was deep into communist ideology, in tune with the trend in the world at the time. I was unhappy that the school did not allow us to read books on communism. I did not understand why the school forbade us from seeking new ideas and delving into them. I read communist books in defiance of the school authority. There were so many students wanting to read the books, I had to set up a check-out/check-in rule in order to meet the rising demand.

They followed my rule and books were checked out and returned on time with the exception of Geh Young Chun. Geh was excited easily and not punctual and careless about hiding communist books from the school authority. Geh kept Communist Manifesto for ten days and I asked him to return it because there was a long line of people waiting to read it. Geh begged me for two more days, because he was on to something in the book. Next day, Geh did not show up in the morning classes and sneaked out the dormitory. He was nowhere to be seen in the lunch room. We found him engrossed reading Communist Manifesto hiding in a bush by Whibal River. I warned him that reading the book was OK, but he should not skip classes to read it.

Geh promised me that he would be more careful, but he brought the Manifesto to the history class and got caught reading it by the instructor. The instructor took the book away from him and took it to the school director. They traced the book to me and Kim Si Woo's library; the history teacher was sent to Kim Si Woo's house to raise hell. He told Kim Si Woo that the Academy counted on Kim for support and it was unbecoming of Kim to allow the students to read leftist publications. He asked Kim to stop lending his books to the students. He then turned to me and said, "Sung Ju, you better watch out". (Photo: Geh Young Chun).

I was offended by my school's action. I said to Kim Si Woo: "To be well-rounded, man must be broadly educated. Why does the school deny its students the opportunity to study fresh ideas widely accepted in the rest of the world? Books on Leninism and Marxism are being sold everywhere and any literate person can get them. I don't understand why Whasung has to be the only place where the books are banned." Kim Si Woo sighed and said that it was the policy of the general staff and the school, and therefore, it was well over his head. He said there was nothing he could do to change it. Man must be judged mainly by his ideology and so must an educational institution by its pedagogical philosophy. Whasung Military Academy was trying to solve modern problems with outdated methods.

This incident exposed to the student body that there was a group of students studying Marxism-Leninism on campus. The authorities threatened expulsion or severe punishment, but that made open-minded students more curious about the new ideology; and a rapidly increasing number of students came to me asking for books to read on communism. Father, when he was alive, told me to pick my friends carefully and to make as many friends as possible. No matter how righteous and magnificent plans one might have, without friends who would share life and death together, nothing could be achieved.

Among the many students I met, there was a Lee from Company A. He was bright, able and mild mannered; he was well-liked by everyone. The only fault he had was that he was an ultra-conservative, ideology-wise. He was the guy who talked about restoring monarchy in our political science class. We were cordial to each other; there was no friendship between us - until the day our school had a football match with Korean Model High School. Lee collided with a player of the other team and injured a leg, while leading a charge. I stayed with him at the dormitory and nursed him for ten days. He opened up to me and said that he was wrong to believe in monarchism at a time when every nation was moving away from it; he said, "You are right, Sung Ju. Korea must become a society in which working people get enough to eat and live well; we must kick out the Japanese and start enjoying life."

I asked Lee, "Do you think we can defeat Japanese with what they teach us here? They say Japan is the fifth power of the world and if so, how can our army, which can hardly scrounge up a few lousy guns for us, defeat Japan by itself?" Lee answered, "Well, the best we can do is to be strong physically and shoot straight. What else can we do? We must follow what the veterans tell us." I told him he was wrong to think like that and I said: "We cannot achieve independence that way. I have been studying Marxism-Leninism for a better way. The Japanese imperialists today present a distorted picture of communism because they fear it. Some Korean nationalists shun socialism; some wealthy nationalists say socialism is bad. But there is no reason why we, from poor labor and farming families, should go along with them and say socialism is bad, without first studying it. If you want to become true patriots, you must have thorough understanding of Marxism-Leninism." Lee was moved by my little speech and, after some reflection, asked me if he could borrow a book on socialism. I told him that he should concentrate on getting well and I would be happy to lend him a book after he was healed up.

Winds of socialism swept through Whasung and no authority could stop it. All students except a few die-hard old-time nationalists were affected by the new way of thinking. I organized book-review meetings for progressive students. We met alternately at Kim Si Woo's house, Kang Je Ha's house and Whibal river banks. When we met at Kim Si Woo's library, he left us alone and made sure that his family or his guests stayed away from the library. Often, he sat outside and stood watch for us. I appreciated his silent support for what I was doing.

Kang Je Ha was Father's friend and his son was a close friend of mine. Kang Je Ha was a socialist in heart and allowed us to meet at his house. He was one of those nationalists who did not shun communism. In fact, he pushed communism on me when I visited his house. He said, "I am too old to change, but you boys are still young and should fight to win using communism, if necessary." His encouragement meant a lot to me. Kang had several books on communism. Looking back, I see that our book-review meetings were quite advanced; we had touched upon various major issues in Korean revolution. Through open debates, we were able to draw consensus among the participants.

During a debate at Kim Si Woo's house one day, Lee showed up hobbling on crutches and asked me for that book I had promised. He said: "I could not stay in bed while you guys study new ways of doing things. I don't want to be a straggler." That was how Lee became a member of our clique. To a capitalist, making money is the hobby, but for me, making friends is the hobby. The pleasure of finding a gold nugget pales in comparison to finding a true friend. My lifelong unending campaign to make friends began at Whasung Military Academy.

Once I had gathered enough friends around me, I searched for ways to organize and bind them together. If my memory serves me right, I disclosed my thoughts on getting organized at a meeting held in late September. I gave many reasons why we should be organized, "In order to liberate Korea and establish a nation for the working poor, we must walk a long difficult path ahead of us. If we get organized and fight valiantly together, the victory will be ours. After we are organized, we will rally the mass around us and awaken them; we will mobilize the mass to liberate Korea." My audience liked what they heard and wanted to get organized right away. I told them that we must do some homework before we get organized; that we must recruit more people to join us. They accepted my proposal and made a list of prospects. Each prospect was assigned to a member to be worked on. Some members worried that forming a new group might add to factionalism already in place. I told them: "Our organization will not be like any existing nationalist or communist organizations. It will be of an entirely different character. Its main purpose will be revolution, not factionalism. Liberation and revolution will be our primary objectives."

After some preparations, we met on China's Foundation Day, October 10th, to pick our organization's name, its charter, its platforms and its scope of mission. One week later, on October 17, 1926, we met at Kim Si Woo's house to formalize our organization. The meeting was held in an unheated, cold room in a solemn atmosphere. After 60 years, I still remember the energy and spirit that filled that room. All of us were filled with excitement. As the organization took shape, I thought of Father's Korean People's Association. Father spent years working hard in order to form the Association, walking tens of thousands of ri to bind together his friends scattered all over. After forming the Association, he devoted all he had to achieve Association's objectives; he died working for the Association. Father passed the torch of his unfinished revolution to his children. Father's will "you must free Korea even if your bones are broken and your body sundered" came to my mind and I took the first step to realize Father will. I was profoundly gratified.

We incorporated Father's ideals in our platforms. I still remember the shiny faces of those present at the meeting; Choe Chang Gul, Kim Lee Kap, Lee Je Woo, Kang Byong Sun, Kim Won Woo, Park Gun Won, Lee Jong Rak and Park Cha Suk; the latter two betrayed me later on. We all swore to dedicate our life to our cause. There were many eloquent speeches; there were some less eloquent ones, too. I, too, gave a lengthy speech. I proposed to name our organization "Down with Imperialism" Association, TD in short (Lee Wha Rang note: TD is an acronym for 'tah-do jeh-guk-ju-i dong-maeng', ???????). TD was anti-imperialism, pro-independence and pro-freedom; its primary mission was to free Korea from Japan and the toiling mass from exploitation; its members were youth of Korea's new generation with faith in socialism and communism; it was a new genre of pure revolutionary political organization.

Although TD was formed to establish a socialist, communist society in Korea, we feared that some nationalists might consider it too far left and so, we chose our organization's name "Down with Imperialism". We were careful not to offend the nationalists in power. The name was adopted unanimously. The charter and platforms I proposed were also accepted in toto. TD's mission was; first, to bring down Japanese imperialists and free Korea; second, to establish a socialist, communist nation in Korea; and third, to bring down other imperialists and establish communist states all over the world. We adopted resolutions for practical steps for our movement. We distributed printed copies of our charter and platforms to the attendees.

Choe Chang Gul nominated me to be the leader of the organization. After the meeting, we ran to the banks of Whibal River, singing and holding hands; at the river bank, we swore allegiance to our cause and made a vow to fight together to the end for our Fatherland and revolution. I was so excited that night and I could not sleep. To be frank, we thought we had conquered the world; we were drunk with youthful euphoria. Nothing can compare with the elation we felt that day.

In those day, there were many communist organizations that had impressive credentials. Our organization was a mere infant just born; our membership was negligible compared to theirs; TD had left no mark anywhere. Nevertheless, we believed that ours was a fundamentally new way to doing things and that we would succeed where other had failed. TD was not a faction that branched out an existing organization; its founding members had no association with any of the existing political organizations. TD was a brand new organization build from scratch. It was brand new, fresh as fresh snow, clean and refreshing as cool spring water.

Its founding members were easy-going capable people. They could speak well, they could write well, they could compose songs well and they could fight well. They had many talents. They were first-class young man and women of new Korea, and they rallied around me; we could do nothing wrong. The founding members worked together and broke through numerous barriers and obstacles on the path of our revolution. They were vanguards of Korean revolution. Kim Hyok Gul, Cha Kwang Soo, Kim Lee Kap, Kang Byong Sun, Lee Je Woo and many members of TD perished heroically for Korea. Regrettably, there were some members who betrayed us.

Today, none of the founding members is alive. Many of the members died at prime of their life in nameless battlefields in foreign lands, never to enjoy the fruit of their struggle and sacrifice. They laid the foundation of the Korean Workers' Party and new Korea. The Party's roots go back to our "Down with Imperialism" Association. The Party's charter and platforms are based on those of the Association. The day the Association was formed was the day the Korean revolution, a self-reliant independent movement, took its first step.

After Liberation, Choe Il Chun (aka Choe Hyong Woo) wrote articles on TD; "A Brief History of Korean Revolution Overseas" and "TD and Kim Il Sung". Several years after TD was formed, Korean Revolutionary Army and Korea Restoration Association were formed, and twenty million Korean people heard our battle-cries; tens of thousands of them joined our swelling ranks. I am proud of TD and its accomplishments.

In Search of a New Stage

Whasung Military Academy was flat broke and feeding its 100 or so students was an enormous burden. The Jung Command, jung-yi-bu, was responsible for the academy but it was having financial problems itself and failed to live up to its obligation. Whatever meager funds it collected from its supporters, the Command had to support its administrative, military and civil branches. The Command was in fact more a government body than a military organ.

Students were sent out on fund-raising missions in teams of 20. They went back to their former unit, picked up their arms and then visited other units begging for money for two months at a time. Upon return of a team, another team was sent out. The funds taken in by students teams were barely enough to sustain us for a few months. In addition, student delegations were dispatched to the Command located in Jirin for long past due funds.

Once, Director Choe Dong Oh sent an instructor to the Command HQ, hoping to get funds for the oncoming winter. He came back empty-handed. It turned out that the commander of Company C took the money earmarked for the school. This man used our money to pay for his gala wedding party. He bought food and drinks for everyone in town, and its neighboring town - with our money.

This was unbelievable and I could not suppress my anger. The Command's funds did not fall from Heaven; they came from farmers who had barely enough to feed their own kids, but managed to save a few penny here and there for independence workers. The poor farmers made great sacrifices to fund the Command. That shameless Company C commander took our blood money for his personal pleasure and comfort. How could a man like that command a company of men? It was a sign that the Command was not only inept but it was rotting from inside out.

After the Ulsa Protectorate Treaty with Japan, a Righteous Army commander marshaled a force of several hundred men at Soonchang after Choe Ik Hyon's main army was crushed by the Japanese. He was intent on carrying on the fight. But he received a report that one of his men took foods from a poor peasant by force. He was so ashamed that he disbanded his men and went into seclusion to atone for the sin of his soldier. Company C commander's misdeed was a crime against the Korean people.

Back in Lim-gang, I saw independence fighters crossing Yale and taking an ox from a farmer by force. They came back with the ox and had a feast eating it. Father gave their commander a tongue-lashing. In those days, Korean residents in China were taxed, so much money, so many bags of rice; tax collectors went around collecting taxes just as tax collectors in other nations do. The peasants had to tighten their belt to pay taxes allocated to them and they had no other recourse. It was pay up or else. Some overzealous tax collectors squeezed as much as they could over and above the allocation. Each army unit was assigned its own taxing area, but often they crossed into other units territory and collected taxes; even worse, some collectors hijacked taxes collected by other collectors.

It was a free for all; small and large independence army units descended upon poor peasants and squeezed out everything they had; they took money from the working poor; they took poor men's blood money and food in the name of patriotism. For these independence fighters, peasants were merely sources of food and money, and nothing else. The working poor were dumb obedient milk cows that were milked over and over until nothing but blood was left.

A Yi Dynasty king built Gyongbok Palace, exhausting his treasury in the process, and he was forced to collect money from people using various ingenious schemes, including road taxes. If he had used the people's blood money for a college or a factory, people's sacrifice might have been rewarded in the end.

The news of Company C commander's crime saddened all students at Whasung. It was another indication that the Command was collapsing. All we could do was to criticize and vent our anger. In this day and age, such an act would not be tolerated by anyone and such a criminal would be court-martialed or tried by his peers or soldiers. In those days, things were loose and people got away with murder. People who could not pay taxes were brought in and tortured by armed soldier-tax collectors, even though the Command had a civil department assigned to handle civil issues. Corruption in high places were tolerated.

Choe Chang Gul proposed to lead a delegation of students and visit each of the six company HQs to report Company C commander's crime. Some students wanted to expose the commander's misdeed in publications of the Command; but the problem was the publications were controlled by officers who were probably no cleaner than the friends of the offender. I saw that we were wasting our time talking about things that would not work anyway; I proposed that we should send a letter of protest to each company commander. My proposal was accepted and I was asked to write the letter of protest. It was my first written criticism of the conservative nationalists since the formation of "Down with Imperialism" Association. It was my first try at writing a protest and I was not sure if I had covered the base, but my classmates liked what I wrote, and we asked Kim Si Woo to hand it to the next courier that came around. My protest letter was duly delivered to every company HQ.

There were some reactions; Company C commander, the man who stole our money to pay for his wedding was irate; Oh Dong Jin, who defended the Command no matter what in the past, was shaken. When I met him in the following year in Jirin, Oh Dong Jin brought up my protest letter. He read it while attending a meeting of Company 6 officers. Oh said: "I was shocked to read about Company C commander's action. I thought he should be relieved of his command. People like that give our army a bad name. Oh Dong Jin was aware of the deteriorating moral of the army and lamented that there was little he could do to rectify the situation. He was sad and dejected. I cannot imagine how he felt seeing his army going down the drain, yet he could not do a thing to save it.

I felt the rampant corruption of the army was not only an agony for the new generation but also an agony for all good nationalists of all ages and stripes. There was no way one page of protest would clean out the moral and political corruption in the Command. The army had gone down too far and there was no way any one could save it. It was inept and corrupt beyond repair. The army was more interested in protecting rich men's profits than fighting for the Korean people, and it was doomed to die a slow death.

People were manhandled and squeezed for money not only by the tax collectors but also by Whasung students as well. Teams of students toured the countryside asking for 'donations'. People refusing to donate money were labeled anti-nationalistic and were threatened with violence. The students took chickens and pigs from poor peasants as 'donations'. Back at the school cafeteria, some students complained about eating millet instead of rice and the general poor quality of the food served there. Once, a student got into a heated argument with the cafeteria manager; Whang Seh Il, the student was not happy about meals of millet and mixed vegetable soup. Whang did his best to put food on the table but his efforts were not recognized or appreciated by some students, who blamed Whang for the meager meals served at the cafeteria.

After Liberation, I ran into Whang Seh Il, who was vice chairman of a county people's committee and talked about the 'good' old days at Whasung. He said that on account of his experience at the dormitory, he never complained about food when he toured countryside. I believe those students who had complained about eating millet at the cafeteria would have continued to bad-mouth foods served in the army after their graduation. People like that eventually become money-grabbing, power-mongering corrupt scourges of the working poor. Imagine students like that becoming officers after two years at the Academy and commanding a squad or a company of men. Fighting the enemy to death would be the last thing on their mind. What could one expect of an army commanded by officers like that?

I was disillusioned by the decrepit state of the army, the very foundation of our movement for independence. My unhappiness with the curriculum at the Academy deepened day by day. The Academy was not what I had expected it to be. It was clear that the Academy would never be what I wished it to be. Likewise, the school authorities were not satisfied with me and they knew that I would never be what they wanted me to be. This mutual dissatisfaction intensified with time. As I delved more and more into Marxism and Leninism, I became more convinced that the Academy was not for me.

I agonized over this irreconcilable fact. By quitting the Academy, I would be letting down all those people who had arranged me to be at the Academy. I would be betraying their faith in me. I thought quitting would be disobeying Father's will and testaments. How could I face Oh Dong Jin, who had traveled several hundreds of ri to comfort me at Father's funeral, who gave me the money for my trip to the Academy, who had talked the Academy into accepting me? How could I face Kim Si Woo, who treated as an adult? How could I tell Director Choe Dong Oh and Father's friend, Kang Jeh Ha that I was quitting? I felt so guilty about letting them down. (Photo: Kang Je Ha).

I thought about sticking it out and completing the two-year program. That would fulfill my obligation to those who had trust in me; I should force myself to accept things as they were at the Academy. What's wrong with becoming part of the army? That would make my benefactors happy and proud of me, right? There was no reason why I could not continue to study Marxism and Leninism in the army; there was no reason why I could not lead and expand "Down with Imperialism" Association; all these thoughts floated around in my head.

On the other hand, I could not bear the thought of putting up with the outdated feudalistic curriculum of the Academy, my filial obligations and IOUs notwithstanding. I felt that I was wasting my time studying at the Academy. What should I do? I could return home and take over Uncle's pharmacy business and take care of my family; or I could go to school in Simyang, Harbin or Jirin. After thinking over my options, I decided to quit the Academy and go to a middle school in Jirin. The reason why I chose Jirin for my next stop on my journey of life was that Jirin was the political center of Korean activists in Manchuria. For this reason Jirin was called the Second Shanghai, Shanghai being the political center of Koreans in China.

I wanted to break out the suffocating closed cocoon of Whajung and move on to a wider, open stage for my political activities. I wanted to spread the spirit of "Down with Imperialism" Association to a wider audience. That was the prime reason for my decision to quit Whasung Military Academy. This was the very first major decision I have made in my life, on my own. I would say my second major decision was to burn the bridge with Minsaeng Corps after the Namhodu Conference and form my own military command. I still believe that my decision was the right one under the circumstance. If I had stayed at Whasung longer, I might not have accomplished what I have achieved for Korean revolution.

When I made my decision public, members of "Down with Imperialism" Association were surprised. I told them that I wanted to carry TD Association's activities and messages to other regions; that the Association could not do much bottled up in tiny, remote Whajun; that Whasung Military Academy was not giving us what we needed; that after I was gone, they should continue to carry on Association's mission at the Academy and at whatever units they would be assigned to, after graduation; that they should reach out to the mass; that they were the charter members of the Association and they should uphold the Association charter and stay united no matter where they were. I promised to meet with some of the members in Jirin.

I discussed my decision to quit with Kim Si Woo before making it public. I asked Kim, "Sir, I am not happy at the Academy and I wish to move to Jirin and attend a middle school there. I plan to discuss this with Mother and Uncle. I don't know where I will get the money. What do you think?" Kim was disappointed, but he did not try to talk me out of quitting the school. He said: "OK, if that's what you want, I will check with my friends and see what we can do for you. All of us have our own thing and if Whasung does not turn you on, then it is not for you and you must move on." I was much relieved to hear that Kim Si Woo, who was the most pleased and enthused about my coming to Whajun, was supportive of my decision. Kim's support took a load off my chest. Kim advised me to tell Director Choe about my withdrawal nicely so that he would not be disappointed. Kim told me to stop by to see him on my way to Jirin.

My parting with Kim Si Woo was easy, but it was not so with Director Choe Dong Oh. It was excruciatingly painful. At first, he was angry at me and told me he was not happy with my decision; he told me that, "Once a decision is made, you should stick to it no matter what. How can you quit this school, after trying so hard to get here? You say we don't offer everything you desire, but where do you think you will find a school that will offer everything you want in this day and age of hardship?". He carried on, speaking his mind. He walked over to the window with his back turned toward me and gazed at the sky filled with falling snow with quiet sadness.

After an eternity of silence, he said: "If a talented student like you, Sung Ju, finds my Academy useless, then I will quit it myself". That was totally unexpected and I was speechless, dumbfounded. I felt guilty that I might have been too harsh about the shortcomings of his school and hurt his feeling. After a while, Director Choe turned around, walked to me and gently placed his hands on my shoulders and said: "I don't care what ideology one has - nationalism, communism or whatever - as long as it frees Korea. Good Luck and I hope you will succeed." He followed me to the school yard and gave me many valuable advices in spite of the raging snowstorm. I remember the snow piling up on his head and shoulders as he kept on talking. Even today, every time I recall that moment, I feel ashamed that I did not have the courtesy of brushing the snow off his shoulders.

Thirty years since that moment, I had an emotional meeting with Director Choe in Pyongyang. I was Premier and he was a member of the northern branch of Fatherland Peaceful Unification Promotion Association at the time, but it was a meeting of a pupil and his teacher. The spirit of "Down with Imperialism" of Whajun survived the Korean War and drives today's socialist revolution. Director Choe said: "Well, it has turned out that you were right, Premier Sung Ju." Upon hearing my birth name, my mind raced back to that unforgettable moment, that snowstorm of that day, when Director Choe bid me goodbye so many decades ago. His short one sentence closed the 30-year gap lapsed since that moment at Whasung Military Academy. His life was a long series of tribulations, of deep sorrows and happy triumphs.

Mother supported my decision to quit Whasung. When she heard that I was quitting, she was upset, but after hearing out my reasons, she became less concerned. She said: "I see that you are worried about your school expenses. Man cannot achieve anything if he gets hung up on money. In one way or other, you will have money for education and you should concentrate on doing what you really want. Now that you have made up your mind, make sure you take giant steps." Her words of encouragement was much appreciated.

Back in Musong, I learned that many of my elementary school friends were too poor to go on to middle school and stayed home without knowing what to do with their life. I thought I should educate and lead them to the path of revolution. I formed "Down with Imperialism" Association not long ago and I saw a golden opportunity to expand the Association in Musong. Thus, I formed "New Age Children's League" for patriotic children in Muson and surrounding regions. Its mission was to educate the young members on progressive ideologies and lead them to the path of revolution. The League was formed on December 15, 1926. The New Age Children's League was, as its name suggests, to bring down Japanese imperialism and bring a new age for independent Korea, after dismantling old customs and habits. The League was a communist organization for young teens.

The League was an important extension of "Down with Imperialism" Association. The League's main slogan was, "Let us fight for Korean independence", and its members were to study progressive ideologies and propagate them widely among the people; I placed on the table various tasks and methods for discussion. I set up League chart, organizational structure and membership standards. I managed the League until I left for Jirin.

I helped Mother set up "Anti-Japan Women's Association" on December 26, 1926, on the basis of my experience in setting up "Down with Imperialism" and "New Age Children's League". After Father passed away, Mother became active in anti-Japan activities. She traveled to distant villages and towns and taught young Korean women and girls Korean language and revolution. She was, of course, active in Muson as well.

On my way to Jirin, I stopped by Whajun to see Kim Si Woo, as promised. He wrote a letter of recommendation to Kim Sah Hyong, another friend of my father. The letter asked Kim Sha Hyong to help me get in the school. That was my last meeting with Kim Si Woo. He was the most impressive person of all of my unforgettable persons. He was a man of few words, but he had done many things for Korean independence; mass enlightenment, education of the young, arms acquisition, fund raising, local guidance and protection of operatives in Korea and Manchuria, delivery of secret documents and confidential materials, activities to unite warring factions within nationalist camps. There was no area he was not involved in.

He had helped Father in many ways and also, he had helped me in more than one way. It was he who stood watch for us and was the happiest at the night when I formed "Down with Imperialism" Association. After our final meeting, Kim Si Woo continued to run his Youngpoong Mill and supplied food to the army and helped Korean students in the region. During the Civil War in China, he was the chairman of Whajun Revolutionary Committee, and protected Korean people and properties in Whajun against Japanese and Chiang Kaisek's troops.

Kim Si Woo returned to Korea in 1958. He told no one about his lifelong, countless activities for Korean independence, and so I did not know his whereabouts. He was down with an incurable disease in Junchun and only a few days to live, when at last, he told his children about his work with my father and I. His son was surprised and asked him, "Why haven't you contacted General Kim, who would be happy to meet you again? General Kim is in our town right now doing onsite guidance, and it is not too late, why not see General Kim now? If you cannot move, we will invite him here to see you."

Kim Si Woo chided his son: "The reason why I told you about my past is not for you to benefit from it; I wanted you to know of your heritage and stand behind General Kim. Don't waste even a minute of General Kim's time. He has many important things to do." Such was the obstinacy of that old warrior. If his son had his way, Kim Si Woo and I would have met in a happy reunion; but to my greatest regret, it was not to be. Whenever I recall my days at Whasung Military Academy and "Down with Imperialism", I always remember Kim Si Woo. I cannot think of my Whajun days without thinking about Kim Si Woo.

Kim Si Woo was the most supportive of "Down with Imperialism" Association during my Whajun days; he was the man who supplied me books and ideas on new ideologies. Thanks to sincere and honest people like Kim Si Woo, the Association was able to grow into an invincible power it is today.

I started on my long journey to Jirin full of hope, anticipation and determination, knowing that the Korean people counted on me.

Lee Gwan Rin - The Indomitable Heroine

When I came home to Musong after quitting Whasung Military Academy, I noticed that only a few independence activists came to our house, in a sharp contrast to the crowd of visitors who came to see Father day and night, when he was alive. I felt deserted and lonely. One of the unforgettable persons from my Musong days is Lee Gwan Rin. She came to stay with Mother after Father passed away. Oh Dong Jin suggested to her that it would be nice if she stayed with and help out Mother; after all, Father had done a lot for Lee. Thus, Lee moved in with Mother and helped her, while working for South Manchuria Women Education Association.

Lee Gwan Rin was audacious and bubbly; she was versed both in martial and literary arts; she was unusually good-looking, mild-mannered and courageous beyond comparison; there had been no other woman warrior like her in Korea. In the age of feudalism, young women were expected to hide their face outdoors, but Lee Gwan Rin wore man's pants and went around on horseback. It was quite a site to behold and people stopped and watched her in disbelief, as if she came from another planet. (Photo: Lee Kwan Rin).

After a few days, I sensed that she was not quite herself; she seemed to be subdued, worrying about something. She was shocked to hear that I quit Whasung, a place that had a long line of people wanting to get in. It was incomprehensible to her that I threw away such a golden opportunity. But when I told her the whole story why I had to quit the school, she wholeheartedly supported my decision. I saw that something else was troubling her; I thought my action to reject a nationalist school and embrace a new ideology was heavy on her mind; I believed her bright mind saw the end coming to the old-time nationalist movement and the independence army. Mother told me that Lin had changed quite a bit. She was not the bubbly woman she used to be.

At first it was surmised that Lin was going through the depression of an old maid of her age. She was already 28 at the time. In those days, girls as young as 14 or 15 were married off, and an unmarried maiden of 28 was considered too stale for marriage. Women like Lin, who had missed their prime marriage eligible ages, were justifiably concerted about their old age. After several days of watching her pining her days away, I could no longer contain my curiosity and asked her pointblank: "Miss Lin, how come are you so sad and gaunt in face?"

Lin sighed deeply and said: "Oh, I am getting older and older, but things are not working out for me.

When your father was alive, I could easily walk 100 to 200 ri in a day, but after his death, I don't feel like doing anything; even the revolver I carry with me is about to rust. I don't know where to turn. It looks like the army is not going to achieve anything; the army is a mess. The old men at the top seem to hang around in fancy uniforms and don't bother to check what their men are doing; the soldiers are more interested in starting a family than fighting the enemy; they spend more time chasing after girls than enemy soldiers. Just a few days ago, a soldier in his fighting primes got married, quit the army and moved to Gang-dong. I can understand a guy getting married, but throwing down his gun after marriage does not make sense. Everybody is looking to desert the army. The army is losing people left and right, and who is going to fight for Korea? I don't understand how they can be so insincere."

Now I understood what was bothering her. She sacrificed her prime years fighting for Korea and it made her sad to see men in prime years deserting the army for easy family life. It was lamentable. Women with education went around in fashionable dresses and makeup, but old Lin carried a heavy six-shooter and crisscrossed Yalu killing the Japanese. There were not many cases in the history of Korea of female warriors in men's uniforms, who carried weapons and did actual combat with our enemies. That is the reason why I wrote a whole section dedicated to her life story. In those days of feudal Korea, when women were mere chattels, it was inconceivable for women to carry revolvers and fight the enemy.

It is true that throughout our history, Korean women fought our enemies, thought in different ways. On thing that stands out is that women's fight was fought to defend their feudal ethics virtues, chastity, in reactive manners. When the Japanese came and pillaged Korea, many Korean women fled to mountains and temples to escape being raped by the invaders; those who could not escape chose to kill themselves than to be befouled by the enemy. During the 1592 invasion (Imjin), more than 30 times as many women died than men, which shows how patriotic Korean women have been.

When Choe Ik Hyon, the Righteous Army leader, starved himself to death in Taiwan, his wife mourned her husband's death for three years as the custom required and then killed herself to accompany his soul. One might say that her loyalty and devotion to her husband was commendable and filial. However, there is a problem here: if everyone committed suicide, then who will defeat the enemy and defend Korea?

As our society woke up from its long dark feudal era, Korean women's outlook and attitudes changed. Instead of fighting the enemy by hiding from them or committing suicide, they joined men in marches against Japanese guns and bayonets. Some women threw bombs at Japanese installations. But, no woman, other than Lee Gwan Rin, fought the Japanese hands-to-hands for over ten years.

Lee was so beautiful that a horde of suitors following her around. She could have become a teacher or married a rich man and led a comfortable life, but she chose to dedicate her life to nationalist causes. Her father owned a small farm, a forest and a large 10-room, though straw-thatched, house. He was middle-income and made a comfortable living. When Lee was 12, her mother died and two years later, he married a 16-year old girl, barely two years older than Lee was. She could not bring herself to calling her "mother"; and her father planned to marry her off at age 15, he had no plan to let her continue her education beyond that. Lin could not take it anymore and left home at age 15.

While her father was gone on an errand, Lee sneaked out to Yalu and left her clothing and shoes by a hole in the ice to make it look like she had committed suicide. Then she went to a distant relative's house in Yiju. Some of her relatives got together and helped her enroll in Jangsil Institute. After half a year of hardship, she wrote her father asking for tuition money. After she left home, her father found her clothing by the ice hole and assumed she was dead; he had been crying ever since - until he received her letter. Overjoyed, he rushed to Yiju to see her and assured her that he would never interfere in her life; he promised to pay her tuition as long as she wanted. Lee did not have to worry about her tuition any more and concentrated on her school work. She did well and her teachers recommended her to the prestigious Pyongyang Girls Technical School.

After a year or two at the school, her eyes were opened to world affairs and she joined Korean People's Association on my father's recommendation. She became an active founding member of the Association. Father taught her Righteous Aspirations; Lee was active among students at Pyongyang Girls's School, Sungsil Middle School, Sungwi Girls School, and Kwangsung Institute. One day, she came to Mangyong-dae on an excursion and stopped by our house; she had lengthy discussions with Father and helped Mother with house chores. On those days, when the weather was good in Spring, students from Sungsil and Kwangsung packed up a lunchbox and came to Mangoyng-dae on picnic; there was no easy transportation and they had to walk long distances.

When March First Movement broke out in Pyongyang, Lee was in the vanguard of the marchers and fought valiantly. When a march was blocked by the Japanese, she returned to her dormitory to rest and recoup, and went out to lead a new march. After the Movement failed, she went home to hide from the Japanese, hunting down march leaders. That was when she became a fulltime activist for independence. She was convinced that she could not continue her school while Korea was no more. At first, she was active as the general director of Kwangje Youth Corp, which was set up by Oh Dong Jin.

Even prior to her move to Manchuria, Lee shot and killed two Japanese police in Korea. She dumped her victims into Yalu, through a hole in the ice. Her heroic exploit was a big news. Soon after she joined the independence army, she was sent on a fund-raising mission, when she was arrested. The Japanese began to search her. She had a pistol hidden in the bag she was carrying on her head and the Japanese police wanted her to open the bag. Pretending to comply, she whipped out her gun, marched the startled police to a bush nearby, and shot them dead.

On her many travels for independence, she had run into many hazardous situations. Once, she was in South Pyongahn Province on a fund-raising mission for Oh Dong Jin. After completing her mission, she and an operative were on their way back to the base, they stayed over at a lodging for the night. Armed bandits tried to rob them; between Lee and her companion, they had several hundred won, a large sum of money in those days. The bandits fired guns in the air and threatened to shoot them, whereupon Lee's companion handed his money to the bandits and begged for mercy. But not Lee; she hollered at her would-be robbers and scared them away by her sheer behavior.

Even though there were quite a few female fighters in my guerrilla army, none compared to Lee. Early in her life, she studied sewing and embroidery at school, but later, she became a fearless warrior for independence. Newspapers such as Dongah-ilbo and Chosun-ilbo raised much ado about Lee's feats. She was strong-willed and fearless. In the aftermath of the March First Movement, Korean nationalists tried to form a united front in south Manchuria.

There were numerous Korean nationalist factions, each jockeying to dominate other factions; people paid a lip service to a united front, but no one knew how to unite or lead the factions. Father thought that the best way to form a united front was to get the nationalist leaders behind it, and decided to start with Yang Ki Tak, hiding out in Seoul. Father needed a reliable person to get Yang out of Korea; after a great deal of considerations, Father picked Lee Kwang Rin for the mission. Lee sneaked into Seoul carrying a letter to Yang. (Photo: Yang Ki Tak).

Yang Ki Tak was an influential nationalist; he was born to a scholarly family in Pyongyang. Early on, Yang became active in patriotic mass enlightenment and education activities. Yang was the first Korean to compile Korean-English dictionary and led the fight to force Japan to pay for our national treasures. He was in jail for several years for his involvement in the "105" affair; he was a member of New People's Association, sin-min-hoe, Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, and chairman of Korean Revolutionary Party. He and Oh Dong Ji established Jung Military Command, jung-yi-bu, in Manchuria. He was respected by all Korean nationalist factions.

Lee Kwang Rin was arrested by the Japanese in Seoul and locked up in Chong-ro police station. She was tortured by the police; hot pepper powders were shoved into her nostrils; sharp needles were stuck under her finger nails; she was hanged by her arms behind her back from a ceiling; he was forced to lie on her back with a wooden plank placed over face, and her torturers stood and stomped on the plank. Her torturers wanted to know if she came from China, from Russia, what her mission was. She was beaten and stomped on, days in, days out. She was threatened to be burned alive; the police brought in kerosene and lit it on fire. But, no matter what the Japanese did to her, Lee did not break and insisted that she was only a jobless wonderer; that she came to Seoul, hoping to find a maid's or a servant's position with a rich family. She demanded to know why they were torturing an innocent woman. After one month of fruitless tortures, Lee was let go.

Lee could hardly move her body, but she managed to escort Yang Ki Taek to Hunggyong. Upon arriving at Hunggyong, she collapsed and became seriously ill. Her comrades tried to nurse her back to health as best as they could, but her health deteriorated. They brought in an old medical doctor to examine her. After taking her pulses, the old doctor pronounced that he needed to examine her uterus. The old man probably had an evil design for this famous beauty. Lee was shocked by the old man's outrageous move and demanded to know what he was up to. He told her that she was pregnant, upon hearing this, Lee took off her body belt and exposed her belly, shouting to the old doctor: "Look at me, you old bastard!"

"Are you trying to take advantage of this young woman who has taken up arms to fight the enemy? Let me hear your diagnosis again." The old doctor ran away, bare-footed, for his dear life.

Such was the pluck of this woman warrior. Father entrusted her with critical missions and Lee carried out her missions with no complaint; she went to Pyongyang and to Seoul many times for Father; she promoted women's rights for Father. She accompanied Father as his bodyguard and his personal aid on his missions. She journeyed tens of thousands of ri; Yiju, Sakju, Chosan, Kanggye, Byokdong, Hoerying, Haeju and other regions of Korea. There was virtually no place in Korea that her feet did not touch. She was the first single woman to roam Mount Baikdu.

She dedicated her prime years, which she could have spent in comfort and pleasure, in hardship and sufferings for Korea, serving in the independence army. It made me sad to see her spirit wane; she saw the falling out of Korean nationalist movement and was dejected; she saw no hope for Korea. As I got ready to move to Jirin, she told me that someday, she would go to Jirin and do something useful there, too. But, she never made it. I met Lee in Jirin twice at Son Jung Do's house. She wanted to hear my take on the world situation. I gave her a long speech on the status of our revolution. Although she told me she liked my idea of revolution, she stayed loyal to Jung Military Command, jung-yi-bu. Lee was sympathetic to communism but she remained a leftist nationalist.

Lee's agonizing over the declining Korean nationalist movement pained me; numerous patriots, like Lee Kwan Rin, gave up everything and joined the nationalist movement. But they were by and large leaderless and wasted their energy and life on meaningless activities; they had no clear direction to follow; "Down with Imperialism" Association was in its infancy and was not ready for her. She was loved and trusted by Father, but after his death, Lee lost her anchor and lived confused and in agony; once again, I felt the crying need for an effective, unifying leadership. Lee's laments enforced my conviction that it was up to the new generation of Korea to take the torch of revolution and independence.

I left for Jirin determined to accomplish my aspirations. Half a century passed since I met Lee Kwan Rin in Jirin. During this long time span, I kept on searching for her. There were a number of 20-ish female guerrillas in my army; every time I saw them fight side by side with men, I thought of Lee. Where was she? What was she doing? Not knowing if she was alive or dead agonized me and I had done my best to track her down. After Liberation, I searched for her in her home village of Sakju; but there was no Lee Kwan Ju there. She had disappeared in thin air.

It was in early 1970 when I finally found her. The Party historians discovered that she lived in China and that she had a son, a daughter, and several grand children. Some of Lee's comrades, such as Gong Young and Park Jin Young, became communists through "Down with Imperialism" Association and joined our revolution and died fighting for our cause. But, Lee failed to find a leader to lead her and had to abandon her fight for independence. When Oh Dong Jin was alive, Lee rallied to his leadership and worked hard to implement the Kwanjun Manifesto for mass revolution. In the Summer of the year (1927) I left for Jirin, Lee, Jang Chul Ho and others pitched a tent village in Naedo-san and started potato farming and mass enlightenment activities. Oh Dong Jin may have wanted to make it a support base for nationalist movements.

Unfortunately, Oh Dong Jun was captured by the Japanese and his movement fell apart. Oh Dong Jin was the most progressive of the left-wing nationalists and his fall was the death toll for reconciliation and a united front. There were some leaders in Jung Military Command who were sympathetic to communism but they had no influence. After the three major commands of Korean nationalist armies were merged into a united command, National Command, ultra-right-wingers took over and communism was banned. The new command betrayed leftists to the Japanese police or assassinated them. Lee Kwan Rin was fingered a leftist and went into hiding. She went from one hiding place to another; finally, she gave up and married a Chinese and raised a family. To pour salts on her wound, even her marriage did not work out.

Lee Kwan Rin appeared in the skies over Manchuria like a shooting star and put fears in the enemy ranks; she became the "Flower of the Independence Army", "the Joan of Arc of Korea"; but she faded away. Allegorically speaking, she boarded a wooden ship called Nationalism on a long voyage, but the wooden ship was too fragile for the incessant, violent waves of the ocean and there was no way the ship could complete her voyage. At first, the ship had many passengers aboard, but most of them abandoned the voyage and sought to live in comfort pretending to be moving toward their goal. Those elite who "represented" Korea became merchants of business or escaped into monkhood. At least, these people, though they had gotten off the ship, did not betray the voyagers. Some of Lee's comrades betrayed our cause and became Japanese collaborators.

Lee Kwan Rin returned to Korea after half a century of misery in a foreign land. After learning that Kim Il Sung was in fact Kim Sung Ju, the son of Kim Hyong Jik, she wanted to come back to Korea. She thought that Sung Ju would realize his father's dreams for Korea and wanted to see the new Korea before she died. Every night, when she laid down to sleep on her pillow and gazed at the stars in the sky, she wept silently for Korea. Yet, she was hesitant to part company with her beloved family in China. She had a son and a daughter, and several grand children. It was not easy for her, in her twilight years, to leave her family behind and travel ten thousands ri to Korea alone. Eventually, she made up her mind to come back to Korea. It took a strong-willed woman like Lee to make such a far-reaching, heart-breaking decision. Only those who have wept, laughed and spilled their blood for their country can understand her decision.

When I heard that she was coming back to Korea, leaving her family behind, I was deeply moved by her patriotism. She was only 28 when I parted company with her in Musong, but now she was a gray-haired woman of 80. There was no trace of the famed beauty maiden who pumped up young men's heart. After having searched for her for over half a century, there she was bent over and ravaged by time beyond recognition. I hated Mother Nature that had consumed her; I was sad.

I found her a comfortable living quarter in the center of Pyongyang and had a maid and a doctor to care for her. The place was close to the school she attended in her youth. Secretary Kim Jong Il made the arrangement for her, making sure that she had all the comfort and conveniences - furniture, kitchen utensils, heating, cooling, lighting and refrigeration. In spite of her poor health, Lee raised corn in her front yard; she remembered, after 50 or so years, that I loved corn and wanted to cook me corn meals using her own home-grown corn. When I was in Musong, she would roast corn for me and my brothers.

In consideration of her services to Korea, her prime years sacrificed for our independence, we gave her a fine funeral upon her death and interred her body in the Martyrs' Cemetery. Those who truly love Korea and their countrymen, no matter which corner of the earth they may be, will return to the land of their forefathers and the place where they were born. Although their paths and ours may be different, our paths will cross sooner or later.

Ahn Chang Ho's Lecture

In February 1927, the Korean community of Jirin was seething with unprecedented excitement. Ahn Chang Ho, the most notable independence activist and a key figure of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai came to town from Beijing. Ahn was received with pomp that even a head of state would envy.

I joined the welcoming party singing "Rise Up for Korea" (guh-gook song), which was composed by Ahn himself after his escape from Japanese-occupied Korea. The song starts with "I am leaving, I am leaving, I am leaving you behind..." and ends with "...Do not feel sorrow over my leaving, my beloved Korea." This song became popular among Korean youth and students after Korea was annexed. It was also popular with Korean exiles and the song was known as "Song of Exiles". The song was loved by many Koreans and its composer was honored and respected. (Photo: Ahn Chang Ho, 1878-1938. Dosan, meaning 'island mountain' was his penname.)

Many people thought Ahn was of presidential caliber and even the leaders of Independence Army hostile to the Shanghai government respected Ahn as the senior nationalist leader. Ito Hirobumi, Japan's architect of Korean colonization, thought so highly of Ahn that he had offered to set up a cabinet under Ahn, provided that he supported Japan's policies for Korea.

Ahn was born in Gang-suh, South Pyongahn Province, famous for giving birth to many noted patriots. Today, it is famous as the cradle of Chul-ri-ma movement, Chung-san-ri patriotism and methodology. Ahn believed that the main reason why Korea was lost to Japan was that the Korean people were backward. He formed Gongrip Association, New People's Association (sin-min-hoe), Youth Alumni Association, Korean People's General Association, Hungsa Corps and other independence activist organizations. In addition, he established educational institutions such as Jungjin, Daesung and Taehguk; he started the Independence News paper for mass enlightenment.

Lee Sung Hun was one of the independence leaders, best known for his educational activities including Ohsan Institute. Lee's zeal for education was duly recognized by the King of Korea, Yoong-whi, who invited Lee to a royal audience. During the 400-year rule of the Yi kings, this was the first time a commoner met a king face to face. Such was Lee's fame in Korea. Ironically, Lee began his career as a traveling salesman peddling brassware, bent on making quick bucks. His wealth grew and grew to 500,000 won, an astronomical figure in those days. One day in Pyongyang, Lee heard Ahn Chang Ho's lecture on how education would nurture our strength and eventually free Korea; Lee was so impressed by the lecture that he cut off his hair-knot and began his own educational activities. Ahn's famed eloquence changed Lee's life, which illustrates how fiery and persuasive Ahn's oratorical skills were.

Ahn's arrival in Jirin was headlined by Dongah-ilbo, Chosun-ilbo and other newspapers in Korea. A delegation of youth and students went to see Ahn at his hotel, Sampoong, and begged him to give them a lecture. Various independence activists supported the students' request and Ahn readily agreed. Ahn's impending lecture on the current status was widely publicized; large posters were tacked on walls on Sangbu, Charu, Tongchun, Hanam, Bukdae, Uma and other streets of Jirin. Korean expatriate in Jirin were excited about the oncoming lecture by the famed nationalist; "Did you know Master Ahn is in town?" became the common greeting among the Korean residents of Jirin. (Photo: Ahn Chang Ho, an orange picker at Cornelius Rumsey's orange grove in Riverside, California, in 1904. Ahn came to America as a farm worker in 1902.)

The night before his lecture, Oh Dong Jin met me and discussed Ahn Chang Ho for several hours. Oh was emotional about meeting his former teacher of Daesung Institute, after 17 years in a foreign nation. Oh recalled how kind Arn was to him when he applied for the school, and the helps he had received from Ahn while attending the school. Oh still remembered the "Marching Song of Young Students" composed by Ahn and sang it for me (Lee Wha Rang note: click <http://www.independence.or.kr/warsong/warsong6.htm> to hear this song).

Oh respected Ahn Chang Ho very much and told me how hard Ahn had been working for Korea. Oh said Ahn's oratory was exceptionally effective; my father told me about this, too, several times. I heard about Ahn when I was in Mangyong-dae; Ahn's independence work started with a speech and without his oratorical skills, he would have been less effective. I was told that Ahn's speeches were so enthralling that even servant women and housewives were sold on his ideas and donated their gold rings and hairpins to the cause of independence. Would that be true? If so, how does he do it? How nice it would be, if he stayed here in Jirin instead of Shanghai or America.

Oh Dong Jin told me, "After our independence, I will vote him for Presidency, if I had the opportunity". That talk by Oh made me more eager to hear Ahn speech next day. The event was held at Daedong Public Hall in front of Joyang. Ahn eulogized Doctor Ra Suk Ju first and began his much awaited lecture. It was a memorial service and a lecture on the current status of our independence movement combined. In attendance were leaders of the three major independence army commands who came for the memorial service and local nationalists, students, youth and other concerned citizens. The meeting hall was packed full and many had to stand outside listening in.

Ahn's lecture was titled, "Future of Korean National Movement", and he lived up to his fame. His eloquence was met with wild applause from the packed audience. He cited from his erudite knowledge of ancient and modern history of the world and pointed to the road ahead for the Korean people. However, I found problems with his themes. He said that the primary reason why Korea was taken over by the Japanese imperialists was that Korea was backward, and the reason why Korea was backward was due to the defective character and low level of morality. In order to free Korea, the Korean people must correct these shortcomings. Every Korean must endeavor to be moral and civilized. His other theme was Korea must be developed economically.

Ahn's thinking was influenced by Tolstoy's self-salvation theme and Gandhi's self-purification theme. At the time, world-wide depression was setting in and people lived in fears of unknown and terror; Fascism spread like a forest fire and innocent people were being massacred by the Fascists. Petit bourgeois intellectuals kowtowed to the military might of the imperialists and came out with their ingenious spiritual escapism - nonresistance, the last safe haven for those weak in revolutionary conviction and courage. They had no will to resist reactionary forces and the best they could do was quiet submission to the naked force.

In Korea, non-resistance appeared in the form of reform movement. After the March First Movement, some nationalist leaders deserted our revolutionary path of armed struggle for independence and became pacifist reformers and enlightenment educators; they worked to improve educational, cultural, moral and economic levels of the Korean people. Korean intellectuals educated in modern science and technology promoted 'use made-in Korea only' and economic development in Korea by Koreans. " They shouted "Let us live on what we make" and promoted self-reliance and sufficiency. Cho Man Sik was the leader of this movement; Cho wore only traditional clothes made in Korea; he used papers made in Korea for his business cards; he wore shoes made in Korea.

Author Lee Kwang Soo's thesis, "National Reformation", played important roles in spreading the gospel of reforms in Korea. This thesis brings up highlights and dangers of Korean reformism. The most disturbing thing about this thesis is its premise that the Korean people are inferior. I knew Korea was backward but never thought the Korean people were second-class denizens of the world community. The Korean people built world's first ironclad warship and invented metal fonts for printing; they are ethical and intelligent people; they have made significant contributions to Eastern civilization; they have long track records of achievements; any nation would be proud of. Korean people's courageous stands against foreign invaders, in spite of all odds. Korean people's mores is as pure as fresh snowflakes.

It is true that our habits and customs have some shortcomings, but they are only secondary and incidental, not flaws in our basic national character. They must be viewed in proper perspectives. Lee Kwang Soo's thesis implied that Korea went down because the Korean people were inferior in character. I would say Korea's demise was due to our corrupt, inept leaders and not due to any intrinsic defects in our national character. Lee's thesis echoed Japanese imperialists' view of the Korean people. The Japanese looked down on the Korean people as an "inferior" race, needing protection, guidance and governance by Japan.

"National Reformation" was Lee's way of publicly submitting to the Japanese imperialism. For this, his prior records of anti-Japanese activities were forgiven and he was allowed to write romance novels right in front of the Governor General's office in Seoul. In the early days, Lee the novelist was popular among the mass, because he delivered what the mass liked to read. Lee, a prolific writer, is justifiably the father of modern Korean novels. Lee's novels hinted at national character reformation, but this thesis brought it out in the open. Many nationalist leaders became reformists and raised money for reform activities. They raised money to build a Korean university, but the Japanese squashed the plan, fearing that such an institution might become a hotbed of Korean nationalism.

The "Koreans for Korean goods" movement was stopped by the Japanese. The Governor General would not allow the Korean people to boycott Japanese products. The non-violent movement was labeled anti-Japanese and suppressed ruthlessly. The reform movement to strengthen Korean economy and people appeared patriotic and nationalistic in principle, but in practice, it was led by non-violence advocates with little stomach to face down the Japanese. The notion that by developing Korean economy within the limits set by the Japanese and that one could build up our national power to break the Japanese grip on Korea was a ludicrous pipedream. That Japan would not allow any development that would bury her interests in Korea is the most elementary of elementary common sense. How can such naiveté be interpreted?

The reformists-turned nationalist leaders either failed to see the true nature of imperialism or opted to look the other way. Their abandoning military means for peaceful cultural activities signified their defeat and submission; they wanted to coexist with colonialists and accept the status quo. Peaceful coexistence and compromise would inevitably lead to betrayal of our nationalism. In fact, numerous nationalist leaders left independence movement, after becoming reformists; many of them became Japanese collaborators and turned against their former comrades in arms.

Ahn Chang Ho's "power development" or "preparation" theme was a variation of reformist "self-strengthening" theme. Ahn said that the Korean people were the least spiritual in the world and that until the Korean people attain spirituality on par with that of the people of America or England, no independent Korea would be feasible. I saw that the majority of the audience agreed with Ahn's premise; many in the audience were so moved by Ahn's speech that they wept openly. I must say everything Ahn said dripped with his love for Korea.

I realized that Ahn's theme contained seeds of self-destruction of our independence movement; I was disappointed. I thought he had some good points but there were some major problems. I agreed with Ahn that every Korean must be educated and achieve higher status of awareness and that such would make us strong. I strongly disagreed with Ahn's claim that the Korean people were the least spiritual; I also did not buy his assertion that reforms would empower the Korean people. Reforms are good and necessary, but it is no substitute for our revolution. Ahn wanted to replace our revolution with reformism. Reforms do not automatically bring independence, yet Ahn had nothing to say about how his reforms would lead us to independence. He did not say a word on military actions for independence.

It was not clear how developing economics in Manchuria would help the Korean independence. Who would let state-less people build power generation plants and farms in Manchuria for the Korean people? Would the Japanese allow such activities? Of course, not. I could not stand it anymore and jotted down some questions on a piece of paper and passed it to Ahn. I asked: 1) "You said that we must nurture our strength by developing our economy and education our youth, but how can you do so while Japan controls Korea?"; 2) "You said that the Korean people have the lowest spirituality in the world. In what way?"; and 3) "You mentioned America and England for Korea to emulate. Do we must emulate them? Can we count on their assistance for our independence?"

My piece of paper was passed along to a student in the front seat, who handed it to the master of ceremonies. The rebel in me made me to write the notes, but when I saw the master of the ceremonies looking in my direction with a look of disturbance, I had some second thoughts. I was afraid that if Ahn got offended by my questions, Ahn's fans in the audience would get upset with me. Furthermore, Oh Dong Jin, who had worked so hard to arrange for Ahn's appearance, would be offended by my impunity. I did not plan it that way. My only intention was to force Ahn to pause a moment to reflect on his theme, that I believed would do us harm. I hoped that he had something new in his sleeves that might be revealed to us at this time.

But unanticipated events developed. Ahn stared at my questions for a long time and asked the master of ceremonies a few questions. I was to learn later from Rev. Son Jung Do that Ahn asked who Kim Sung Ju was. After that, Ahn's speech lost steam and became flat. His mind was elsewhere and he cut his lecture short. Ahn was visibly upset by my questions and did not respond to them as I had hoped. The audience left the lecture hall, bewildered and disappointed by Ahn's unexpected behavior. [Lee Wha Rang note: According to Ahn Chang Ho's own account, he cut short his lecture on "The Only National Party" on the tip that a Chinese police raid was imminent. It was February 14, 1927.]

Another unexpected event unfolded at this moment. Several hundred Chinese military and civil police surrounded the lecture hall and arrested more than 300 attendees. Ahn Chang Ho, Hyong Mook Gwan, Kim Lee Dae, Lee Gwan Rin and many other nationalist leaders were also arrested. This mass arrest was engineered by Gunitomo of the Governor General's police bureau in Seoul. Gunitomo showed up in Bongchun at about the same time Ahn arrived at Jirin. Gunitomo asked Yang Wo Jung, the Chinese military police commander to arrest the Korean communists gathered for a meeting in Jirin. Under Yang's order and Gunitomo's direct guidance, the Chinese security forces of Jirin conducted house to house searches of Korean residents and the unprecedented mass arrest at the lecture hall.

We were angry at the Chinese action. Even though Ahn's lecture fell short of our expectations, his arrest caused general indignation in Jirin. The mass arrest occurred right after my questions and this coincidence bothered me. Chiang Tzolin, the warlord of Manchuria, signed the Mitzuya Agreement and agreed to work for the Japanese and suppress Korean nationalists in Manchuria. Japanese reward money for captured or dead Korean nationalists spurred Chinese reactionaries on a witch hunt for Koreans.

I convened an emergency meeting of 'Down with Imperialism' Association and discussed measures to free the captives. We visited with the captives themselves and asked for their assistance; but they had no bright ideas. We stressed that we must unite and mobilize the mass, and work together. Some nationalist leaders wondered how we could fight the heavily armed Chinese police and asserted that the best route was to bribe the officials. They did not think much of the power of the mass. I told them to trust the power of the people united and properly motivated. We held a mass meeting at Rev. Son Jung Do's church; attending the meeting were nationalist leaders, concerned Korean expatriates, youth and students.

We informed them what had expired: the Chinese officials, under Japanese command, had arrested Korean patriots and innocent people, and that the Chinese were about to hand them over to the Japanese for reward money; once in Japanese hands, they would be tortured and imprisoned. We appealed to the attendees to stand united and work together to free our compatriots. Some people wondered why I would strive to free Ahn, after what I had done to him. I told them I objected his ideas only and that I had nothing against him in person; Ahn was a fellow countryman and a noted patriot; how could we leave him in jail?

I had questioned Ahn's lecture because I wanted to shake up his toadyism (flunkeyism) and national nihilism; I wanted them to break out of their reformist illusion and stand on the firm ground for independence movement. The reason why we fought nationalists ideologically was not to destroy them but to enlighten them ideologically so that they would join the united front for independence movement. After the mass meeting, numerous posters denouncing the Chinese officials appeared on walls and powerline poles: the posters said: "Chinese police have arrested innocent Koreans", "Chinese officials should not take orders from the Japanese", "Free the Koreans in prison now!" We sent letters to various Chinese newspapers for publication. Youth and teenagers demonstrated in front of the military police station shouting for immediate release of the prisoners. The Chinese officials, after 20 days of our mass protests, released Ahn and all other prisoners.

I was happy to see Ahn freed and was proud that I had something to do with his release. I went to see Ahn, hoping to clear the air. But he left Jirin right after his release. I have no way of knowing what was going through his mind on his way to Shanghai. I believe Ahn realized that his theme for independence was faulty. His unwavering patriotism to death attests to this belief. That was the last time I saw Ahn. Some ten years later, while conducting armed raids in Mount Baiktu region, I heard the news of Ahn's death from Japanese tortures. I was sad that Ahn, a lifelong patriot and independence activist, did not live to see free Korea.

That was not the end of my relation with Ahn Chang Ho, however. Although Ahn Chang Ho was gone, his younger sister, Ahn Sin Ho, joined our camp after Liberation. She became vice chairwomen of the Korean Democratic Women's League. Upon my return to Korea, I was informed that Ahn Chang Ho's sister lived in Nampo. Comrade Kim Gyong Suk worked in Nampo in those days and I asked him to find her. A few days later, I received a message that she had been found, whereupon, I phoned Kim and asked how she was. Kim said: "She carries the Bible day and night. She is a devout Christian".

I believed that she, being Ahn Chang Ho's sister, must be a patriot, too, although she believed in Christ. I told Kim to take care of her and guide her well. Kim replied that he would, but his words sounded hollow. In those days, our Party workers saw Christians through colored lenses and distrusted them in spite of my admonitions otherwise. Several months later, Comrade Kim informed me that Ahn Sin Ho had become an active member of the Party and that she carried her party membership card in her Bible. I was happy to hear that.

Ahn Chang Ho's spirit of patriotism lived on in his sister. Every time I saw his sister at work, I could not help but recall Ahn Chang Ho's lifelong fight for Korea and all the sacrifices he had made for the Korean people. Kim Gu, who fought communism all his life, met Ahn's sister when he came to Pyongyang to attend the North-South leadership conference in 1948. Kim Gu never dreamed that communists would embrace a younger sister of the most prominent member of the Shanghai provisional government. Years ago, Kim Gu fell in love with Ahn Sin Ho, and they were engaged to be married at one time.

Our faith in Ahn Sin Ho was our faith in Ahn Chang Ho. Patriotism transcends one's religion or ideology. All Koreans live in the same community tied together by our common bloodline. We are inseparably tied by our love of Korea, of the Korean people, to our forefathers and elders who had fought for Korea in their own way, to the best of their ability.

Our faith in Ahn Sin Ho is our expression of respects to all those who loved and fought for Korea.

The United Front of 'Three Commands'

Generally speaking, the 1920s saw major moves toward an alliance of Korean independence activists. Progressive nationalists were concerned about the future of Korea and many patriots realized that the only way to free Korea from Japanese occupation was to get united and pool all resources. They worked hard to form a united front. After the October Socialist Revolution in Russia and the March First Movement of 1919, there sprouted numerous anti-Japan groups and organizations. In 1920, several workers' groups got together and formed the Korean Workers and Farmers Alliance. Nationalist groups formed their own alliances for joint anti-Japan actions.

In 1927, communists and nationalists joined to form an alliance, Sin Gan Federation, and mustered a membership of several tens of thousands. After Korea was annexed by Japan, anti-Japan groups sprang up everywhere like so many weeds after a spring rain. By this time, the main stage for Korean activists had moved from Siberia to Manchuria, and naturally, efforts to form a united front were focused on the groups active there. By 1925, anti-Japan groups gravitated into three major groups: Jungyi Command (jung-yi-bu), Sinmin Command and Chamyi Command. These commands, however, acted independently. (Lee Wha Rang note: the Korean word 'bu' stands for a 'seat of power' or a 'governing body'. Three 'bu's were in all practical purposes governing bodies that collected taxes, ran schools and welfare programs. But their primary function was military - recruiting, training, equipping, and conducting military operations.)

The three commands carved out a territory and behaved like medieval fiefdoms. They refused to work together and became easy prey to the Japanese. Japanese troops massacred Korean residents at Hunchun, Honggyong and Gomaryong, and bought out Chinese warlords in the Mitzuya Agreement. These events struck major blows to the independence fighters. After suffering major defeats in Bong-oh-gol and Chung-san-ri battles at the hands of Korean troops, Japanese poured in reinforcements into the border regions and conducted scorched-earth campaigns against the Korean people. For each Japanese killed, 10 innocent Koreans were executed. (Photo: Gen. Hong Bom Do in the Bong-oh-gol Battle).

Lee Wha Rang note: In June 1920, the Japanese 19th Division mounted a major offensive aimed at wiping out the Independence Army based at Bong-oh-dong. Hong Bom Do, commanding a force of 700 men, scored a major victory over the Japanese at the Battle of Bong-oh-dong, in which his troops killed more than 120 Japanese troops. Four months later, Hong commanded the First Regiment of the North Route Army of the Korean Provisional Government at the Chung-san-ri battle, Gen. Kim Jwa Jin commanded the Second Regiment and Gen. Choe Dong Jin commanded the Third Regiment. The battle raged from October 21st to 26th in the vicinity of the Paikdu Mountain. There were at least 10 major clashes. The Azma Unit of the Japanese Army had 5,000 men equipped with canon and heavy machine guns. In contrast, the Koreans had 700 men, 4 machine guns, 500 rifles, 1,000 grenades and 20 horse-wagons. More than 1,000 Japanese were killed or wounded in this famous battle. After the Chungsan-ri fiasco, Japanese Kwangtung Army, Expeditionary Army in Siberia and garrisons in Korea were rushed in to crush the Korean armies.

Such barbaric actions broke the back of the victorious Korean armies and forced the faction-ridden nationalists to seek a united front.. Ever since the formation of the three Commands, progressive leaders tried hard to forge them into a single unified command. The three commands were more interested in expanding their territory and fighting each other than fighting the Japanese. Koreans killing other Koreans was too painful to watch. In the Summer of 1925, I saw my father presiding over a meeting of nationalist leaders in Musong. The three Commands were represented at the meeting. The meeting moved from Musong to Malrihuh and to Yangji village and lasted ten days. They discussed how to form an alliance and agreed to form National United Front Promotion Committee.

The Committee held numerous hearings to form a consensus among the leaders for a self-governing body of the Korean expatriates in Manchuria and a united army. They met at various sites. Then an unbelievable, stranger than fiction event, the Wangba Incident, occurred. Kim Dong Sam, Choe Dong Oh, Hyong Muk Kwan, Lim Byong Mu, Kim Don Gul, Lee Youn Gul, Song San Ha and other leaders of the three Commands met in Sinahntun to discuss alliance and cooperation. Sinahntun is located some 30 ri southwest of Gilchang railway. It was one of the three remaining political hotbeds in Manchuria (Honggyong and Whajun were the others). The Japanese police were tipped off about the meeting and sent five spies to the village. The spies watched the meeting, pretending to be snapping turtle hunters, until they were detected and captured by the village youth. The captured spies were killed and their bodies were tied together and thrown into Songwha River.

The Japanese Consular police in Jirin told the Chinese authorities that innocent Japanese were murdered by Koreans and demanded a joint investigation of the murder. This information was secretly relayed to the meeting attendees by Oh In Wha, an interpreter working for the Chinese, whereupon the meeting was adjourned and the attendees left the area in a hurry. This incident became known as the Wangba Incident, 'wangba' means 'snapping turtles' in Chinese.

The National Alliance Promotion Committee worked to overcome not only the obstacles placed by the Japanese, who feared any alliance of Korean activists, but also the rampant factionalism within each of the three Commands. Jungyi Command was split into a 'go alone' faction and a pro-merger faction; Sinmin Command was split into a military faction and a civilian faction; and Chamri Command was split into an anti-merger and a pro-merger faction. The factions within the Commands fought for supremacy and eventually split the commands. Kim Dong Sam, Lee Chung Chun, Lee Jong Gun and other anti-merger leaders left Jungyi Command. Likewise, Kim Jwa Jin and Whang Hak Soo led the military faction away from Sinmin Command.

Jirin was the favorite meeting place of the Committee. There was a rice mill called, Bok-hung-tae, located in Jirin. The mill was operated by a Korean and its office became the living quarters and the meeting place for Korean activists. People from northern and southern regions of Manchuria stopped by there as a way station. It was crowded everyday. It was here that the Committee met burning midnight oil. This mill was located near my school (Yukmoon Middle School) and I daily dropped by the mill and mingled with the attendees. The mill owner was a nationalist sympathetic to communism. He made living by charging for refining rice, that is, separating bran off rice grains. He made a comfortable living.

One day, the mill owner introduced me to the meeting attendees: "Folks, this is Kim Hyong Jik's son". I met Kim Jwa Jin, Kim Dong Sam, Sim Yong Jun and other bigwigs attending the meeting. The owner jokingly said: "Sung Ju's ideology differs from ours". I replied smiling: "Oh, no. You should not put it that way. You all want Korean independence and I, too, want it. How can our ideologies differ?" They said: "Well, we hear that you are a socialist". I thought it was an opportune moment to do some communist propaganda and said: "In this day and age, young people all over the world are pushing communism. Why should you object young Koreans pushing communism? If we do not accept new ideas and cling to the old instead, how can Korea advance? You and I are of two different generations, two different eras, and if you block or ignore the young generation's aspirations, Korea will not be helped." The old leaders shot back: "We don't want to stand in your way. Do you plan to overthrow us?" I told the old veterans that was not our intent and did my best to put their unfounded concerns to rest. I ran into this kind of questioning several times later.

I anxiously waited for the news of merger agreement, but the negotiators were in no hurry and dragged their feet. After a few days of hanging around the meeting place, I got to see how the old leaders lived and worked. They were from another era, long gone. There was a hotel called Sangpoong. located outskirt of Jirin, near Joyang Gate. When merger meetings broke for rest, the Command leaders went there to draw up plans for their next move. Near the hotel was Rev. Song Jung Do's chapel, which doubled as our recreational meeting place. I spent hours there on weekends and got to observe the old veterans staying at the hotel. Their room had a well-used chessboard, which the hotel proprietor made specially for the veterans in order to keep them occupied. The venerable veterans spent days arguing amongst themselves and playing chess games.

The hotel manager bent backward to accommodate the old men to the point of going bankrupt; he bought the best-grade rice from Tae-poong-ham rice mill and somehow managed to hustle up scarce meats, fish and tofu. In addition, the old men were fed noodles during the night so that they could enjoy their all-night chess games. The hotel owner's daughter told me that all these services were provided free of charge. She said the old men kept her busy asking for cigarettes and drinks - all gratis. She told her mother; "Mom, three months of free-loading by these old men and we will go belly-up and we will be out in the streets begging for foods." Her mother was angry at her and said: "Look here. These guests fight for our country and they deserve to be served. Soon they will be leaving us to do battle with the enemy. Don't you ever talk like that again!"

But doing battle with the enemy was the last thing on these old men' mind. They locked up weapons, bought with money collected from the working poor, in their armory and idled away arguing and playing chess games through the nights. When they saw me coming, they would open a ledger book and pretend doing something useful. The old men did not wish to be seen as a bunch of lazy bums to the youngsters. There were days when the old men threw filthy epithets at each other, pounding the desk with clenched fists. The stumbling point was which faction would manage the united front. One faction claimed that it had the longest track records and so it should be in charge; another faction claimed that it had the largest territory and people and so, it should be in control. Each faction fought to dominate others. After a day's of shouting and screaming at each other, the old men would eat and drink together all night long.

On one Sunday, I ran into a man, said to be the finance minister of Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, at Tae-poong-ham rice mill. He and associates had been in Jirin for months attending the merger conference. He readily mingled with young people and appeared progressive; the man even used some progressive terms. I called him "Master" with respect and confided my inner thoughts to him. On that day, after chit-chatting with him for a while, I sputtered out some words critical of the provisional government. I said: "The people in Shanghai are more interested in defending their stinking dunghill and getting a fancy title than caring for Korea or the Korean people. How can you talk about patriotism? Doesn't that hurt your conscience? A fancy title here means little more than lording over a handful of poor peasants. Why fight over empty titles?"

The man did not know what to say for a few moment and then lost his temper and screamed at us, "That is an outrageous insult to me. How dare you say such things to a government minister? So, you are against me? Ok, you are right and we are wrong, is that it? If that's the case, I will shame all of us together!" Whereupon, he started to take off his cloth. His intention was to run into the street stark naked and bring shame to all Koreans. His rational was that since he was shamed by us, he would shame all Koreans in retaliation. In my life, I have met many, many people, but none quite like that man from Shanghai. He was a 'government minister', but he acted like a weird bum with some marbles missing. We did not want a Korean government 'minister' running around naked in the streets of China; it would have been a disgrace to the Korean people; we restrained and forced him to be clothed.

On my way home, I resolved not to associate with anyone like that man from Shanghai. How can anyone, who responds to constructive critiques by jumping out of cloth and exposing his naked body to foreigners, achieve independence for Korea? A grownup acting like a child and exposing his belly button to get "even" with his critics! How can a guy like that be in politics?

The Shanghai provisional government was not popular in Manchuria. Many Korean activists in Manchuria were critical of factionalism and toadyism of 'government' leaders in Shanghai; they were not happy about their misuse of funds collected for military supplies. The provisional government collected 'head taxes' and 'special taxes for independence' from Korean expatriates, and in addition, they handed out 'government appointment' papers to rich Koreans; they collected so many won for 'governor', so many won for "county chief", so many won for "minister" and so on. Every imaginable office in Korea had a price tag and for sale.

While the nationalists were haggling over their turf, the Japanese took advantage of the rifts in the Korean ranks and planted informers everywhere. Nationalist leaders became sitting ducks for the Japanese hunters. The most tragic and devastating was the capture of Oh Dong Jin. A Japanese informant, Kim Jong Won, told unsuspecting Oh Dong Jin that Choe Chang Hak, a rich gold mine owner, wanted to meet him to discuss money matters. Oh was told that Choe was ready to donate a huge sum of money. Unfortunately, Oh took the bait and was captured by the Japanese near Mount Hongyoong. Oh's capture hit me hard and I could not eat or sleep for several days.

Adding to the tragic, Oh Gyong Chun, Oh's son, was killed in a fire at a Jirin movie house. I jumped in and dragged him out of the fire, but it was too late. After losing her husband and her son at about the same time, Oh's wife lost her mind. The two tragedies were too much for her to bear. We did our best to care for her, but she passed away. While Oh Dong Jin was fighting for his life in a Japanese court of law, the old men at the merger meeting wasted time arguing and having daily drinking parties. We the young Koreans of Jirin were not amused by their actions.

After capturing Oh Dong Jin, the Japanese saw an opening and went after other leaders. Oblivious to what was happening around them, the old leaders went on business as usual. One day I witnessed a strange unreal scene: for some reason, the old veterans decided to run around with sand bags strapped on their legs in the courtyard of the rice mill. I don't know what they were thinking; it appeared that they were trying to show their martial prowess. I felt sad. On the eve of Japanese invasion of Manchuria and daily deterioration of our independence movement, our so-called leaders were running around with sandbags.

I could not stand it any more and told the old men: "Sirs, I am sure you are aware of the gravity of the situation after Oh Dong Jin's capture. While the Japanese are grabbing and killing our leaders left and right, you are still here talking. Is this the right thing to do? We the young Koreans in southern, northern and eastern regions of Manchuria beg you to stand and work together for Korea. We beg you to merge the three Commands now." Our pleadings fell on deaf ears and the old men continued their old ways.

I cannot express in word how disappointed and helpless we felt about the old leaders' ineptitude. Korean communists were too busy with factionalism and did precious little for Korea; the nationalists, even though they had some military muscles, were also immobilized by factionalism. We had to come out with something to shock them out of their stupor. We decided to stage a drama, a satire on the fractional fights among the nationalist leaders. It was called "Three Men, One Team". When the stage was all set, I went over to the old men and extended our invitation: "Sirs, we have a special entertainment for you. You have been working so hard for so long and deserve a break." They were happy to accept my invitation and we walked over to Rev. Son Jung Do's church.

Photo: Rev. Son Jung Doh and his daughter. His church was the main meeting place of Jirin Korean expatriates; young Kim Il Sung attended Rev. Son's Sunday services while studying at a Jirin middle school.

The drama was preceded by several song and dance routines. At first, the old men clapped their hands laughing and enjoyed the show, until it came to the scene of three actors jostling for a seat. It dawned on the old men that the drama was pun on them and they left angry at us screaming, "You are bad people. How dare you defame us like that? You, Sung Ju, are no good." Early in the morning next day, I went to visit the old men as if nothing had happened. I asked them: "Sirs, why did you leave in the middle of our show? You have to see a show in whole to appreciate it. Right, sirs?" The old men blew their stack and came at me: "You defamed us last night. Why?"

I spoke my mind: "Sirs, what was so defamatory? You have been arguing with each other for so long now and we thought that, perhaps, a satirical drama might carry our message to you. The drama expresses what young Koreans feel and want. Don't you think you should know what we the young Koreans and the Korean people in general want?" This finally got through the old men and they said: "You are right. We must do something; otherwise, how can we face those people?"

Shortly thereafter, the old men agreed to form a united front, National Command (guk-min-bu). However, the 'merged' command included only Jung-yi Command's pro-merge faction, Sinmin Command's civilian faction, Chamyi Command's Sim Yong Jun faction. Other factions refused to join this coalition and set up their own alliance - Provisional Reform Federation (Hyok-sin yihoe). Instead of one united front, there were two opposing camps. National Command was a name only and the old men who had joined it refused to give up their old ways and continued factionalism.

This is how the old nationalism died; the old men refused to change with time and consumed themselves in self-inflicted wounds of fractional turf war. They had no intention of leading us into battle fields against the Japanese; rather they were more interested in ego trips and defending their dunghill. These leaders had never believed that the Korean people could free Korea on their own.

The time had come to take the torch away from the old generation. It was our turn to carry on. I believed that only the communist youth of Korea could lead our new nationalism.

Cha Kwang Soo's Chosen Path

Whenever I recall my days in Jirin, I see many unforgettable faces, but Cha Kwang Soo's face remains one of the freshest. It was Spring of 1927 when I met him for the first time; Choe Chang Gul, my Whasung Military Academy classmate, introduced Cha to me. Choe, upon close-down of the Academy, was assigned to a Jungyi Command post in Samwon-po, Yuha Province.

One day a runner from Choe's unit delivered a message to me. The message said that a Cha Kwang Soo would be looking for me and that Choe would be coming to Jirin. Several days later, I gave a talk at the Jirin YMCA and on my way home, a bespectacled-man with his head noticeably tilted to one side suddenly stepped in front of me and bluntly asked me if I knew Choe Chang Gul. I told him that I knew him, upon which he extended a hand for handshake. His name was Cha Kwan Soo. He said little and let me do all the talking. He kept on asking various questions. After a while he walked away and disappeared without saying much. (Photo: Cha Kwang Soo).

Some time later, Choe Chang Gul showed up in Jirin as he said he would in his message and looked me up. Jungyi Command was headquartered in Jirin and a company of soldiers was assigned to guard the HQ. Choe, using the occasion of doing something with the HQ Company, came to see me. I told Choe that I had met Cha and that Cha did not open up to me; and that his first impression was not good. Choe said he had the same problems with Cha the first time he met him.

Choe assured me that Cha was really a nice man and related how he met Cha. One day Choe's company commander received an intelligence report from the HQ about a communist agitator, a teacher at Yusuha School. The company commander ordered Choe to arrest this man immediately. Choe was well aware of how communists were treated by the army and dispatched his most trusted soldiers to fetch Cha for interrogation. The soldiers were served dinner at the lodging where Cha was staying. The soldiers deemed the meal beneath their status, especially after finding dead bugs and few rice grains in their rice bowls. The soldiers were used to much better meals and felt insulted by the owner of the lodging, and began to dress down the cowering owner. At this point, Cha stepped in defense of the owner.

Cha told the soldiers: "This man has not seen a single kernel for days and living on grass. He borrowed rice from his landowner just for you. If you want to fault anyone, why not fault his landowner? You should not be angry with this owner, who had done the best he could for you." The soldiers stopped yelling and fell silent embarrassed. They were sent to arrest Cha, but they left without him and reported to Choe Chang Gul that Cha was no communist; the soldiers swore that Cha was a patriot. Choe met Cha himself and found Cha to be a honest patriot.

I took Choe's word and accepted that Cha must be a real McCoy. About one week after Choe left Jirin, Cha reappeared from nowhere and told me that he had done some sightseeing of Jirin and asked me how Korean nationalists and communists could be united. Earlier, Chiang Kaisek had betrayed Chinese communists, and Korean communists debated hotly if they should work with Korean nationalists or not. The question had become the touchstone for separating opportunists from real believers of communism. Cha's question was apparently meant to determine where I stood. The truth of the matter was that Chiang's betrayal had put Chinese communists in a bad shape. Until the betrayal, Chinese communists were making tremendous advances, which were driven, among other factors, by the alliance of Chiang's nationalists and communists.

Since the 1920s, Chinese revolution waged effective campaigns against Chinese reactionary forces. Starting in Summer of 1926, Chinese revolutionaries, shouting such slogans as "Down with Imperialism!", "Down with Warlords!", and "Purge Feudal Powers!", marched north and occupied Hunan, Hobei, Gansi, Poching (Bok-gun) and some other provinces; the victorious revolutionaries occupied key cities along Yangtze River; they attacked Chiang Tzolin's warlords, who were supported by the Japanese imperialists.

The workers of Shanghai waged three heroic uprisings and seized the city. Citizens of Nuhan and Gugang occupied the British section. Workers went on general strikes in support of the revolutionaries. Peasants and workers, risking their lives, joined the revolutionary ranks. At this point in time, Chiang Kaisek broke the nationalist-communist alliance and joined the reactionary camp, he purged communists from leadership positions and held secret negotiations with imperialist powers to curry their favors. If Chiang had not perpetrated this betrayal, Chinese revolution would have achieved a great deal more and conflicts between Chiang's nationalists and communists would have been avoided - said Cha with much indignation.

Upon securing Kwangdong revolutionary base and successful execution of Northern Expedition, Chiang Kaisek established a military dictatorship and mounted Fascist terror campaigns against his former communist allies; he faked the Jungsamham incident in March 1926 in order to drive out Chou Enlai and other communists from Wangpao Military Academy and the First Army. In March 1927, Chiang forcibly disbanded Namchang and Gugang organizations that supported Sun Yatson's Three National Principles. On March 31 that year, his forces attacked a mass meeting in Chunking and murdered many innocent citizens. On April 12, 1927, Chiang's forces committed barbaric atrocities against Shanghai citizens; the atrocities spread to other regions. Chinese communists had suffered stunning setbacks. Some Korean communists asserted that the Chinese case showed the danger and futility of working with nationalists. This was what Cha had on his mind.

It had been my position, since the inception of 'Down with Imperialism' Association, that Korean nationalists and communists must work together. I told Cha: "It is true that some Korean nationalists have yielded to Japanese pressure and are promoting 'self-rule' and 'reformism' for the Japanese, but the great majority of Korean nationalists and progressive intellectuals, both in Korea and abroad, are working for Korean independence. Korean nationalists have withstood the most cruel and barbaric acts of the Japanese and yet, stay firm in their faith in Korean independence. Therefore, we must join hands with nationalists and patriotic capitalists." I believe, then and now, that Korean nationalists were the first to get on the stage of independence activities and had played key roles.

In the beginning, Korean nationalism sprang up to protect Korean people's interests, a progressive idea. In the years when the Yi kings were helplessly rolling downhill, when foreign troops occupied Korea, and when imperialists forced their way in, it was Korean nationalists who rose up to defend the nation; it was they who had lit the torch for mass enlightenment, and promoted "self-rule and independence", "defend nation and protect people", "expel foreign devils, expel Japanese". It was a natural phase in our history that Korean nationalism came forth to defend Korea and the Korean people against foreign powers, which used Korea a pawn in their power games.

That fact that Korean nationalism was led by newly emerging Korean bourgeois does not mean that Korean nationalism was capitalistic in ideology. Labeling it so would be unfair. The bourgeois nationalism opposed feudalism and fought for the common interest of the Korean people and the Korean bourgeois. Later on, as capitalism developed in Korea, some nationalists had become instruments of oppression and exploitation by capitalists. It is important for us to understand that there were Korean nationalists who did not work for capitalists and who worked for the Korean people. To lump all nationalists in one single category is a grave error.

We are opposed to and wary of bourgeois nationalism, but we support and welcome genuine nationalism. Why? Because genuine nationalism is based on patriotism, and patriotism is shared by Korean communists and Korean nationalists. Patriotism makes it possible for communists and nationalists to walk on the same path as comrades. Love of Korea and the Korean people runs in both camps and it binds communists to nationalists. In the past, genuine nationalists fought to modernize Korea and free Korea; they did this because they loved Korea. They had achieved a lot and done much for Korea.

Today, Korea is divided into North and South, under different laws and ideologies, but the belief that Korea can be united is shared by both communists and genuine nationalists; both are driven by patriotism. Korea is one nation and genuine nationalism is patriotism; patriotism is genuine nationalism. In this sense, I am a communist and a nationalist. I have held this belief all my life, since my student activist days till today.

I emphasized to Cha Kwang Soo that genuine nationalism must not be mixed with bourgeois nationalism. They were two different animals. After hearing me out, Cha grabbed my arms and said out-loud "Sung Ju!" I believe it was not my oratorical skill that moved Cha, but rather, it was my practical down-to-earth analysis of the situation at hand. After this, Cha began to open up to me. He was a changed man. Until then, he had been a man of few words and I did most of the talking. But now, words came out of his mouth in torrents.

Cha was quite a man. He was seven years older than I was and had studied at a college in Japan. He was an excellent writer and orator. He was kind and sociable, and many young Koreans followed him. His young followers vied with other to be the most expert on Marxism. Kim Chan, the Whayo ("Tuesday") communist faction boss, was no match for Cha when it came to Marxism. Cha used to think that Kim Chan was a Marxism scholar, but after having seen him a few times, Cha rated Kim Chan not much better than a middle school pupil of Marxism. Sin In Young of the other communist faction, Suh-sang, fared no better; Sin turned out to be a junior league when matched against Cha Kwang Soo.

Cha's head tilted slightly to a side when he walked. When he was a child, he had a growth on his neck that forced him to tilt his head. Even after the growth was gone, this habit stayed with him. Cha was born in North Pyongahn Province. He was noted for his unusual brightness by the villagers, and at the tender age of ten he went to Japan to study on his own, working to support himself. That was when he was exposed to Marxism-Leninism; he read extensively and became interested in communism. Cha's life of working and studying at the same time, with no help from anyone, was extremely hard. Communists in Japan at the time was in chaos. Soon after its formation, key leaders of Communist Party of Japan were arrested in June 1923. In addition, white terrorism against communists spread all across Japan after the Kando earthquake that destroyed Tokyo. After that, opportunists took control of the Party and eventually brought the Party down.

Cha felt that Japan was no place to study Marxism or plan any socialist actions, and so, he returned to Seoul, Korea, where he met so-called Korean communists. Cha learned that the Korean communists were more into factionalism than communism; there were so many factions fighting for the control of the Party that it was difficult to see who was who. Cha studied the themes put forth by the factions and soon found that the Korean communists were short on Marxism and long on egoism. What made the factions different had nothing to do with any ideology or political agenda, but had everything to do with personality.

The most disgusting event Cha remembered from his Seoul days was the Nak-yang Restaurant (rak-yang-gwan) incident. 'Tuesday' and 'North Wind' faction leaders met at this restaurant to bury their hatchets and merge. Upon learning of this peace confab, 'Seoul' faction members, fearing an uneven playing field, surrounded the eatery and broke up the meeting, whose attendants were beaten. Several of the attendees were seriously injured, and to make the matter more disgusting, the injured men filed lawsuits in a Japanese court of law against their assailants. After this incident, each faction formed its own terrorist gang. Cha Kwang Soo could not believe his eyes; how could communists be so stupid and stoop so low? Cha could not take it any more and left Seoul on his way to Manchuria. Cha figured that surely communists in Manchuria, being so close to Russia, would be more genuine and enlightened.

By the time Cha reached Manchuria, Korean communists announced "Jungwoo" declaration, whereby the factions would air their themes in public debates and achieve some kind of consensus and unity. The faction leaders asserted that open public debates would be good in getting the mass behind communism. But the sad fact of the matter was that such open public debates benefited, not the Korean people, but the Japanese police detectives. Soon after the formation of Communist Party of Korea, 'Tuesday' faction and 'Seoul' faction fought over the control of the Party. In a show of force, 'Tuesday' faction made public a list of its 72 members on newspapers; in effect, they were so blinded by factionalism, they handed the Japanese police the names of key communist leaders. The Japanese wasted not time and arrested the communists on the list. Most leaders of 'Tuesday' faction ended up in jail because of their stupidity. In spite of this bitter experience, the Korean communist factions wanted to hold public debates! It was unbelievable.

Cha Kwang Soo saw a parallel between 'Jungwoo' declaration and Hukumoto movement of Japan. After the mass arrest and collapse of Communist Party of Japan, Hukumoto asserted that through public debates, genuine communism believers could be separated from opportunists, and then the Party could be rebuilt with genuine communists. Hukumoto was a factionalist bent on splitting communists in Japan and had done enormous damages to the labor movement of Japan. Cha Kwang Soo saw that the Korean factionalists had copied Hukumoto's theme verbatim; Cha spat on the Korean factionalists and moved away from them. Thus disillusioned by Korean communists, Cha became a village school master in Yuha and taught Marxism to his young pupils. He was set to lead a quiet teacher's life in a remote village. That was when Choe Chang Gul discovered him.

Cha told Choe that he had been looking for someone to lead him to the correct path of struggle; Cha was walking alone in a foreign land under freezing rains hoping for a Messiah. After telling me his life story, Cha said: "Hi, Sung Ju, can we trust and love each other and promote communism together? Without fractional hegemony?" It was as if Cha found his salvation after years of wandering in a desert. I held his hands and told him: "We the youth of Korea must unite in one mind and follow the correct road of revolution." Cha confessed that when he heard about me from Choe, he thought, "Well, how much can a middle school kid know about Marxism or do anything about Marxism?" Cha joined 'Down with Imperialism' Association soon after our talk.

That Summer, I sent Cha Kwang Soo to Sinahn-tun, a small village created by Korean patriots. It was to be a model village to be replicated at other sites. It was one of the few Korean villages in Manchuria primed for political activism. If we could educate and recruit the peasants of the village, we would be well on our road of revolution. I gave Cha that task. When I told him to go to that remote village, Cha was aghast. He had just left the isolation of a remote village in search of a wider arena and was reluctant to go to another remote isolated village. He asked me in half jest and half earnest, "How come you are sending me to another boondocks, when I just left one? People go to Seoul, Tokyo, Shanghai and other cosmopolitan cities for politics and some even find these cities too confining and hit the international stage. How much can one accomplish in a remote village?" Cha opposed old ways but he could not break clean of the old mold.

I explained to Cha: "It is wrong to think that you can revolution working in a large city only. We must go where people are, be it a city or a village. The majority of the Korean people are peasants; the majority of the Koreans in Manchuria are peasants, too. There will be no revolution unless we have the peasants with us. Unless we work with the peasants, we will be unable to mobilize them for independence activities. Without the peasants on our side, there will be no communism in Korea. After graduation, I will work in villages myself."

"Hanging around with Communist International does not make anyone a communist. The reason why communism is international is because unless the working class of the world unite, the united capitalism of the world cannot be shaken. If we fulfill our tasks for national and international revolution, then we would be recognized and supported by the world parties, and our independence movement will be helped."

"Most people today have their eyes focused on the big picture; they leave villages for towns, leave towns for Seoul and leave Seoul for world stages. They want to move up in order to be recognized and put their names on the book. We want to move in the opposite direction; we want to move from cities to towns, from towns to villages. We want to be with our workers and peasants."

"We must move down, not up". Cha repeated this phrase to himself over and over. After some moments of reflection, Cha pounded the desk with his fists and shouted: "That is truly an eye-opener!" Thanks to Cha Kwang Soo, 'Down with Imperialism' Association now had a Marxist theoretician, who could stand up to any Marxist scholars. Since then, Cha was with us for three years and shared our trials and triumphs. Cha laid the foundation for youth and students activism, revolutionary indoctrination of the people; he made invaluable contributions to formation of anti-Japan military organizations. His name is indelibly inscribed in revolutionary places such as Sinahn-tun, Gangdong, Gyoha, Gohyu-soo, Kayun, Ohgaja and Yuha

Cha Kwang Soo helped place Korean villages in Jirin region on revolutionary footing; after Jirin, he spread his revolutionary zeal to other regions: Yuha, Kayun, Goyu, Ohgahja and regions in central Manchuria; he rallied comrades Kim Won, Geh Young Chun, Chang Wul Wha, Park Gun Won, Lee Jong Rak, Park Cha Suk and others. Cha spent his last days forming anti-Japan armed units in Ahndong. Cha had a mass appeal and was well received by the people wherever he went. His education, cheerfulness and openness made him popular with the people. Cha's lectures on social science were popular with young students. He gave many lectures and taught numerous songs to lowly peasants.

Sinahn-tun was Cha's favorite village; he taught at Gilhong school for some time and stayed with the school principal's family. He worked to indoctrinate the village women, youth and peasants, and formed Anti-Imperialism Youth League, Peasants Association, Women's Association, and Children's Association. Until then, the village was under the influence of Korean nationalists and communist factionalists, who came to the village now and then, talking about "proletarian revolution" and other fancy words to a bunch of feudal peasants. Consequently, the village elders did not want anything to do with socialism or communism. They would not touch communism with ten-foot poles and Cha was shunned at first by the villagers.

Cha rented a room from a villager and invited a select group of village elders for harmless chit-chats and refreshments. Soon, Cha had converts and these converts worked on other villagers. They used lines like: "We live in a rotten world now. The only way to get out of this hell-hole is to get rid of landlords. Right?" There was no fancy communist slogans or terms mentioned. After getting the elders' trust, Cha went after the rest by conducting evening classes, giving lectures, singing and dancing with the villagers. Soon the villagers volunteered that socialism of Cha's kind would be welcome and joined Cha's bandwagon in droves. Once Cha was firmly rooted, I spent weekends in the village and worked with him. In order to throw off prying eyes of the enemy, I change into peasants wears in the millet and corn fields outside Jirin. I got to know Cha very well and likewise, he got to know me well.

One day, Cha came to see me in Jirin and took me to a park for a walk. After we sat down by a tree, he whispered to me that there was a man called, Huh Yul, in town whom we should keep an eye on. Cha said Huh had been a revolutionary since his school days. He came to Jirn to study law at Jirin College of Law, but he had to drop out because of money problems. Cha was concerned about Huh because he thought Kim Chan sent Huh to Jirin. I was surprised to hear that. Kim Chan was a noted Korean communist, one of the founding fathers of communism in Korea. He served as the propaganda chief of the first communist party in Korea and had played a key role in forming the second communist party. He escaped to Shanghai and established Shanghai branch of Communist Party of Korea. Kim was representative of 'Tuesday' faction and the real founder of Manchurian General Bureau of Communist Party of Korea.

The reason why Kim Chan sent his man to Jirin was because he had some designs for us. The news of our communist activities in Jirin spread to far places and many eyes were on us. Seeing that we were onto something, they sent their best talents to Jirin to influence us. Kim Chan himself came to Jirin several times and contacted young students there; he gave several lectures. I had attended one of his lectures myself. I heard that a Marxism guru was to give a lecture in town and went to see Kim Chan with Cha Kwang Soo, Kim was staying at Lee Gum Chun's house near Daedong Gate. He talked about some gibberish on how to apply Marxism to Korea; we left him disappointed.

In his lecture, Kim claimed that his faction was the only true Communist Party of Korea and talked evils of other factions; he asserted that Korean revolution was for Korea's toiling mass only and so, only workers and poor peasants should carry out the revolution; no non-proletarian classes were welcome. It was clear to me that Kim's line of argument would harm our revolution by confusing the mass and I was determined to counter Kim's grotesque assertions. Cha Kwang Soo agreed with me and confessed that he worshipped Kim Chan without realizing what he really was.

Korean communists were divided into various factions, each faction tried its best to recruit young Korean to its camp. A man called Ahn Kwang Chun, from "ML" faction came to Jirin wearing a white Korean cape. He claimed that he was the boss of Korean Communist Party and tried to muscle in. At one time, he served as general secretary of "ML" communist faction and he ego was sky-high. There were people in Jirin who actually worshipped him as "the Marxist guru". Cha Kwang Soo told me that Ahn was in fact a noted Marxist theoretician and so, I went to see him several times, hoping to learn some lessons from him. Ahn, like Kim Chan, was an eloquent speaker.

His opening statements made sense and the audience was impressed; but as his lecture progressed, his true character became more and more evident. His statements were derogatory of the common people. He claimed that Communist International or some big brother nation would communize Korea and therefore, there was no need for the Korean people to struggle for revolution. "Korea is a small nation and the Korean people should work for other communist parties and in time, they would take care of us. Why should we shed our own blood for revolution? Let others do it for us." I found his thesis totally out of touch with reality. I concluded that Ahn was another communist opportunist and told him that his assertions were nonsensical.

I said to Ahn: "Sir, you seem have a low esteem for the common people. Why do you mess with communism? Why did come to Girin and urge the people to join revolution?" I also told him that there was no way a handful of Marxists could achieve revolution on their own without the mass behind them and that it was a sheer fantasy to think that foreign nations would achieve independence for us. Ahn shrugged off my critiques saying that I was too young to understand and that I should face the fact and accept the truth. Ahn left Jirin. That was the last time we took him seriously.

Korean communist factionalists shouted such ultra-left opportunist slogans as "Korean revolution is a proletarian revolution!" and "Let us first build Korean socialist state in Manchuria!" as well as such ultra-right opportunist slogans as "Korean revolution is a bourgeois democracy revolution and its primary objective is Korean independence!" and "National bourgeois must lead our revolution!". Some communists claimed that in a country like Korea, where political situations were unsuitable, although ideological struggles were feasible, but no political movement was possible. Some people claimed "independence first, revolution second!" Some shouted hyper-revolutionary slogans such as "Let us oppose capitalism and achieve worldwide proletarian revolution!" and spread mass confusion.

Sin Il Yong was another Marxist theoretician, who Chan Kwang Soo and I debunked. We had met many Korean communists and found that, without exception, they were fame-seekers and petit bourgeois megalomaniacs; they were seeped in toadyism and blind dogmatism. I told Cha that Kim Chan might be famous to some people, but he was nevertheless a worthless factionalist and therefore he should be shunned; I told him that we should not be fooled by people's titles or reputation, instead we should examine what they believed in and where they stood on mass movements. Cha Kwang Soo said that he thought it would benefit our nascent communist revolution if we had support from people like Kim Chan; but now, he realized that it was wrong. Cha said he would cut ties with Huh Yul immediately.

I did not agree with his position on Huh Yul. If Huh Yul was tainted head to toe with factionalism, I would agree with Cha's position. However, if Huh went astray temporarily, then we ought to correct his mistake and bring him into our camp. I decided to meet Huh myself. Several days later, Cha led me to Gandong village where Huh lived. We crossed Songwha bridge and walked toward Donwha to Mount Yongdam. The village was nestled at the foot of this mountain. We had formed Anti-Imperialism Youth Association there and planned to turn this village into another Sinahn-tun. I found Huh Yul honest and sincere. I decided that he was too valuable an asset to be wasted away in factionalism. I told Cha to work with him and I, too, worked with him in various ways.

Huh Yul did not let us down. He was sent to plant the seed of factionalism, but he became an ardent fighter against factionalism; he turned his back on his former mentor Kim Chan. Huh joined "Down with Imperialism" Association and was instrumental in bringing revolution to Gandong. Later on, Huh Yul became a key leader of Anti-Imperialism Youth Association and Communist Youth Association.

Lessons of Wanchungmun Massacre

In the Autumn of 1929, National Command (gukmin-bu) convened a conference of East Manchuria Youth Association and South Manchuria Youth Association for the purpose of merging the two. Leaders of National Command wanted to unite youth activities in light of the merger of "Three Commands" (sam-bu). They wanted to eliminate factionalism and form a unified organ, Korean Youth Federation, to coordinate all youth activities. What they really wanted was to place all youth and student activities under National Command.

Since we were not associated with either of the two youth organizations and were not obligated to be present at the conference. However, we did not want National Command to dominate the conference. Also, Korean communist factionalists had many followers in both East and South Manchurian Youth Associations, and we feared that the conference might cause more breakups than union.

Upon arriving at Wangchungmun, I looked up Hyon Muk Kwan. After National Command was formed, Hyon moved from Jirin to Wangchungmun. He was glad to see me and said the National Command had great expectations of me at the conference. He asked me to stay at his house for the duration of the conference, so he and I could discuss future youth activities. I appreciated his generous offer but declined and stayed with Kang Hong Rak, a distant relative on my mother's side. Hyon's house was crowded with people setting up the conference and I felt it was not the right place to be.

[Lee Wha Rang note: Hyong Muk Kwan (see photo at left) was born in 1886 as Hyon Ik Chul (Muk Kwan was his penname). He served with various anti-Japanese organizations in Manchuria, until his capture in 1931 by the Japanese. He served a 7-year prison term and went to Shanghai after completing term. On May 7, 1938, he was shot and killed, while attending a meeting with Kim Gu, Lee Chung Chun and Yu Dong Yul. His assailant Lee Woon Whan worked for a pro-Japanese group headed by Park Chang Se. Kim Gu gave Hyon a state funeral.]

Kang Hong Rak was a leftist nationalist intellectual and taught at Hwahung Middle School. Hwahung was a political indoctrination school for Korean Independence Army just as Daesing Middle School was in Eastern Manchuria. The problem was that no matter how hard the school teachers tried to instill nationalism, most graduates turned into communists. Kang Hong Rak's wife was Oh Sin Ae, a good-looking modern woman. She was a good singer, known as "Songbird" in southern regions of Manchuria.

National Command opened a preparation meeting of the youth representatives in town and appointed a steering committee. Choe Bong and several other friends of mine were on the committee. Choe and I went back to my Whasung Military Academy days. He was a key leader of South Manchurian Youth Association and gave many speeches to Korean residents in various towns and villages. Choe came to the Academy and gave a speech that was received well. He was intelligent and well educated. Since then we stayed in contact and he began to lean towards communism.

I, too, was elected to the steering committee. After hours of hot debates and we hammered out a resolution draft for the conference. We believed that it would be acceptable to all. In addition, we drafted some other documents to our satisfaction. I began to work on the representatives starting the day after my arrival in Wangchungmun. I held a meeting of the representatives at the school yard of Whahung Middle. I wanted to get to know them and warn them about National Command's dark intentions. I told them that in order to be united in action, we must be united in ideology first, and the ideology must be modern and progressive. My speech was relayed immediately to National Command leaders. Kim Lee Gap informed me that the leaders were keeping a close tap on me, thus confirming Cha Kwang Soo's premonition when I left him in Yuha.

Kim Lee Gap was a founding member of "Down with Imperialism" Association; after Whasung Military Academy was closed, he moved in with his fiancée, Chun Gyong Sook, who lived not far from Wangchungmun. Kim worked in nearby villages spreading revolution. He was quick and daring, and was effective even in the regions controlled by anti-communist nationalists. He came to the conference as an observer. The day after my speech at the school yard, he came to me and invited me to dine with him at his fiancée's house. He wanted to spend an evening talking about our good old days at the Academy. But his real intent was to fill me in on what National Command leaders were up to.

Kim Lee Gap told me that the Command planned to arrest all members of the preparation committee. He told me that I should get out before the Command made its move and that he planned to leave that night himself. He said that the Command leaders had met at Hyon Muk Kwan's house and decided to eliminate me because of my communist belief. However, I decided to ignore his warning and stay put, because I had done no harm to National Command and they would not dare to arrest me. That fact that I was a communist was a public knowledge known to all leaders of National Command and Hyon Muk Kwan, who had invited me to stay at his house only two days ago. Why would they arrest me now? I had not done anything against them, and all I had said to the youth representatives was that we should be united in ideology.

I was determined to face down National Command leaders, if necessary. I went to Kang Hong Rak's place for dinner that night. His fiancée, Oh Sin Ae, returned from somewhere with an ashen face; she said that Choe Bong and several other members of the committee had been arrested by National Command soldiers. She said they were looking for me and that I had better get moving. We wanted to form a coalition of all Korean youth for pan-nationalist movement for Korean independence, but National Command leaders had responded with white terrorism against us. I decided to face down with Goh Yi Huh, the youth commissioner of National Command.

Cha Kwang Soo had heard of the arrest and came running to Kang Hong Rak's place with several associates. They insisted that all members of the steering committee, still free, should leave Wangchungmu at once, but I could not run away from such illegal threats. I thought that the best course of action was to meet the terrorists face to face and resolve this problem; I wanted to present our position in a frank and open manner to the nationalists and try to talk them into understanding where we were coming from; besides, I had to do something to free our comrades under arrest.

I put Cha Kwang Soo in charge in case of my demise and set out to face down Goh Ih Huh. Goh was the most extreme of ultra-right nationalists of National Command. Goh was known as the "theorist" in the nationalist camp. When I walked into his office, he was surprised to see me and did not know what to do. I was the last person he expected to see in his office. I demanded to know why Choe Bong and other members of the steering committee were arrested. Goh claimed that he did not know and he was wondering the same thing. I saw through his duplicity but I suppressed my simmering anger at him and tried to reason with him. I said: "It was National Command that arranged for the conference and we drafted a resolution for all representatives to debate on. But even before the debate, you arrested the committee members because you did not like our draft. If anything in the draft that offends you, that can be changed. It was only a draft. You called the meeting and you have every opportunity to change things. If you arrest innocent people like this, how can you unite our people? How can young Koreans grow up to be fierce anti-Japanese fighters?"

Goh claimed that it was true that the students went too far left in the draft but he had nothing to do with their arrests. I could tell that he was lying to me. I told Goh: "I know you were once a student activist in Seoul and had attempted to escape to the Soviet Union, and so, you must be aware how wide spread communism is worldwide. Today, just about everyone who is in some kind of revolution is likely to be leaning to communism. That is the case with me. I attended Whasung Military Academy run by nationalists and I stayed for three years at a nationalist leader's house in Jirin, and yet, I am pushing communism, not nationalism. We the youth of Korea are in tune with the trend in the world today and believe that communism is the way to go for our independence and for our prosperity and happiness. You are fighting for our independence and even if you do not support the aspirations of young Koreans, you should not arrest them."

I added that instead of going after Korean youth and students, National Command should work with them hands in hands and fight together for our independence. I told him that South Manchurian Youth Association would be nothing without its communist members. Goh Yi Huh sneered and said: "There is no way National Command will let communists take over that Association. We would rather dissolve it than let that happen."

I asked him why and he said: "In Bansuk Province, members of "ML" communist party organized "The Club", a terrorist group, and attached Korean nationalists. How can we work with people like these?" I knew that in Summer of 1929, "ML" members tried to get Korean nationalists in Sampo arrested by Chinese authorities. They fed Chinese police false information on the nationalists. The "ML" factionists came after us as well; The Club terrorists had attacked our Anti-Imperialism Youth Association members. In Yuha region, Choe Chang Gul's soldiers had to be mobilized to counter these communist terrorists.

I told Goh Yi Ha that; "We have nothing to do with those communist terrorists. They attack not only nationalists but also us as well. They fight amongst themselves. You should not place us in the same category with those terrorists." Goh was not convinced and did not buy my argument; so I went for broke. "If you insist on suppressing the youth movement, you will be committing crimes against the nation and you will be remembered as criminals in our history. You may be able to stop a few bodies, but you will never stop the will of the mass for communism. Ok, you want to kill me? Here I am. Go ahead, kill me now. I am ready." That did not budge him, rather it made him to dig in deeper in their trenches.

That night, National Command mobilized troops to arrest us. I told Cha Kwang Soo and company to leave the area and go back to their base in Samwonpo, because I feared that Command might try to arrest our people in Yuha. I told members of Communist Youth Association and of Anti-Imperialism Youth Association to leave the area that night. I told them that National Command was about to arrest them and that they should let the world know of what was happening here. That was how the conference was aborted.

I decided to get out of Wangchungmun. My friends suggested that we should convene our own conference in Samwonpo, which was under Choe Chang Gul's military control, but I told them that National Command was too strong in that region and going there would endanger us all. For myself, I debated if I should go to Samwonpo or to Rungga. I settled on the latter; I would go there and plan our next move; I would hide out there for a while and then go to Jiririn. If things did not work out in Jiririn, then I would go back to Musong and work the mass until things settled down.

I went to Kang Hung Rak's house and said: "I will be arrested if I stayed here tonight. I am heading out to Rungga now and I need something for my journey." Kang Hong Rak was worried and sighed: "You don't know the way there! How will you make it there by yourself?" I said, "It is only 80 ri on the highway and I will make it OK. Please. don't worry." I told them that I had a friend there, a graduate of Moonkwang Middle School, who would help me. The Kangs put together some food for my journey and wished me good luck.

Sin Young Gun was my friend who graduated from Moonkwang Middle School. He headed Hanhung School in Rungga. By the time I reached him, it was noon the following day. Girls of the school attended to me. Ahn Sin Young was Sin Yiung Gun's girl friend; she was active with our Anti-Imperialism Youth Association in Gandong until she joined her boy friend in Rungga. She and her friends brought me a delicious bowl of cold noodles and other welcome foods. How delicious those meals were! I can still taste them in my mouth. After gulping down the foods, I started asking them about the school and before long I fell asleep. Sin Young Gun hand-signaled his students from the school yard for his class, instead of the normal school bell that told the students to get in the classroom. Sin was afraid that the bell might wake me.

While hiding out in Gungga, I received the sad news that National Command executed the members of the steering committee under arrest. They shot and killed Choe Bong, Lee Tae Hee, Ji Woon San, Lee Mong Yul, Lee Kwang Sun and Cho Hee - six youth in their early 20s. They murdered six bright Korean youth with bright future ahead in cold blood. Choe Bong and the others shouted at their executioners: "We have sworn to die for the toiling mass of Korea, but being killed by fellow Koreans is the last thing we had anticipated." They proudly sang the Song of Revolution and shouted "Long Live Our Revolution!" at the very last moment.

National Command terrorists went after family members of the six youth executed; Goh Yi Huh arrested and killed Oh Sin Ae because she had informed me of his plot to wipe out us all. I wrote out a protest bulletin with tears in my eyes and had it copied in Samwon-po and distributed to our organizations. Protest meeting broke out. "We denounce National Command which murdered our youth movement leaders in cold blood; the Command is nothing but a den of reactionaries, murderers and conspirators; they are in cahoots with Chiang Kai Sek's terrorists who have murdered Chinese workers and farmers; National Command is nothing but a snake pit of traitors."

This was the end of collaboration between National Command and the new generation of Korean communists. The split became open and National Command terrorists killed our youth activists left and right. No one knows how many Korean youth, the flower of our nation, met gruesome death at the hands of National Command terrorists. Deep inerasable hatred for National Command remains in my heart. After the murder of the youth leaders, I could not sleep for several days; my heart was broken and bleeding. We joined the revolution to free Korea and getting persecuted by our own kind was beyond belief.

Since the day I formed "Down with Imperialism" Association, I always wanted to work with nationalists. When I learned that Ahn Chang Ho was toting reformism, I attacked his ideology but fought to free him from jail. I worked hard to see union of "Three Command" and was happy when it happened. In spite of this, National Command turned against us and committed barbaric acts against us. I recalled an old man's saying, "Koreans, even if there were only three, should unite and fight Japanese imperialists". Many nationalists cried for alliance and cooperation. The Korean people wanted all Koreans work together irrespective of religion or political affiliations. But National Command ignored people's demands.

Even today, after so many decades past, whenever I recall that tragic event in Wangchungmun, my body shakes in anger and sorrow and I reaffirm my resolve that never again such a national tragedy be allowed to occur. I believe that even Goh Yi Huh and Hyon Muk Kwan, if they were still living today, would agree with my conviction. Hyon, a long-time friend of mine, was killed by terrorists in Jangsa. His terrorists killed many youth leaders and he died by his own medicine. Hyon Sook Ja, his daughter, returned to Seoul with the Shanghai Provisional Government. It should be recorded that Hyon's descendents live happily in the northern half of Korea. [Lee Wha Rang note: Goh Yi Huh rose to command the Korean Independence Army. But by 1938, his 'army' was reduce to less than 10. He was captured by the Japanese in August 1936. It is not clear what happened to him after that. Some people say he defected to the Japanese side.]

Korea's history of liberation war tells us that the path of Korean communists is the path of patriotism; that Korean communists are true patriots who love Korea and the Korean people. Today, Korea remains divided under foreign intervention and uniting the Korean people is our life or death mission; the specter of Wangchungmun tragedy does not let me forget this mission.

In Search of Progressive Ideas

I returned home to Musong and rested for about a month there. After spending New Year's Day with my family, I left Musong middle of January. I returned to Jirin during busy day hours. I recalled the day I arrived at Jirin for the first time. I had written down my father's friends' home addresses in my black book, but I thought looking it up one by one in public would not look right and memorized the addresses. Jirin was bustling city boasting a long history and a country boy that I was found it awesome. After leaving the station, I could hardly walk with the excitements of starting a new life. I took a long, hard look at my new environment.

One of the most striking scenes was the hordes of water vendors. Jirin used to be famous for its abundant clean fresh water, but apparently, water was running out; I wondered what would happen to its citizens in the future. In Jirin, even a gulp of water was not free and I felt uneasy about my empty pockets; but such was life and I strode toward the downtown section with my chin up. A short distance from the station on Charu street was a wall that enclosed the old Jirin city. There were 10 gates around the city: Joyang, Singae, Paho, Rimgang, Boksoo, Duksung, Bukguk, and three other gates. The gates were guarded by Chiang Tzolin's troops. The wall had numerous gaps due to the elements, attesting to its antiquity.

Although I had never been there before, Jirin did not look totally foreign to me, perhaps, because, I wanted to visit this city since my early years and many of Father's friends lived there. I had about ten names to look up in my address book; among them were Oh Dong Jin, Jang Chul Ho, Son Jung Do, Kim Sa Hun, Hyon Muk Kwan (aka Hyon Ik Chul), Goh Won Ahm, Park Ki Baik and Whang Baik Ha. They were my father's friends and I wanted to pay them a courtesy visit.

Oh Dong Jin was the first on my list. His house was located between Charu and Sangbu. I was somewhat apprehensive about meeting Oh because of my early separation from Whasung Military Academy, that he had worked so hard to get me enrolled. Luckily, Oh received me with no visible hard feelings. I related to him why I quit the Academy and came to Jirin. Oh nodded his head and fell silent for a while in deep thought and said: "Looking at you showing up here out of the blue sky, I cannot help but recall your father. He, too, dropped out Sungsil Middle School. I was concerned when I hear about it, but later I came to believe your father did the right thing. Well, anyway, you had the guts to quit the Academy after only six months and came here. If you like it here, you should make your home here." That was all what Oh said about my quitting the Academy and I was glad that he was such an understanding man.

He said that it would have been nice, if my mother and brothers had moved to Jirin with me. At my father's funeral, Oh Dong Jin urged, several times, my mother to move to Jirin, where many of Father's friends lived, but Mother did not wish to move that far from Father's grave. I met Oh's secretary, Choe Il Chun; Oh always bragged about how capable Choe was and I felt I had met him already. Choe was known as the 'writer of Jungyi Command'. He and I became close comrades. That afternoon, Oh took me to Sampoong-jan, where several nationalist leaders were staying. I met Kim Sa Hyon, to whom Kim Si

Woo from Whasung Military Academy wrote a letter of introduction on my behalf me, and Chang Chul Ho, the Command Guard commander.

Sampoong-jan refers to Sampoong Hotel, 'jan' being Chinese for "hotel". In addition to Kim Sa Hyon and Chang Chul Ho, there were other nationalist leaders resident at the hotel. It was, in effect, a dormitory for Korean nationalists just as Taepoong Mill was. The hotel was a popular resting place for weary Korean expatriates coming out of Korea. The owner of the hotel came from Rev. Son Jung Do's home town, Jungsan, South Pyongahn Province. He was persuaded by Rev. Son to come to Manchuria. Sampoong was called a hotel, but it was more like a dormitory or a meeting hall.

The hotel was located less than 100 meters from the Japanese Consulate, which was the nerve center of the Japanese police looking for Korean nationalists. It did not occur to the Japanese that their preys were meeting and sleeping right under their nose. Koreans laughed at the blind Japanese police and the old Korean saying - "Every candle casts its own shadow" - applied to that situation. Strange though it may sound, no nationalist had been arrested at the hotel. I myself stayed at that hotel several times.

After reading Kim Si Woo's letter of introduction, Kim Sah Hyon told me that he knew Kim Gang, a Korean teaching at Yookmoon Middle School, and asked me if I would be interested in attending that school. It was a private school established by progressive citizens of Jirin and reputed to be the best in Jirin, Kim said. The school's good reputation was widely known, largely thanks to Kiljang Daily news, which printed articles favorable to the school. The school had money scandals and a spat of dictatorial principals in the past; in fact, Lee Kwang Han had just replaced Jang Hum Hun, a Nanking university graduate not long before my arrival. The fact that four different principals had come and gone showed how well the school was no nonsense. Its teachings were progressive, righteous and puritan. Because of this, I was attracted to it.

Next day, Kim Sa Hyon took me to meet Kim Kang at Yookmoon Middle. Kim was well versed in English. Kim took me to the principal, Lee Kwang Han, who was a leftist Chinese nationalist and a middle school classmate of Chou Enlai. Lee and Chou were close friends since childhood. I learned about this many years later. Premier Chou came to Pyongyang on a state visit and I told him about my Chinese friends who had helped me during my years in China. I mentioned Lee Kwang Han's name and Premier Chou's face lit up; he said Lee and he were close friends and were in the same class at Namgae University middle school in Chunjin.

Lee Kwan Han asked me what I planned to do after graduation and I answered that I wanted to work for Korean independence. He commended me for my lofty plan and readily granted me my wish to be enrolled in the sophomore class. Lee Kwan Han helped me many times since; on account of my youth movement activities and covert actions, I missed many classes. He knew what I was into, but he looked the other way; he protected me from reactionary teachers on the warlord's side who might have turned me in; he had helped me escape through backdoor when warlord troops and Japanese police came looking for me at the school. Being a clean conscientious principal, he attracted many progressive teachers to the school.

After completing my enrolment, I returned to Oh Dong Jin's house. Oh and his wife told me to stay with them instead of the school dormitory, until my graduation. This offer was much appreciated because my mother could send me only three won a month, which was barely enough for my tuition, books and a pair of shoes; there was nothing left for food and lodging. My mother worked as a laundress and a seamstress and three won a month was the most she could send to me. I had to rely on charity and goodwill of Father's friends. Thus, I stayed at Oh's house until he was captured by the Japanese, and then at Chang Chul Ho's house for a year, several months at Hyon Mook Kwan's house and lastly at Lee Woon's house. Lee Woon took over Oh Dong Jin's position.

Most of the nationalist bigwigs had known my father and they were kind and generous to me; I got to meet many other nationalists through them. At that time, most of the Jungyi Command leaders lived in Jirin. The Command had administrative, financial, justice, military, education, foreign affairs, security and judiciary branches; in addition, it had local offices even in remote regions and collected taxes from Korean residents. It acted as if it were a sovereign state. A guard unit of 150 soldiers protected this quasi-governmental office.

Jirin was a provincial capital, one of the key political, economic and cultural hubs, along with Bongchun, Jangchun and Harbin, of Manchuria. Chiang Jaksung, a nephew of warlord Chiang Tzolin, headed the Jirin government. The younger Chiang was cool to the Japanese and kept them at a distance; he rebuffed Japanese demands for information on communists and other "bad" elements, and he had the guts to tell the Japanese to mind their own business. His attitude was driven more by his ego and ignorance than any ideological conviction, however. Revolutionaries recognized his traits and took advantage of him. Jirin Province was the chosen place for most Korean expatriates in Manchuria. For this reason, many Korean nationalists and communists congregated in Jirin and consequently, Jirin became the main stage for Korean activists. "It is the Anti-Japanese base of the three eastern provinces" was what the Japanese police said of Jirin.

Since the second half of 1920, Jirin was the home for leaders of Jungyi, Chamyi and Sinmin commands, the main nationalist groups at the time. Jirin had a Korean newspaper; activities for setting up Korean schools in Whajun, Honggyong and Yongjung. "LM", "Tuesday", Suhsang and other communist factionalists frequented Jirin trying to recruit new members. Any communist who was somebody came to Jirin, tooting his own horn. Jirin had all kinds of Korean nationalists, communists, refugees and exiles. Young Koreans looking for truth and new ideas came to Jirin as well. In one word, Jirin was a rainbow pot of mixed ideas and personalities.

Jirin was where I began my career as a communist revolutionary. Several members of "Down with Imperialism" Association had preceded me to Jirin and found jobs at Mookkwang Middle School, government organs and the wharf. Upon learning of my arrival, they came to see me at Oh Dong Jin's house. They told me that living costs were high in Jirin and jobs were scarce, but there were a plenty of books available. I said that I could live with cold and hunger, if had enough books to read. They said my school was good, although some of the teachers were rightwing nationalists, the majority were either communists or socialists. I was relieved to hear that about my school. I learned later that both Sang Wol and Mah Joon, my teachers, were members of Chinese Communist Party.

I was determined to study true revolution to my heart's content and to do my best to achieve the goals set forth by "Down with Imperialism" Association. All Association members in Jirin agreed to do the same. Those not in Jirin were scattered to Korean villages and towns in various provinces such as Musong, Bansuk, Hongyong, Yuha, Anhdong, Janngchun and Yidong. Some of the members rejoined their army units. It was no easy task in a messy city like Jirin to spread our ideals with a handful of activists. It was tough to make our voices heard over the babbles of the city. We believed that if each Association member made ten or hundred converts and one hundred converts converted one thousands converts more; soon we will have an avalanche of converts numbering tens of thousands and we could then change the world.

I began to study Marxism-Leninism in earnest in Jirin. Before coming to Jirin, I had some limited exposure to communism during my days at Whasung Military Academy. The socialistic atmosphere of Jirin fanned my desire for communism. I spent more time reading books on Marx, Engels, Lenin and Stalin than my school books. There were many Chinese translations of good books published in the Soviet Union and Japan. A Beijing monthly, "Translation Monthly", published progressive literature, which was immensely popular with young students. Books that were unavailable in Musong or Whajun were found in Jirin. The problem was that I had no money to buy them. You may not believe this but I wore shoes only for school and went around without shoes when not needed.

The library at Woomahang charged 10 jun per month and I saved every penny I could for the library fee. After school, I stopped by the library and read books and newspapers for several hours. In this way, I could read publications that I could not afford otherwise. On occasions, I nudged rich kids to buy books and let them loan me their books. Some rich kids bought books to fill their library, not to read them. The school was administered democratically. The school librarian was elected semiannually by the student body. The elected librarian had the authority to order books for the library. I was elected to this position twice and bought many books on Marxism-Leninism for the school library.

Now, the problem was that there were too many books to read; I did not have enough time to read all the books I wanted. I had to learn to speed-read. Father taught me how to read when I was very young; he made me to write down abstracts of what I read and lessons I learned. This became habits with me and served me well in my later years. I was able to read and digest many books in short time periods. I read through the night in my school days; it was not because of my curiosity or interests in new ideas alone, I thought reading would help me fight the Japanese. I searched for ways to defeat the Japanese.

Taking up arms for revolution, instead of merely preaching Marxism-Leninism and pushing abstract ideas, was the path I reached after years of reading and studying books. I read book after book - "Communist Manifest", "Das Kapital", "Nation and Revolution", "Wage Labor and Capital", numerous classics on Marxism-Leninism and commentaries. In addition to books on ideology, I read literary works by Maxim Gorky and Rosin. When I was in Musong and Paldo-gu, I read "Chunhyang Story", "Simchun Chronicle", "Admiral Yi Soon Sin", "Western Dreams" and other traditional classics. In Jirin, I read "Mother", "Steel River", "Congratulations", "Aku", "By Yalu River", "A Boy Wanderer" and other revolutionary novels. In later years when I often recalled inspirational books such as "Steel River" at times of hardships; they rejuvenated my resolve to fight on and uplifted my sagging spirits. Literary works play important roles in shaping people's world outlook, and for this reason, I encourage writers, whenever I meet them, to come out with revolutionary novels. Our writers have produced a number of excellent novels.

In addition to books, political awakening came from by observing how people lived in abject poverty, misery and social injustice. Many Korean immigrants came first to Jirin for orientation before moving to their final destination. They brought news from Korea. Most immigrants crossed Yalu into Manchuria, took trains to Jangchun, from there to northern regions of Manchuria or from there to Jirin and nearby regions. Jirin station and hotels were packed with Korean immigrants during cold winter and early spring seasons. There were stories of unbelievable hardship.

One day, my friends and I went to a show called "Chiangsi". After the show, the actress who played the main part came over and asked us if we knew a Choe, her boyfriend. To our surprise, she spoke in Korean, totally unexpected because the show did not originate in Korea. Her name was Ok Boon, from Gyongsan Province. Long before she was born, her father had entered into a pact with his neighbor, whereby, if they had a daughter and a son, respectively, they would be married; if they had a son and a son or a daughter and a daughter, they would be made brothers or sisters. Some time later, one had a son and the other had a daughter. The babies were married symbolically; a silk scarf was cut into two as the marital contract. The two families were forced to leave the village due to financial difficulties and went in different directions.

The boy's family moved to Jirin and he attended Moonkwang Middle School and his parents bought a house and made a comfortable living running a rice refining business. The girl's family ran out of money in Dandong and had to sell their young daughter to a Chinese. Ok Boon was forced to learn Changsi and became an actress. When she got older, she began to wonder about her 'husband'. Everywhere she went, she had been inquiring about her Choe, but that day, she found her Choe. She wanted to quit the show and stay with her husband, but her owner demanded a huge sum of money and Ok Boon was forced to stay with the show. She promised her sad husband that she would return to him after he had paid off her pwner with her future earnings. That was a heart-breaking story; we were angry at the show owner but there was not much we could do. We called the show owner "Snake Bitch" and let her know how cold-hearted she was.

The stench of filthy class struggles among hundreds of thousands of human beings crowed into a city was everywhere. On one hot summer day, my friends and I witnessed an unpleasant scene on our way back from a trip to Buksan; it seemed that a rickshaw man was being shorted by a father and son load. The poor man begged for a few more pennies in the spirit of democracy. The rich passenger took an offense and struck the poor man. We could not stand it anymore and rushed to the rich fellow and demanded that he must give the poor fellow more money. This made me wonder why some people had to pull rickshaws while others rode in them; who some lived in palatial mansions, while others were homeless and roamed the streets. As the first step in forming revolutionary world outlook, people must realize where they stand in the society, which social class they belong and what interests they must protect; hatreds toward the exploiters and burning desire to fight their rights and interests are prerequisite to becoming revolutionaries working to build a new society.

I read many Marxism-Leninism classics and other books on revolution, and began to develop class consciousness. I got to see the world and realized that social inequities abounded; I came to hate the exploiters and exploiting societies, and made up my mind to work for an exploitation-free society. As I studied books by Marx and Lenin, I developed the urge to share my knowledge with my fellow students. Kwon Tai Suk was the first friend I made at Yukmun Middle School. There were only four Korean students at the school, two of them, Kwon and I, were interested in politics and the other two were only for making money. Kwon and I had many things in common and hit it off good. Jang Sin Min was a Chinese friend of mine; Jang and I spent hours discussing politics; we talked about the ills of our society, evils of imperialism, Japanese invasion of China, Chiang Kaisek's reactionary deeds, and so on.

In those days, Marxism-Leninism was only a curiosity for young people and students; they adored Marx, because they believed he was a great man; they thought studying Marxism was a fashionable thing to do and few had the desire to put Marxism into practice. Based on my Whajun experience, I started a secret book club with some of my friends at Yukmun Middle School. Our purpose was to educate progressive-minded youth and students on Marxism-Leninism. The club expanded rapidly to other schools - First Middle, Fifth Middle, Girls Middle, Teacher Training School, and others in Jirin. As the membership grew, we had to rent a room at a rice mill, which was operated by Korean nationalists. Members of Yugil fraternity managed the reading room.

Today, we have libraries everywhere and we have huge palatial libraries such as the People's University Library. But in those days, setting up a tiny reading room was no easy task for us. Books had to be bought, book shelves and reading desks and chairs had to be acquired, but we had no money. Every Sunday, we did manual labor for pay; we carried railroad beds at the stations and fetched sands from the river for minimum wage; girls worked at the mill picking husks. We bought books with our sweat-money. We made a secret storage for revolutionary books; we posted a simple catalog of our books at various locations in the city. Soon the words got out and our readership expanded rapidly. We had romantic novels to the library to make it more attractive to the readers. The love stories were big hits with our young audience. They cut teeth on sweet love stories and those wanting to read more were introduced to social science and other more serious books; after which there were exposed to Marxism-Leninism and other revolutionary books from our secret stack.

Our library included "Resurrection", "Inhumanity", "Pioneer" and other epics by Lee Kwang Soo. Lee wrote "February 8" Independence Declaration in Tokyo, a few days prior to March First Movement; he actively participated in independence movement and wrote many progressive novels. His works were popular with young Koreans. Unfortunately, Lee became reactionary in his later years and wrote "A Revolutionary's Wife" and other decadent stories. When I stopped in Musong on my way to South Manchuria with my guerrilla army, I had the chance to read it. "A Revolutionary's Wife" depicts an illicit affair between woman married to a wounded communist revolutionary and a medical student attending to his wound. This novel drew an unfavorable picture of communists and made pun of communism. It showed where Lee Kwang Soo stood on communism.

Every Saturday and Sunday, we met at Jirin Chapel or at Buksan Park and held book reviews. At first there were some love story reviews but they were not well received and soon no one talked about love stories and all reviews were serious revolutionary books. In order to attract more people to our indoctrination program, we tried our hand at "Sugar Water" approach. One day, I got sick and had to skip some classes. On my way home, I passed by Buksan and noticed a large crowd was gathered listening to a storyteller. He was reciting the epic story of "Three Nations" from memory. When he came to the heroic battle of Je Kalring, he beat a drum to dramatize his story. When he came to a dramatic section, he stopped and passed a hat for donation. This sales gimmick was called "Sugar Water" by the Chinese people. It worked well with the mass.

We adapted this technique for our movement. We had a fellow who was good at cracking jokes and talked well. We had him work with Christians. He could recite the Bible backward and forward and offered wonderful prayers; he was better than any preacher I knew. The Chinese storyteller did it for money but our storyteller did it for revolution. Our man used some juicy love stories and at critical moments, he stopped and did some communist propaganda, and then moved on to the next climactic moment. After an hour or so, his act continued to the next day, and next day; it became a continuous event.

One of the converts from our storytelling propaganda work was Park So Sim. There was a large bookstore called New Book Store, which I frequented. Park was a frequent visitor there, too. He lurked in the area that handled books on communism and socialism, looking for new arrivals and we ran into each other often. He was tall, lean and pleasant. Occasionally, I went to the store with my friends and bought an armful of books for the school library. On these occasions, Park got more excited and involved in selecting our books; he told us which books to buy and which books to ignore. In this way, Park and I became friends. Later, he stayed with me for a while when I lived in Dongtae-tan.

Park came from Seoul. His health was poor and he wrote wrote short articles for magazines and newspapers; that was about all his health would allow. He did not participate any communist movement but he was highly critical of communist factionalists. Because of his literary skills, numerous leaders attempted to entice him to their camps. Park read Das Kapital, translated from Japanese, through the night. When he ran out of money, he hocked his clothe to buy books. Unlike some other pundits, who acted as if they knew everything after reading a handful of books, Park read virtually all books on communism and recite key verses and chapters from memory. Park introduced me to Das Kapital and explained to me what it was all about. As with the case with some communist books, Das Kapital has some rough spots for novices and Park gave lectures on those spots. He became our 'professor' of communism.

Once I asked him about proletariat dictatorship. Park recited the evolution of this notion in the context of historical developments. Various Marxist theorists gave their best explanations relevant to the existing conditions. His explanations were clear and made sense. I did stomp him on one question, though; I asked him if our independence should come before our communist revolution in Korea. At the time, this was question was hotly debated among young students. In those days, communist theorists had little to say about national liberation. Park's answer to his question was unclear.

I said: "Communists theorists talk about revolution in colonial powers and in colonies, which are organically connected, but they emphasize proletarian revolution in colonial nations. If that is the case, then Korea will not be freed until proletarian revolution is achieved in Japan. Doe this mean Korea's toiling mass must sit tight and wait for their Japanese comrades get their work cone?" Park could not answer this one. He stared at me with a puzzled look on his face. Finally, he said that was true according to the internationally accepted Marxist doctrine. Noting that I was not comfortable with his answer, he confessed that he studied Marxist doctrines for many years but had had no practical experience. I was somewhat disappointed, "What good is it to master communism doctrines, if the knowledge is not put to work?"

One of the most striking differences between communist revolution in Russia and Korea was that the October revolution could never happen in Korea, because the conditions were drastically different. Proletarian revolution in a backward feudal colony like Korea was not realistic. Korean patriots were forced out of Korea and had to work outside Korea; how could they lead the mass in Korea from outside? How can they carry out their tasks of Korean independence and revolution and also meet international obligations? It took us a long time to find the answers and the answers came at high costs to us.

Park joined Anti-Imperialism Youth League and Communist Youth Association, and devoted his life to educating our young members. He was transformed from a recluse book-warm to an ardent activist in spite of his deteriorating health. He had tuberculosis and we sent him to Kahryun hoping that the climate there might help him. Park So Sim built himself a tiny straw-thatched hut on the bank of Mugae River and lived by himself, cooking his own meals. I dropped in to see him as often as I could. He was so happy to see me and we spent hours recalling our good old days and debating Marxist doctrines.

One day, to my surprise, he showed me his wife's photo. I assumed that his wife passed away or left him. It was clear from the photo that his wife was well educated and she was pretty. He told me that he received a letter from his wife recently from Seoul. When I asked him why had had not brought her here, he replied that she was from a wealthy family. I asked: "Didn't you know that she was rich when you married her?" Park said: "Yes, I knew. My life philosophy was quite different in those days."

I found his answer somewhat strange and inquired: "Did you forget your wife?" He said: "Yes, until now. But since receiving her letter, I cannot get her off my heart." I told him that he should bring her here if he truly loved her. I said: "How can you carry the world into a new world, if you cannot convert your own wife? Anyway, your wife can really help you here." he nodded in agreement and said: "Well, Sung Ju. If that's what you think I should do. I will ask my wife to come here. It is too late for me; my life is almost over. I am a failure." He had no child, no property to speak of, no spiritual legacy to leave behind for the next generation.

"My life wish was to write a book for the toiling mass of Korea. That is why I have spent all my life reading books. But time has run out. When I was young and healthy, I did not know enough to write down anything, but when I had finally the truth, I am too weak to write anything down." Park was a broken man. I, too, was sad; Park was a sincere hardworking scholar of Marxism and I regretted that he did not have the opportunity to practice his theory while he was able; had he done so, he would have made significant contributions to our movement. No one should forget our independence and people's happiness. Park So Sim did not live long enough see Korea freed. Park's wife came from Seoul to care for him. Park kept on writing short stories and articles until his last day. The ancients said that if you find the truth in the morning, you can die happily in the evening. I was sad to lose Park, who knew so much and could have done so much for us, and who had found the truth.

I spent three years in Jirin - three of the most memorable of my life. It was here that I learned Marxism-Leninism from scientific points of view and thanks to this learning, I found the true way to free Korea and bring happiness to the Korean people. Being a son of a stateless people, I was forced to learn the truth early in my life. The Korean people's sufferings and miseries were my sufferings and miseries. My life philosophy and work outlook were formed and gelled during my years in Jirin. My learning and experiences in Jirin became the foundation and springboard of my revolutionary actions in the years that followed. Even today, I emphasize that the very first step in becoming a revolution is education. Your revolutionary activities must be based on clear understanding of revolutionary ideals.

My Teacher Sang Wol

Park So Sim had introduced me to "Das Kapital" and it was my teacher Sang Wol who had introduced Maxim Gorky's "Mother" and Cho Sulgun's "Red Bungalow Dream" to me. Sang Won taught literature at Yukmun Middle School. He came to the school about February 1928. He majored in English literature at Beijing University and his appointment to teach at our school was a welcome news. On back of our mind, we feared he might be a secret agent of the Ministry of Education. In fact, quite a few of our teachers secretly worked for the warlords and spied on us.

About that time, warlord Chiang Hakryang made a pact with Chiang Kai Sek to spread Kuomintang influence to Manchuria and Chiang Kaisek's secret police had already reached Jirin. [Lee Wha Rang Note: "Boy Marshall" Chiang took over Manchuria after his father Chiang Tzolin was killed. Chiang Hakryang engineered the Sian Incident of December 12, 1936, in which Chiang Kaisek was taken hostage. Ironically, he let Chiang Kaisek free, and was taken captive by his former hostage, for the rest of his life. Photo: Chiang Hakryang.]

Our school was noted for its progressive teachers and student body, and so Kuomintang police and their lackeys kept a close tab on us. It was in this kind of tense atmosphere when Sang Won showed up and we were keenly interested in discovering what he really was. But his very first lecture put our fears and suspicions to rest and he became our campus idol.

"Red Bungalow Dream" has 120 sections but Sang Won covered it in one hour and we were able to digest the gist of the this monstrous epic. He made the story of an aristocracy's demise so vivid and clear to us. When he finished his first lecture, the students applauded and felt that a jewel came to our school. I thought it strange that he said little about the author of the epic, and so, on the following day, I saw him taking a walk on the school yard and asked him about the author. He told me that he did not go over the author in class because of the limited time and he told me about the author, Cho

When he finished his discourse on Cho Sulgun, I asked him about the author's social class and his novel's political contents. He fielded my question cheerfully. After stating that it was only his personal option, he said, "It is true, in general, that an author's work reflects his social upbringing, but what is more important is the author's world outlook." He cited Cho Sulgun as an example; Cho's family enjoyed imperial privileges and his early childhood was spent in pomp and luxury, but he suffered poverty and misery after the demise of the palace; and through his eyes, one can see the inevitability of downfall of feudalism.

He said: "It is good that you, Sung Ju, came to see me. If you have any questions or need further explanations, don't hesitate to ask your teachers. That is how all students of science should be. Ask many questions no matter where or when. I like students who ask many questions." [Photo: Sang Wol].

His request for many questions turned me on. Since the elementary school, I had been known to ask many questions. Many teachers at Yukmun were weary of me because I asked too many questions. Sang Wol told me that he had the novel and a collection of articles on its author and that I would be welcome to borrow them. That was how I got to be the first visitor to his new lodging. My grandfather used to tell me that students should not encroach upon their teachers' private domains.

He was not alone in thinking that way; even those who were educated in Western civilization had the same notion about teacher-pupil relations. This notion was based on the premise that a teacher's private life would reveal to his pupils that he is just a person and therefore, he will lose his pupils' respects.

When my father attended Soonwha School, there was a school master called, Kim Ji Sung. Kim was an alcoholic and drank heavily even when in school. My father was the class leader and so, he was sent out to fetch drinks by the master. Father obeyed his master's command for months. One day, Father saw his drunken master fall into a creek on his way home and decided to do something to stop the old man's drinking. A few days later, the master handed Father an empty bottle and told him to get it filled with more wine. Father took the bottle and left the school yard. He walked some distance to a rock and smashed the bottle to pieces on it and ran back to the master. He told his teacher that a tiger came after him and he fell breaking the bottle. The old master took the hint and said: "Hmmm, a tiger came to Mangyong-dae all the way from Mount Paiktu! Well, you, Kim Hyong Jik - that was a big lie but you make me feel ashamed. I am sorry I had stooped so low as to make you fetch wine for me." The old master stopped drinking after this incident.

Although the school master stopped drinking, my father always remembered his drunken teacher in the creek and that image enforced my grandfather's belief that there should be a screen shielding teachers' private life from their pupils. I intruded into Sang Wol's private life before any screen shrouded him. His library had several hundred books; it was the largest and most varied private collection of books I had seen. Sang Wol was rich in books; he had many novels in English and avant garde literature. I was enthralled by his collection of books and could not take my eyes off the shelves. I wondered if I had read through these books, I would have college education equivalent; how lucky it was for me to have Sang Wol at the school.

I opened book after book and asked him: "Excuse me, sir. How long did it take you to get this many books?" He smiled a thin smile and stared at me for a while and said: "About ten years, I think."

I asked him: "How long would it take to read these books?" He said: "Well, about three years if you are diligent and about one hundred years if you are lazy." I said: "I will do anything if you would let me borrow your books." He replied: "Well, Sung Ju, I have one condition: you must promise me to become a writer. I have been looking to train a couple of train proletarian writers. I wonder if you would be one."

I said: "Master, I am honored that you consider me in that light. In fact, I love literature and admire writers. I may become a writer after Korean independence, but you must know that I am a stateless person. My father passed away after a lifelong struggle for our independence and I wish to carry on my father's work. My primary purpose in life is our independence and that will be my profession." Master Sang Wol, leaning against the shelves, looked at me with serious expression on his face nodding his head; then he placed his hands on my shoulders and said quietly: "That is admirable, Sung Ju. Ok, then, I will let you borrow my books on the condition that you will become an independence fighter."

That night, I borrowed "Red Bungalow Dream" and returned to my room. The next books I borrowed from Sang Wol were Jang Kwang Ja's "Yalu River" and "The Boy Wanderer". I enjoyed reading these two novels. "Yalu River" was about a young Korean couple, Lee Maeng Han and Woon Goh, and was a tear-jerker. After these, I borrowed Gorky's "Mother". That was how Sang Wol and I became close. I got whatever books I wanted from Sang Wol's library. In fact, if he did not have a book I wanted in his library, he got it for me. The only thing he asked for in return was my digest. He and I exchanged critiques of Gorky's "Enemies" and Rohsin's "Congratulations".

We exchanged our ideas on the mission of literature; we had spent hours going over how literary works should reflect reality and what roles they should play for social development. Sang Wol said that literature should be like a lighthouse that guides humanity to perfection. Machinery enhances productivity and literature makes humans that run machines more perfect. Sang Wol was particularly fond of Rohsin and his works. They were literary comrades at one time and Sang Wol was a member of a literary circle led by Rohsin. His short story "Hatchet Head" received Rohsin's praise; the story was about people's struggles against social evils in Rahsang region. According to Sang Wol's daughter, Sang Hyowon, Rohsin told Sang Wol that his short story lacked sharpness. Sang Wol had learned lessons from the defects in his first novel and wrote a more mature novel "Ceremonial Hat", a socio-political epic that was received acclaims from literary circles. This lengthy novel was published by an Ungnam magazine in installments. In 1980, People's China Literary Publishing House published "Ceremonial Hat". In addition to "Ceremonial Hat" and "Hatchet Head", Sang Wol wrote epic novels "Blue Nut" and "Canine Problem". He continued to write while teaching.

I read "Jin Doksoo's Works" from Sang Wol's library. Jin Doksoo was one of the founding fathers of Chinese Communist Party and a real power broker in the Party at the time. At first, Sang Wol was hesitant to let me read the book, fearing that I might be adversely affected by Jin's leftist defeatism. Jin had headed the literary department of Beijing University before Sang Wol's time, and many teachers and students prided themselves having worked under him at the university. Sang Wol confessed: "To be honest, I, too, worshipped Jin Doksoo once. I fell in love with his ideas after reading his "New Youth" magazine and political essays in his early years. But, my opinion of Jin is quite different today." He added that Jin's popularity peaked during May 4th Movement and the founding period of Chinese Communist Party, but his popularity plummeted after he began to tout leftist opportunism.

Jin Doksoo's opportunism was most evident in his ideas and attitudes on peasant problems. In 1926, Stalin pointed out that Chinese peasants were the main bulwark in anti-imperialism in China and were the most important and reliable partners of Chinese workers. But, Jin looked down upon peasants and opposed peasants rising against landowners; Jin was against peasants becoming self-reliant; in short, Jin opposed peasants movement. Jin feared that bringing peasants into the revolutionary ranks might alienate and drive away bourgeoisie revolutionaries. The fact of the matter is that Jin's left defeatism fostered bourgeoisie betrayals, said Sang Wol. I saw that Jin's defeatism could hurt our revolution.

After reading "Jin Doksoo Works", I spent many days discussing peasants problems with Sang Wol. We talked about some of the factors that were common to Korean and Chinese peasants issues; we talked about differences between Korean and Chinese peasants problems; what lessons Lenin had for our peasants; how can peasants lead our revolution. I said that "farming is the foundation of our society and therefore, farmers are the main force of social changes." Sang Wol agreed with me and said: "Ignoring peasants is ignoring farming and land, and any revolution, no matter how lofty its ideology, is doomed to fail, if it ignores farmers." He said that this was Jin Doksoo's problem. After this conversation, it became clear to me that Sang Wol was a communist and Sang Wol found that I, too, was a communist.

Sang Wol joined Chinese Communist Party in 1926 and led peasants activities in his home village, for which he was arrested by Kuomintang reactionary warlords. He was tortured for over a year in a military prison on Jungang Province. Early in 1928, a Korean medical officer arranged for his medical release from prison, whereupon, he adopted a false name, Sahju Wumu, and escaped to Manchuria, where Cho Doh Nam got him a teaching job at Yukmun Middle School.

Sang Wol and I discussed political issues other than peasants problems as well. Many students of Yukmun were active in political debates. In those days, China was at the threshold of its great revolution and Korea was astir with mass movements. There were endless issues and topics for our debates. Among Korean youth, the issue of whether Lee Jun's method or Ahn Jung Gun's was right was hotly debated. Many favored Ahn's assassination terrorist approach. I asked Sang Wol what he thought of Ahn's approach. He said Ahn's action was, of course, patriotic, but it was adventurism from a revolutionary tactical point of view, to which I agreed. I believed that killing a handful of imperialist servants would not defeat imperialism and that the only way to win was to educate and motivate the mass into popular mass actions.

We talked about Japanese invasions of Korea and Japanese colonial policies in Korea; Japanese designs for China and Manchuria; Chinese warlords; Sino-Korean joint struggles to counter imperialism and occupation. The United Nations League's declaration on disarmament was another hot issues among Yukmun students at the time. Some students were duped by the League, and so I wrote an article exposing League's duplicity. Many students and Sang Wol agreed with my thesis.

Since his arrival at Jirin, Sang Wol lost contact with the Party, but he presented several enlightening lectures using literary works of Gorky, Rohsin and other progressive writers. He gave a series of lectures, "Let Us Oppose Imperialism", to our secret book club at the school. His lectures were well received by the students. I relayed students' comments to Sang Wol. His profound knowledge of Oriental and Occidental literary masterpieces, history and his devotion to education had made him a darling of the students.

But not everyone liked him. Some teachers, working for the warlord, was unhappy with Sang Wol's popularity with students and tried their best to get him fired. Those students who had flocked to Sang Wol, too, became enemies of the reactionary teachers. They tried to get Lee Kwang Han, the principal, to dismiss Korean students from the school. Mah Gah, the athletics teacher, claimed that Korean students were hostile to Chinese and tried to get me expelled. Sang Wol came to my defense.

Our English teacher was hostile to progressive students. He was toadyish from head to toe. He worshipped West and despised East; he claimed that Occidentals ate their meals quietly while Orientals made all kind of noise while eating, a sure sign of backwardness. He behaved as if he were an Occidental, although he was a Chinese. We had had enough of his anti-Oriental flunkeyism and decided to teach him a lesson. One day, we prepared a lunch of steaming-hot noodles and invited our teachers. Very soon the dining hall was filled with sounds of people slurping down hot noodles. But the English teacher was the sole exception; he kept on blowing on the steaming noodles and ate them with great difficulty, which caused the students into spontaneous laughter that shook the dinning hall. At last, the English teacher saw through our planks and left the room in a huff. His anti-Oriental remarks declined sharply after this. Because of his toadyism, English was not a popular subject at the school.

By 1929, reactionary teachers had made Sang Wol's life unbearable at the school. One day, Sang Wol proposed that the school athletics program should promote general athletics instead of favoring a chosen few athletes. The basketball court of the school was being monopolized by the school's basketball team and other students were off-limit to the court. Sang Wol's proposal did not ride well with some of the basketball players and they schemed to assault Sang Wol on his way home. I learned of their scheme from Anti-Imperialism Association members and stopped reactionary players from carrying out their evil deed.

"Humm, that athletics teacher, Mah, has trained his running-dogs well. Those worthless worms!", so said Sang Wol watching the would-be attackers running away. I said: "Master, don't be surprised at this. Isn't this another stage in our class struggle? There will be more serious attacks in the future and you should better be prepared." Sang Wol said: "Yes, you are right. We are fighting the warlords now". Shortly after, Sang Wol was fired because of his efforts to reinstate students expelled from the school.

I was away in Jangchun and Karyun doing some revolutionary work when Sang Wol left Jirin. Upon my return, my friend Kwan Dae Suk handed me a letter from Sang Wol; the letter said: "I lost my battle with the warlords and I must leave Jirin now. We will defeat the warlords someday. No matter where I go, I will pray for your success in your work for Korea." That was my last contact with Sang Wol and we never met again. In 1955, Sang Wol sent me his article "My Historic Relations with Marshall Kim Il Sung in his Youth" and also, in 1980, he sent me "Chinese History Abstracts". I knew then that he was still alive. Every time I met a visiting dignitary from China, I inquired about Sang Wol, but I did not get to see him. I failed to show my due respect by failing to pay him a visit. It was my fault. International borders do strange things to you.

Sang Wol taught at Chinese People's University in Beijing until his death in 1982. In 1989, Sang Garan, his eldest daughter, who was a researcher at Chinese Academy Mechanical Institute, came to see me; and in 1990, Sang Hyowon, his third daughter, who taught at Chinese People's University, came to see me. I saw my teacher's image from 60 year ago in his two daughters and I was immensely moved. Different races do not mean different emotions. People's emotions do not have barriers of skin color, religion or language. Had Yukmun Middle School been closer to me, I would have plucked some flowers from the schoolyard and given them to his daughters; I would have said: "This is your father's favorite flower. Your father and I met under the flower tree many times."

After leaving Jirin, Sang Wol went to Harbin, Shanghai, Beijing, Hangkaw, Chunking, Nyonhaw, Yenan and other places for Party tasks. He was engaged in education, literary and literacy activities for the Party. At one time, he was the general secretary of the Party in Manchuria. To his last day on Earth, he remembered me and he remained loyal to the friendship of China and Korea. His remains were buried at a patriots cemetery outside Beijing.

He who has had a teacher to remember for his lifetime is a lucky man. In this regard, I am a lucky man. Every time I miss Master Sang Wol, who had left indelible marks on me in my formative years, I go back to Yukmun Middle School and walk on its campus in mine mind. I miss Master Sang Wol very much.

3.7. Korean Youth Communist League

Due to the tireless activities of "Down with Imperialism" Association and our secret book club members, Marxism-Leninism spread rapidly and I began to see marked changes in young people's ideological outlook. Progressive ideas induced many young people and students to view where they stood in time and to see clearly what their missions were in life. We continued ideological indoctrination and formed associations to bring them into organizational frameworks, through which Marxism-Leninism could be propagated faster and our political power could grow stronger by day.

My revolutionary life began with youth and student activities. The main reason why I began with youth movements and placed so much emphasis was, although my being a student at the time had something to do with it, my conviction that they could play key roles in motivating the working class and peasants. Marxism-Leninism tells us that youth and students are teachers and vanguards of revolution; they educate, motivate and lead the mass into revolution. I embraced this notion. As our revolution progressed, our opinion and outlook on the roles played by our youth and students changed fundamentally. We broke out of the old mold that relied on workers and farmers for revolution and came to believe that our youth and students were also essential components of our revolution.

Our youth and students were vanguards of March First Movement, June 10th Movement, Kwangju Students Incident and other patriotic activities prior Liberation. Our youth had ushered in the new communist movement and anti-Japan armed struggles were mainly done by the youth of Korea. After Liberation, the youth and students led revolution in South Korea. The April 19th uprising was engineered by the youth and so was the 1980 Kwangju Uprising. In China, students led May 4th Movement.. The old-time revolutionary models that excluded youth and students did not apply to Korea and we pioneered the new revolution method that centerpieces youth and students for the first time in human history.

In the early 1920s, youth and student movements in Korea were void of class struggles and anti-imperialism, thus lacking the support of the mass. The movements were led by intelligentsia and leaned to mass enlightenment. Early on, we recognized these shortcomings and did our best to avoid them. However, soon we learned that this was no easy task and we had run into many problems. By that time, there were already several youth and student groups organized by Korean nationalists and communist factionalists: Jirin Youth Association, Korean Jirin Students Association, Teens Association and several others.

Starting yet another group was a challenge. It would have been easy to start an association, but had it not been for the myriad of associations already in existence with active participation by youth and students. We could not ignore them. After lengthy discussions, we decided to ignore those associations that were inactive but to work with those that were new or had some activities. The latter type could be led in the right direction. Korean Jirin Teens Association was the first organization we had formed in Jirin. At the time, there was an organization for Korean teens in Jirin, which was setup by Korean nationalists but was not widely known to Korean teens of Jirin. In April 1927, we formally established Korean Jirin Teens Association at Rev. Song Jung Do's church. This was a legal entity, properly registered with the city government.

I worked with Kim Won Wu and Park Il Pa (aka Park Wu Chun) in leading this organization. It had sections for organization, propaganda, culture and sports; it had cells in various schools and districts. Whang Gwui Hun, who graduated from Jirin Women's Teacher School, was in charge of propaganda. Teens Association had members from workers, farmers, petit bourgeoisie families in Jirin. The primary mission of the Association was to instill anti-Japanese spirit in young Korean teens and to train them into a powerful second echelon of our front. Learning new progressive ideas and propagating them among the mass was expected of all members.

In May of that year, we renamed Korean Jirin Ryuh Students Association to Korean Jirin Yu Students Association. This association had quite a few members and had some influence. It was originally created for mutual assistance for Korean students studying in Jirin and Korean nationalists supported it. Rev. Son Jung Do was on its advisory board. When we proposed to reorganize it, some people wanted to dismantle it completely because it was purely a social organization created by nationalists. They argued that it would remain in the domain of the nationalists, no matter what we did with it; these people wanted to overthrow the old-time nationalists.

In those days, there was an intense competition for people's support by communists and nationalists. Within the communist camp, there were several factions competing for people's backing. One day, Seoul faction would take control of Young Korean Communist League and next day, "Tuesday" faction would form its own youth association to counter it. One day, "Tuesday" faction would form a peasants association and next day, 'Seoul' faction would follow suite by creating its own association to counter it. The factions went to the extent of forming terrorist gangs to interrupt competing organizations. There was no way we could adopt these tactics of the old-time Korean communists. Creating a new association would have caused tension with nationalists and caused dissention among the Korean students in Jirin. We decided to work from within; we joined the association and began to reform it from a social club into a revolutionary organization. I, a communist, became its honorary chairman and we maintained friendly relations with Korean nationalists and the local authorities. We began to reshape the political landscape of Jirin..

The association changed the daily routines of Korean students in Jirin: the members in small groups held early morning meetings and on Sundays, the members marched to Mount Buk for a mass rally; they marched singing revolutionary songs and held athletic events. We applied various tactics tailored to attract Korean students to our association. There were many students from Christian families; they were influenced by their Christian parents into believing in God. Merely telling them that God did not exist would not change their faith. One day, we asked a woman teacher of a Korean school to lead a prayer meeting for our Christian members. She took our Christian friends to a church and prayed all day reciting "Oh, Almighty God, Our Father in Heaven, we are starving and please. give us bread." There was no food from God and the kids became hungrier and hungrier. Next, she led her flock to a wheat field after harvest and had them collect wheat grains dropped by the farmers, and baked loaves of bread. Our Christian kids got the message: "it is better to work for food than to beg God for free meals". This was a simple lesson but was effective in correcting old bad habits.

Our effort to teach our young students not to attend church services and not to become addicted to religion was not meant to eliminate religion all together; instead, it was based on our belief that young Koreans with religious belief would be useless for our revolutionary activities. Some members marched singing Christian hymns. Such was the influence of Christianity on our youth in Jirin. You cannot fight the enemy passively singing hymns. What we needed more were young Koreans singing revolutionary marching songs. Thus we taught the youngsters progressive songs and soon fewer and fewer kids marched singing Christian hymns. "Teens Song of Patriotism" and Korean Students in Jirin Association song began to ring out in the streets of Jirin.

One of the most memorable events of the association was the Korean language summer school. We taught Korean language to Korean students attending Chinese schools and those Korean kids who could not speak Korean at all. Most of these kids were born in Manchuria and spoke Chinese better than Korean. We started the slogan - "Koreans must know Korea". Geh Young Chun, Kim Won Wu and Park So Sim took turns teaching Korean. In those days, we had no teachers per se and all of the key leaders became teachers as well. After 20 days of lessons, our young students were able to read children's publications in Korean. We organized picnics, site seeing trips, special lectures, debates, study groups, oratory contests, book reviews, song fests and stage plays. Kangnam Park was our favorite place for holding secret meetings; the park was on an island in Songwha River, a beautiful place; some Jirin capitalists planted trees on the island turning it into a botanical garden and collected entrance fees.

Another site for our secret meetings was Mount Buk. Unlike the Park which was open in warm months only, Mount Buk was open year-around. It was the most favored play ground for the citizens of Jirin and for this reason, there were many retail shops around the place: food stalls, tobacco shops, dime stores, teach houses, play rooms and retail shops for Western goods. Mount Buk had stunning scenery as well as old relics, including Yakman Temple, a place of worship for Sun Yaksan, whose birthday was celebrated from June 4th to June 6th, a 3-day holiday for the people of Jirin. Government dignitaries held solemn ceremonies at the temple.

During the 3-day festivities, Jirin police set up a station near the mountain and patrolled the area, making sure that incense burnings at the temples did not go out of control and started forest fires. Rickshaw and taxi drivers gouged the public by charging as much as ten times the normal fares during this period. Huge crowds flocked to the mountain to enjoy the scenery and also to attend the ceremonies. While the merchants made a fortune during the festival, progressive activists took advantage of the crowds to preach enlightenment: better personal hygiene, ethics, law and order, neighborliness, exercises and so on. There poured their hearts out trying to enlighten the mass. We, too, took advantage of the situation and did some propaganda among the celebrants. The monk in charge of the temple was on our side and allowed us to hold secret meetings in the temple basement.

During my school years in Jirin, I delivered many lectures. I gave talks at public debates organized by Korean nationalists. Oh Dong Jin, Lee Tak and other leaders of Jungyi Command organized public debates on August 29th (Foundation day), March 1st, and October 3rd (Tanggun's birthday). The Jirin

Students Association held open debates on Ahn Joon Gun's way of terrorism versus Lee Jun's way of petition to big powers. They became to realize that neither terrorism nor petition to foreign powers would bring us independence; and that we must find the right method to gain freedom. We made the first Sunday of May the Teens Day and held athletic events on this day for the youth, their parents and relatives and independence activists of Jirin. Once we had the youngsters properly indoctrinated, we mobilized them for mass enlightenment activities. When schools were out for summer breaks, we dispatched kids as young as eleven years to countryside to help with farm chores and also to enlighten them.

Indoctrinating the Korean youth of Jirin to think in one mind than in one hundred minds was an exhilarating valuable experience for me. Korean Students Association of Jirin, Jirin Korean Teens Association and Marxism-Leninism Book Club became more and more widely accepted in Jirin thanks to the key members of "Down with Imperialism" Association. Our rank of young revolutionaries grew fast. We had students leave for villages right after their Saturday classes and return home Sunday evenings. In this way, they were able to work with peasants every week.

As our organizations, some legitimate and some underground, grew and grew in Jirin and Musong regions, we saw a crying need to consolidate these into a single unified organization. Thus we formed Anti-Imperialism Youth Association and later renamed it Young Korean Communist Association. At the time, I was involved with all organizations and acted as the main liaison among them. Choe Chang Gul, Kim Won Wu and Geh Yiung Chun acted as concerned communist youth and had no official title. It was clear that we needed a more effective way.

In those days, Japanese imperialists were busily planning to invade Manchuria and waged savage war against the Korean people; they induced reactionary Chinese warlords to help oppress the Korean people. Young Koreans rose up against the Chinese warlords and Japanese imperialists at various locations in Manchuria, and they were in need of an effective leadership. Old-time Korean nationalists and Korean communist factions fought over hegemony and Korean youth had no leadership to speak of. There were several youth associations in Manchuria at the time: Korean Communist Youth of Manchuria (an underground organization), South Manchuria Korean Youth, North Manchuria Youth, East Manchuria Youth, Jirin Youth, Kilwha Youth, Three Province Youth and several other organizations vied for membership. Various factions worked feverishly to line up youth associations. Sometimes, it was not clear whose hands you were shaking.

To be frank about it, if Korean communists had their acts together in those days, it would have saved us much grief and sacrifices. Even though we had communist parties. Korean communist youth organizations derived no benefits from the communists. It was a sad situation. Korean revolution had many internal problems; every step forward was met with obstacles and difficulties. We had to deal with old-time nationalists, communist factions, our Chinese hosts and foreign communist parties and faced problems after problems. Furthermore, Korean communists in Manchuria faced suppression campaigns by Chinese warlords and Japanese militarists.

Under these circumstances, there was an urgent need for experienced and effective leadership. By this time, we had enough experience in leadership through our work with "Down with Imperialism" Association, which had spawned a hardcore cadre of communist leaders, untainted by bad habits of old-time communists of Korea. I decided to establish Young Korean Communist League and drafted its charter and platform. I emphasized that the new organization must avoid factionalism and work for Korean revolution. On August 28, 1927, we formally established the League at the basement of Yakwang Temple. In attendance were Choe Chnag Gul, Kim Won Wu, Geh Young Chun, Kim Hyok, Cha Kwang Su, Huh Yul, Park So Sim, Park Gun Won, Han Young Ae and other members of Anti-Imperialism Youth Association and young communists.

At the meeting, I gave a speech, which was published in a booklet. On that day, we linked our arms and sang International as we did when we formed "Down with Imperialism" Association. The new organization was an underground association of young Korean communists and its primary mission was to lead and organize Koreans for revolution and independence; it was a vanguard for mass revolutionary movement. We paid special attention to keep our members pure; we were on guard against Japanese, Chinese and Korean informers and saboteurs infiltrating our organization. Our members held open discussions on imperialism, colonialism, Korean independence and other topics. Our members went through a rigorous program of thought purification and self-critique. Members were expected to follow our rules and regulations. Our members were assigned to various tasks and their performance was closely monitored and critiqued. In this way, our members grew more and more effective in revolutionary works.

Our membership grew in leaps and bounds; in a short time period, our influence reached not only Jirin and its neighboring regions, but also Donwha, Honggyong, Whajun, Musong, Ahntung, Bansuk, Jangchun, Harbin and other key towns of Manchuria and northern provinces of Korea. The League had fulfilled its mission of leading Korean revolution. Even though, Korea had communist parties, it fell on the League to lead not only the youth of Korea, but also workers and farmers of Korea. After forming the League in secrecy, we quietly joined the mass. We worked for Korean revolution and sought no fame or recognition for our achievements. Korean revolution and independence were our rewards. The young members of the League became the founding fathers of the new Korean Communist Party formed in summer of 1930.

Not long ago, we made August 28th, the day the League was formed, the Youth Day of Korea.

3.8. Expanding the Organization

---

Following the formation of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League and the Young Communist League we widened our activities over a vast area. In order to expand the organization, the hardcore elements of the YCLK and AIYL left Jirin. Although I was a student in those days, I also used to visit various places. I even frequented places several hundreds of miles away from Jirin in order to seek a new theatre of activity. I would leave Jirin by the evening train on Saturday and return by the night train the following day after visiting places such as Jiaohe, Kalun and Guyushu. Sometimes due to unavoidable circumstances I would miss classes. Most of the teachers with the exception of the headmaster, Li Guanghan and teacher Shang Yue, regarded my behavior as very strange. Some people even guessed that probably I was working to pay my school fees because I had no father and my family was poor.

Being a student, many restrictions and limitations were imposed on me. I was always short of time because I had to attend classes, study after school and supervise the work of various organizations in every spare moment. It was during my school holidays that I could conduct my activities freely without the restriction of time. At ordinary times we would make preparations and, when our holidays came, visited various places to form organizations and enlighten the masses. Going among the people was a trend in the homeland, too.

During their holidays many students in the homeland visited the farmers to educate them. In the summer of the year when I was attending Whasong Military Academy, the newspaper Choson Ilbo formed enlightenment groups of students from secondary schools and older who were returning to their home villages during their holidays and sent them to the countryside after giving them a short course. Back in their home villages those students in the enlightenment groups conducted a campaign to abolish illiteracy by using the textbook on the Korean language prepared by the newspaper.

Those Korean students who were studying in Japan also returned to their homeland during their holidays. They formed lecture tour groups and visited various parts of the country to conduct enlightenment work. The youth associations belonging to the Chondoism and Christianity also visited the farmers and promoted the work of arousing the rural communities.

But the enlightenment movement conducted by the students at home did not develop to the level of revolutionizing and organizing the masses; it was confined to a mere reformist movement aimed at overcoming the nation's backwardness. This was owing to cruel suppression by the authorities of the Japanese government-general that regarded all national movements aspiring to the development of national consciousness as against their colonial rule, and to the ideological limitations of the leaders of such movements. Even the enlightenment movement started to decline in the middle of the 1930s.

That this movement was merely a reformist movement can be seen clearly from the activities the students conducted in the rural areas. The main aspect of their activities was to abolish illiteracy and reform the living environment in the rural communities to make it more healthy. The activities conducted by the members of the Christian youth association included all kinds of cultural enlightenment aimed at guiding and inducing the rural population to lead a modern life. Their activities embodied a campaign to improve cooking and a movement to keep wells clean, and then proceeded to explaining chicken-raising and silk making and how to understand the certificates and applications issued by the authorities.

Taking advantage of the favorable conditions in which there was no direct suppression by the Japanese imperialists, we paid great attention to gearing our activities to enlightening the rural communities to conduct a positive political struggle; we closely combined these activities with those to organize the masses and make them revolutionary. Our work with the masses was conducted in such a way as to awaken them with education in patriotism, revolutionary education, anti-imperialist education and class education as the main aspect and to unite them in various mass organizations.

We made every possible effort to make the masses revolutionary. We did so because we had broken with the old way of thinking that the masses were only ignorant and uncivilized people who needed enlightenment; we held the view that the people were our teachers and the main motive force behind the revolution, and we made this view our absolute belief. With this point of view we went among the people.

From that time on this became my motto throughout my life. I started my revolutionary activities by going among the people and today, too, I am continuing to make the revolution by mixing with the people. I am also reviewing my life by going among the people. If I had neglected contact with the people just once and forgotten the existence of the people even for a moment, I would not have been able to maintain the pure and genuine love for the people which I formed in my teens and become a true servant of the people. Whenever I think of our society today in which the rights of the people are fully ensured and their wisdom and creativity are displayed without limitation, I feel grateful to the vehicle which first took me to the people when I was in Jirin. It was during the winter holidays of 1927 that we first went among the people in real earnest.

The winter holidays were a bed of roses for the children of rich families. They either spent the whole winter at home reading love stories or traveled by train to such large cities as Changchun, Harbin and Beijing to see the sights. On lunar New Year's Day they prepared tasty food and made merry with fireworks. The Chinese have the custom of celebrating for a month from January 1 to February 2 by the lunar calendar. They call February 2 by the lunar calendar longtaitou (the day when the dragon raised its head), and finish their holiday only when they have eaten all the pigs, even the heads, which they killed in January. But, we could neither go sightseeing nor enjoy the holidays as they did. Instead, we thought about how we could do more for the revolution during the holiday.

When our holiday started I went to Changchun, taking with me the members of our art troupe. No sooner had I returned from there than I left for Fusong. Park Cha Sok and Kye Yong Chun also went to Fusong with me, having agreed to spend the winter at my home. We were very busy during that winter holiday. As soon as I reached home I was surrounded by the members of the Saenal Children's Union. They told me about the difficulties the union was encountering in its work.

From what the chairman of the union told me I realized that there were many problems to be solved. In order to settle their difficulties we devoted a great deal of time to working with the members of the Saenal Children's Union. We told the leading members of the union how they should conduct the activities of the art propaganda troupe, how they should conduct social activities, how they should work with the masses and how they should conduct the internal work of the union. At the same time, we frequently attended political symposiums and meetings to assess the conduct of the members.

Following an improvement in the work of the Children's Union we formed the Paeksan Youth League with hardcore young people from the area of Fusong. We gave it the name of the Paeksan Youth League in that it was an organization of young people living around Mt. Paekdu. However, that organization was in fact a guise for the Anti-Imperialist Youth League. We called the organization simply a youth league instead of giving it the name of the Paeksan Anti-Imperialist Youth League because we wanted to confuse the enemy and disguise the organization. The Paeksan Youth League conducted overt activities in the guise of an organization under nationalist influence. By rousing the members of the Paeksan Youth League we ensured that night schools were set up in Chongwajae and other rural villages in the area.

I judged that, in view of the growing number and expanding ranks of youth organizations, a newspaper to provide ideological nourishment for young people and broad sections of the masses was imperative. But we had to start the newspaper from scratch. We wanted to print some 100 copies of each issue. However, we had neither a mimeograph nor paper. True, there was a small printing house in Fusong which was run by a Chinese man. But, in view of the content of the newspaper, it was impossible to rely on that print shop. After pondering over the matter deeply, I was determined to produce the newspaper by copying articles by hand. I mobilized the activists of the Saenal Children's Union and the hardcore members of the Paeksan Youth League to do this. It took us more than a week to transcribe 100 copies. On January 15, 1928 we finally published the first issue of the newspaper Saenal (New Age). It is hard to believe now that in those days we had the energy to write all the articles. I frequently miss the strength and youth we displayed in those days. At that time we felt the greatest happiness in devoting ourselves wholly to the revolution.

A youth who has no dream, no courage, no ardor, no aspiration, no fighting spirit and no romance is not a youth. In one's youth one must have a noble ideal and fight stubbornly to realize it whatever the difficulties. All the fruits which young people, who possess fresh ideas and a healthy and strong body, have cultivated and plucked at the cost of their sweat and blood are valuable wealth for the country. The people never forget the heroes who have created this wealth. A man in his latter years misses his youth because his youth is the period of his life when he can do most work. A man is happiest when he can do a lot of work.

Afterwards I had the newspaper Saenal printed with the help of a mimeograph I had obtained from some close acquaintances of my father.

The most conspicuous of our activities during the winter holiday of 1927 was the performances of the art propaganda troupe. The art propaganda troupe in Fusong comprised members of the Saenal Children's Union, the Paeksan Youth League and the Women's Association. This art troupe performed for about a month in Fusong and the neighboring rural villages. During our performance tour, we formed organizations and enlightened the masses in many places. Such dramas as Blood at an International Conference, An Jung Gun Shoots Ito Hirobumi and A Letter from a Daughter are literary works which we created and put on the stage in Fusong in the winter of that year. When the art propaganda troupe, prior to its performance tour, was performing in the city of Fusong, the warlord authorities arrested me for no reason and took me to prison. Some feudalists had informed against me to the authorities because they did not like the content of our performance.

Zhang Wei-hua, a primary school fellow of mine, went to a lot of trouble to free me. He persuaded his father to put pressure upon the police authorities to stop them from searching our house. Zhang Wei-hua's father had been an intimate friend of my father because he had formed a good understanding with my father in the course of visiting our house to receive medical treatment. Although he was very wealthy he was a conscientious man. When my father initiated the re-establishment of Paeksan School in Fusong and was anxious to get permission for it, he had to negotiate with the people concerned about the matter. Because such an influential man as Zhang Wei-hua's father put pressure on the police, the warlord authorities had no choice but to release me.

The Koreans in Fusong rushed to the warlord authorities and demanded that they release me. My mother roused the organization to action and urged the masses to work for my release. Even some influential Chinese figures condemned the conduct of the warlord authorities and demanded my freedom. A short time later the warlord authorities were compelled to set me free. After being released from the police station I left for Fusuhe village at the head of the art propaganda troupe. The art propaganda troupe put on performances in this village for three days.

People from the neighboring villages came to see our performance. So news about it spread widely around the surrounding settlements. Having seen of our performance, some people from Tunzidong came to invite us to their village. We accepted their invitation with pleasure. The performance in Tunzidong was a great success. At the request of the villagers we had to extend our stay several times. After the first performance, the chairman of the Saenal Children's Union rushed backstage and told me that the village elder had sent for me.

An elderly man with a noble presence, a pipe in his mouth, was waiting for me outside the house where we had just given our performance. He was gazing at me attentively from beneath his long, thick eyebrows. The young man from Tunzidong who had guided us to his village approached me and told me that the elderly man was "Cha Cholli." (Cha is the family name and Cholli means a thousand ri, i.e., 250 miles.) No sooner had I heard the name Cha Cholli than I bowed my head, saying:

"Sir, I am sorry that I am greeting you only now. I have not been able to greet you earlier because I heard you had gone out to the neighboring village.”<

"I heard about your art troupe there and have rushed back. Is it correct that you are the son of Mr. Kim Hyong Jik?"

"Right, Sir."

“With a son like you, Mr. Kim can rest easy in his grave. It is the first time in my life that I have seen such a fine performance.”

I was somewhat perplexed, for the old man was treating me courteously and formally. So I told him: “Sir, don’t talk like that, please. Why do you speak like that to someone who would be your own son's age?”

That day the elderly man invited me to his house. On my way to his home I asked him quietly:

“Sir, excuse me for asking you such an indiscreet question. Is it true that you cover 250 miles a day?...”

“Ha, ha! So you, too, have heard that rumor. In the prime of my life I could cover half that distance.”

Hearing him I realized that the elderly man Cha Cholli must have been a great fighter for independence as he was painted. There was a reason that his surname was followed by a nickname Cholli instead of his real name. Because of his nickname Cholli the elderly man was considered a mysterious figure among the Koreans in Manchuria. During his lifetime my father had once expressed his admiration for the fast walking-speed of the elderly man. Then he told me that the nickname Cholli had been used for the elderly man from the time when he had conducted volunteer activities in the Kanggye area.

After coming to Manchuria Cha Cholli had belonged to Chamuibu and been a subordinate of Sim Ryong Jun. I was told that he had most resolutely opposed Chamui-bu being placed under the rule of the Shanghai Provisional Government. Some people from Chongui-bu who were against the idea of an organization of the Independence Army falling under the jurisdiction of the Provisional Government, highly praised the stand of the elderly man. Among the people in Chongui-bu, the leadership body of which mostly consisted of ex- soldiers, the tendency prevailed of being dissatisfied with the Provisional Government which was made up of an overwhelming majority of civil officials.

That day elderly Cha Cholli told me a lot which would later serve as a lesson for me. He lamented bitterly over the fact that we had been deprived of our country owing to the corrupt and incompetent feudal rulers, although the Korean nation had previously been quite able to repulse the Japanese imperialist aggressors and develop as the dignified people of an independent state. He told me that one must not merely talk if one wants to conduct the independence movement and that one must take up arms and kill more Japanese. In addition, he said that we must sharpen our vigilance against the Japanese imperialists because they were extremely crafty; then he told me the following story:

“Have you ever heard how the Kyongsong Match Factory was ruined? The matches produced at this factory had the trademark ‘Monkey’ and were very famous. Although the matches themselves were good, the trademark caught the eye of people because it was so strange. The trademark showed a monkey with a peach branch on its shoulder. It is said that the Japanese built a match factory in Korea, but they did not make much money from it because of its matches. So, after contriving various artifices they bought tens of thousands of boxes of ‘Monkey’ matches, went to a desert island and there soaked all the matchsticks in water. Then they dried them and sold them at the market. Everyone who bought these matches found that they were not fit for use because they did not light, so they bought only the Japanese matches. The Kyongsong Match Factory went bankrupt. That is what the Japanese are like.” Although it was impossible to confirm the truth of the story, it was very valuable in understanding Japanese imperialism.

The old man told that when the Japanese fired five shots with a five-chambered rifle he, in the prime of his life, could fire three shots with a matchlock. He added that now that he was confined to his home and was unable to fight any more because of his old age, he had become anxious and found it unbearable. I criticized Li Je U for his narrow point of view. This is what I told him:

“Needless to say, I don’t deny the proposition of Marx that religion is opium. However, you are mistaken if you think that this proposition can be applied in all cases. Do you think it right to brand as opium Chonbulgyo, a religion which prays for dealing out divine punishment to Japan and blessing the Korean nation? I regard Chonbulgyo as a patriotic religion and all the believers in this religion as patriots. Our only task is to rally these patriots into a single force.”

Li Je U and I exchanged opinions seriously. In the course of this we reached the conclusion that we should not destroy the religion of Chonbulgyo but actively support the anti-Japanese feelings of the believers in it. So I stayed there for about ten days and worked among the villagers. The believers in Chonbulgyo readily agreed with me when I said that one could not liberate the country merely by believing in a religion.

Indeed, that winter the people of Naidaoshan were utterly sincere in their treatment of us. The principal food of the people of Naidaoshan was potatoes. Potatoes mixed with kidney-beans was peculiarly tasty. Kye Yong Chun even joked, saying that the flat pieces of stone covering the floor of the room would crack because of people passing wind. If we had judged the situation merely on the strength of Li Je U’s report in Jirin without going to Naidaoshan, or of rumors, we would not have gained a favorable impression of the religion of Chonbulgyo. We were able to appreciate the religion of Chonbulgyo and its believers fairly because we went to Naidaoshan and saw the Tongdok Palace and the sincerity of the believers as they offered up prayers, as well as the ears of millet hanging from the main beam of every roof.

It is never possible to possess a popular personality and a popular way of thinking that conform to the interests of the people if one only sits at one’s desk. Nor can one possess them by indulging in empty talk. They can be attained only through direct contact with the people to enable one to see and apprehend personally, with one's own eyes and ears, the feelings of the people, their glances, the countenance, their manner of speaking, their gestures and their behavior, not to mention their voice. We gave precedence to political work to educate the villagers. Then we formed a village branch of the Paeksan Youth League and Children's Expeditionary Corps.

After I returned to Jirin my uncle Hyong Gwon took charge of the work of the Paeksan Youth League. Together with Li Je U he formed branches of this youth league in many villages in the area of Changbai such as Toksu, Tokgol, Cholgol, Yaksudong, Imsugol and Zhiyangjie as well as in the different areas of the homeland such as Sinpa, Pochon, Hyesan, Kapsan and Samsu. The Paeksan Youth League entrusted the task of taking charge of its Changbai area organization to Li Je U. He discharged this heavy responsibility with credit. My uncle Hyong Gwon and Li Je U underwent many trials in working to make the area around Mt. Paekdu revolutionary. Thanks to this we got a lot of support from the masses when we were conducting our revolutionary struggle later in this area.

One's holidays are periods when one stops studying and takes a rest for a while. However, during the winter holiday of that year I learned a lot which I would not have been able to learn from books. After returning to Jirin from our winter holiday we reviewed the work conducted by the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League over the previous six months and set the task of forming more mass organizations for various social strata involving young people and other people from all walks of life.

In order to implement this task, hardcore members of the Young Communist League such as Kim Hyok, Cha Gwang Su, Choe Chang Gol, Kye Yong Chun and Kim Won U left for Xingjing, Liuhe, Changchun, Yitong and Huaide Counties and for Korea. There they rapidly increased the numbers of various kinds of mass organizations such as the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League.

I stayed in Jirin and conducted the work of organizing the Peasants Union in Xinantun. Uniting the peasants in an organization is the work of preparing them as the motive force of the revolution. In particular, under the circumstances in our country where the peasants made up the vast majority of the population, winning them over was a matter of key importance on which depended the victory of the revolution.

We went to Jiangdong village and organized there the Peasants Union, a branch of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League and the Women's Association. Following this we formed branches of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League in Kalun and Dahuanggou.

In the area of Jiaohe, too, we formed a branch of the AntiImperialist Youth League. It was after I met Kang Myong Gun, head of the organizational department of the Ryosin Youth Association, that I established relations with the young people in Jiaohe. This man seemed to have heard a great deal about me from Chang Chol Ho. Jiaohe was like an intermediary stop for Chang Chol Ho. Whenever he travelled between Jirin and Fusong he dropped in at Kang Myong Gun's house in Jiaohe and informed him of the movement of the young people and students in Jirin. Then, when he returned to Jirin, he told me the news from Jiaohe. This is how Kang Myong Gun came to know me and I became interested in the youth movement in the Jiaohe area. It was at this time that Kang Myong Gun came to Jirin to see me. In those days I was staying at Chang Chol Ho's house in Dongdatan to attend school.

Kang Myong Gun was more than 10 years older than me. However, he addressed me as "Sir" all the time and confided to me all the sufferings he was undergoing in his work and impatiently appealed to me for help. I could not help feeling sympathetic towards him, and could not but admire his revolutionary ardor, for he had come to visit me who was no more than an ordinary secondary school pupil, from Jiaohe which was 45 miles from Jirin. In Jiaohe County in those days the Ryosin Youth Association was operating in the northwest and the Lafa Youth Association was active in the southeast with the Lafa Mountains as the boundary.

The young Korean people in the Jiaohe area were mainly involved in these two youth organizations. Initially the young people joined an organization with a noble aim. However, they gradually became disillusioned at the conduct of the leaders of the nationalist movement who only struggled for power and collected funds. At the same time they were stunned by the empty talk of the pseudo-Marxists who clamored only for the "proletarian revolution" and "hegemony

This was more than enough for me to understand the feelings of Kang Myong Gun when he said that they were in confusion and unable to find a path to follow. I told Kang Myong Gun about the state of the movement of the young people and students in the Jirin area and about the experience we had gained in our work. I also told him to make good preparations, when he was back in Jiaohe, for forming a branch of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League. And, when he was leaving, I gave him many Marxist-Leninist publications.

Although I had tried hard to awaken him in all sincerity, I could not feel easy about the work in Jiaohe after Kang Myong Gun had returned there. After being determined for some time to visit Jiaohe, I went there at last through Laoilling. It must have been the spring of 1928. Kang Myong Gun was delighted to see me, saying that he had been thinking of visiting Jirin again. He said that, although nothing had seemed to be a problem when he was in Jirin, he had found many problems upon his return.

The rural youth in Jiaohe disagreed firstly on the matter of how to form the organization. Some claimed that, because the Ryosin Youth Association was an organization of nationalists, they should break with it immediately and form the Anti-Imperialist Youth League comprising those who shared the same idea. Others insisted that they should break up the Ryosin Youth Association.

On the problem of whom they should admit into the organization, too, they did not have a correct view. They excluded acceptable young people from those wishing to be admitted into the organization claiming, for instance, that it was difficult for some people to become members of the organization because they were "hostile elements" or "waverers."

I spent the day with the villagers in a room they used for enjoyment. Lying there with my head on a wooden pillow, I told them that in order to form an organization it was necessary to win over as many people as possible and that, to this end, it was important to educate and persuade people persistently instead of dividing them into one side or another.

I also told them about the need to prevent young people from being affected by the nationalists and factionalists and to increase the role of the progressive hardcore young people in the Ryosin Youth Association and Lafa Youth Association. I also discussed their tasks with them one by one. Then I selected five hardcore young people from the Ryosin Youth Association and formed the Jiaohe branch of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League with them. After that I visited the Jiaohe area frequently and worked with the members of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League there.

I also started to unite in our organization the young people in the General Federation of Korean Youth in East Manchuria. In those days most of the young Korean people who were studying in Longjing were involved in the General Federation of Korean Youth in East Manchuria. They were under the influence of the Tuesday group.

But, Kim Jun, a pupil from Tonghung Middle School who was working as the head of the organizational department of this organization, came to see me after reading the magazines and pamphlets we had issued in Jirin. Through him I learned about the situation of the youth movement in the area of Longjing.

After his return from Jirin, Kim Jun maintained contact with me and started to spread my ideas among the pupils of various schools in Longjing such as Taesong Middle School, Tonghung Middle School and Unjin Middle School. Through them we taught our progressive idea to the young people of Jiandao and in the area within the jurisdiction of six towns in the homeland, including Hoeryong and Chongsong.

In those days I also paid attention to dealing with workers. In Jirin there were many factories, large and small, such as a thermal power station, a locomotive depot, a match factory, a textile mill and a rice mill. However, there was no organization to speak of, no organization to embrace the working class. The only organization that existed in those days was the Hansong Association which was formed in the spring of 1927 with the aim of finding employment for Korean workers and helping them in their everyday life.

We educated a young man who had come to the rural area after working at the Jirin Thermal Power Station and admitted him to the Anti-Imperialist Youth League. Then we had him take a job at the power station again. Thus we established a foothold at the Jirin Thermal Power Station and started to rally progressive workers.

By rousing the members of the Ryugil Association of Korean Students, we organized a night school for the workers at the pier on the River Songhuajiang and, on such days as the anniversary of the March First Popular Uprising, May Day and national humiliation day, we visited them to make speeches and give art performances. On the basis of such preparatory work we formed the Anti-Japanese Trade Union in August 1928. The man in charge of this organization was a core member of the Anti-Japanese Youth League.

This was the first time for us to extend the domain of our activities to the working class and unite them in an organization. Until that time we had been expediting the awakening and organization of the young people and students, regarding them as the main object of our work.

We had this Anti-Japanese Trade Union, with Korean workers as its core, revitalize the Hansong Association, an overt organization. The Hansong Association gradually acquired a distinct political trend. Afterwards the Hansong Association collected subscriptions and sent them to the Wonsan Labour Federation in order to help the workers of Wonsan with their general strike. When Korea suffered from a flood disaster in the summer of 1930, this organization formed a relief association in cooperation with various Korean organizations and collected a contribution for the flood victims. This organization also played a major role in the struggle against the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project.

We accumulated extremely useful experiences in the course of reforming into revolutionary organizations, with Jirin and Jiaohe as the center, the youth organizations which were under the influence of the nationalists and factionalists.

It can be said that the life of a revolutionary begins by going among the masses and that it is over when he parts from them.

I think that if my days at Whasung Military Academy when I organized the DIU (Down with Imperialists Union) were the start of my work among the young people and students, my days at Jirin Yuwen Middle School when I formed and expanded the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League were the heyday of my work among the young people when I, going beyond the bounds of the students, went deep into the midst of all sections of the masses including the workers and peasants and sowed the seed of the revolution everywhere I went.

At that time people referred to the activities of the young communists from among the new generation and their influence, the "Jirin wind."

3.9. Showing Force of United Front

Having formed and built up our organizations we launched our practical struggle. The struggle began with a student strike at Yuwen Middle School in the summer of 1928. Until that time various matters concerning the running of Yuwen Middle School ranging from the management of the dining-hall, to the financial administration and to the operation of the library had been handled without problem in accordance with the democratic opinions of the progressive teachers and students. Our activities at the school were relatively free from restraint. This was a result of our struggle in cooperation with the school affairs committee.

However, the reactionary teachers manipulated by the warlords were never happy about this democratic system established through the joint efforts of the teaching staff and students. They tried to disrupt this system and deal with all matters at the school as they pleased. Among the teachers at Yuwen Middle School appointed by the Office of Education there were warlords' agents who were always on the alert. Reactionary teachers, such as those in charge of school affairs, moral education and physical training were all paid agents of the enemy's intelligence service. They manipulated the conservative students and young delinquents from the families of the landlords and bureaucrats who followed the warlords' administration in order to probe constantly into the students' ideological trends and the activities of the revolutionary organizations.

In the summer of 1928 we held mass rallies at the school almost every day to protest against the piratical second expedition of the Japanese imperialist troops to Shandong and the atrocities they committed in Jinan.

This expedition was an important event by which the policy of the Tanaka government towards China could be judged. Japan's first expedition to the Shandong area had been made immediately after the formation of the cabinet of Prime Minister Tanaka Kiichi in May 1927. At that time the National Revolutionary Army of Chiang Kaisek was advancing towards the Shandong peninsula in pursuit of Zhang Zuo-lin's army stationed in Fengtian. In order to protect the warlord Zhang Zuo-lin whom the Japanese imperialists had trained from Jiang's army that was advancing northward, the Tanaka government, on the pretext of protecting the lives and property of the Japanese, dispatched 2,000 troops from Lushun (Port Arthur) to Qingdao and later sent a reinforcement of 2,000 troops from Japan proper to the Shandong area.

Because Japan's first expedition frustrated the northward advance of Chiang's army and because Chiang guaranteed the safety of the lives and property of the Japanese resident in the Shandong area, the Japanese troops withdrew from the area that autumn.

But Chiang's army resumed its revolutionary advance northward in the spring of 1928, so the fascist Tanaka government decided to send a second expedition and moved its troops in Tianjin and 5,000 troops from the Kumamoto division in Japan proper to occupy the railway in the Shandong area and seize Qingdao and Jinan. Jiang's National Revolutionary Army also entered Jinan, and there was a clash between the soldiers of the two countries. The Japanese occupation army massacred many Chinese people in Jinan. A diplomat of the Kuomintang government was also killed by the Japanese soldiers.

The three shameless expeditions of the Japanese imperialist army to Shandong triggered off an outburst of resentment at the Japanese among the Korean and Chinese peoples. It provoked a strong protest and denunciation within Japan against the diplomatic policies of the Tanaka government.

Japan's ultimate aim in dispatching her troops to Shandong was to separate Manchuria and the Huabei area from continental China and make them her colony. She needed a lever for that aim, and this was to be Zhang Zuo-lin. Japan calculated that she could occupy Manchuria without great difficulty if she were to tame and support him properly. The shots that echoed in Jinan were a warning of a possible massacre of tens of thousands of people in China in later years. When the Japanese imperialists were freely killing even their compatriots in China in order to create a pretext for sending in their troops, the Chinese people had a premonition of the imminent misfortune that would befall them.

We organized public lectures, speeches and protest meetings to denounce the Japanese imperialist policy of aggression and the treacherous acts of the Kuomintang, and thus stirred up our fellow students.

The reactionary teachers labeled our activities as communist propaganda and thus created a pretext for repression. They suddenly raided the school library and seized the progressive books there. They put pressure on the headmaster, Li Guang-han, to expel all the Korean students from the school, pretending to have found some important evidence against them. They alleged that the Korean students were either communist masterminds or the "spies of Japan" and were hostile to the Chinese teachers, so they could not conduct the noisy classes they attended. By the same token, the Right-wing students wantonly violated the democratic system at the school, insulted the progressive students and slandered the headmaster and the progressive teachers. Shang Yue was the prime target of their attack.

If the reactionary teachers and the students they manipulated had been left to their own devices, it would have been impossible for us to continue our academic pursuits and the youth movement freely. With the aim of driving out the reactionary teachers and defending the democratic system by drawing on an organized force, we began a student strike centered on the members of the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League. Our demands were, first, that the treatment of the students be improved; second, that subjects be taught as required by the students; and third, that no more pressure be put on the progressive teachers and the headmaster.

The progressive teachers also threatened the provincial government, saying that they would enlist the help of the public if the students' demands were not met. Leaflets and written appeals demanding the expulsion of the reactionary teachers were posted everywhere in the city. They were also thrown into the boarding houses of the reactionary teachers and the provincial government building.

As the student strike at Yuwen Middle School reached its height. The other middle schools in the city threatened the provincial government that they would join the strike. The provincial government sensed that the student strike was spreading across the city; they reluctantly dismissed the reactionary teachers, including the teachers in charge of moral education, and accepted our demands.

That was our first victory in the mass struggle. In the course of this we became confident that we could emerge victorious in the struggle if we defined a proper target and organized the masses well. Through our successful student strike, we gained experience and training. The strike encouraged the young people and students to follow us with greater confidence. We reviewed the success we had achieved in the strike and made preparations for mobilizing the enthusiastic young people and students in an active anti-Japanese struggle on a grander scale.

The schemes of the Japanese imperialists who had long been speeding up their preparations for the invasion of Manchuria became more blatant around this time. In May 1928 Muraoka, the commander of the Japanese Kwangtung Army, planned to send the 40th composite brigade to Fengtian (the present Shenyang) on the excuse of dealing with developments in China proper, and to move the army's headquarters to Fengtian. Subsequently they blew up a train on a railway bridge at the entrance of Fengtian, the bridge where the south Manchuria railway and the Beijing-Fengtian railway met, killing Zhang Zuo-lin who was on his way back from Beijing to Fengtian. This was a deliberate prelude to the invasion of Manchuria.

If they occupied Manchuria, it would mean great difficulties for us who were active in northeast China. Until that time the Japanese imperialists could not deal with the Korean communists and independence fighters as they pleased because Manchuria was under the jurisdiction of China, but their occupation of Manchuria would alter the situation.

While making careful military preparations for the invasion of Manchuria, the Japanese imperialists, who had contained Chiang Jieshi during three expeditions and stretched their tentacles deep into continental China, speeded up the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project they had had been pushing ahead with for a long time as a part of their preparations, the project to connect Jirin, a provincial seat of Manchuria, with Hoeryong, a northern border town of Korea.

It was from the time of Emperor Meiji that Japan had harbored the ambition of laying such a railway, even if it meant resorting to force. The Japanese imperialists attached great strategic importance to this railway. After the so-called "Oriental meeting", the Tanaka government submitted a letter to the Emperor in which, referring to the importance of the railways between Manchuria and Mongolia including the Jirin-Hoeryong line, they called the project the key to Japan's policy towards the Continent.

As is well-known, the main state policy proposed in this notorious letter which underlined their ambition and delusion of world domination, just as Hitler's Mein Kampf had advocated the theory of world supremacy in Europe, was to invade Manchuria and Mongolia, and the essential lever for this invasion was the 5 railway lines between Manchuria and Mongolia, including the Jirin-Hoeryong railway.

In this letter Tanaka hinted that with the finishing of these 5 railways Japan would have a grand rail network connecting the whole of Manchuria with Korea and a direct line to north Manchuria, rendering it possible to move troops and the necessary military supplies to any part of the area and suppress the Korean national liberation movement. The shrewd brains in Japan estimated that if the Jirin-Hoeryong line was completed and the soldiers and goods were transported from Tsuruga in Japan to Jirin in Manchuria via Chongjin and Hoeryong in Korea, the distance and time of their transportation could be shortened considerably. This was why the Japanese imperialists proclaimed the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project to be their state policy and completed it in 26 years, in spite of all the difficulties.

The Chinese people at large, the young people and students in particular, regarded it as an encroachment upon the rights of the Chinese people for the Japanese imperialists to construct railways as they pleased in Manchuria by wringing concessions on the plea of the unfair treaty they had entered into with the corrupt and inefficient bureaucrats in the last days of the Qing dynasty. In opposition to the agreement on laying railways through the introduction of foreign capital, the masses of people rose up to have the agreement revoked.

Instead of heeding the reasonable demands of the people, the reactionary warlords tried to win them over through a grand inauguration ceremony of the Jirin-Dunhua line which had been planned for November 1, 1928, while scheming to undertake the Dunhua-Tumen railway project by force. A daring act was needed to frustrate the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project, an act to warn the enemy that the Korean and Chinese peoples would not tolerate his invasion of Manchuria. It would also give the popular masses a signal to resist the Japanese invasion of Manchuria.

In order to organize a mass struggle against the Japanese to frustrate the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project, we called a meeting of heads of the YCLK and AJYL organizations in the cellar of the Yaowang Shrine in Beishan Park early in October 1928. The meeting discussed slogans, methods of struggle and a course of action and gave each of us detailed assignments. It also discussed the placards, written appeals and leaflets to be used during the demonstration. In accordance with our policy that the struggle against the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project must be a joint undertaking by the Korean and Chinese peoples, we decided to write all the propaganda such as leaflets, appeals and placards in Chinese and Korean and to Conduct street agitation in the two languages.

The meeting decided that such organizations as the students' committees formed in the schools in Jirin, the Ryugil Association of Korean Students and the Korean Children's Association should be activated and that such underground organizations as the YCLK and the AIYL should refrain as far as possible from overt action. After the meeting at Beishan we worked all night to prepare for the demonstration. Han Yong Ae who belonged to the propaganda squad worked very hard. She, as a member of the Ryugil Association of Korean Students, had fallen under our influence during art performances and at the gatherings where impressions on books were swapped. Later she became a member of the Young Communist League.

A pupil of Jirin Girls' Middle School, she was good-natured but reticent and usually passed unnoticed. However, she carried out every task given her, be it difficult or irksome, for the sake of the revolution. During art performances she volunteered to play characters which others would not play, and when teaching materials for the reading circle were in short supply, she mimeographed hundreds of pages of her own accord and distributed them to the circle members.

She stayed up almost every night preparing for the demonstration. She took a mimeograph to a barn of a house and, with a few Children's Association members, duplicated tens of thousands of appeals and leaflets. She was known as a girl orator for the fiery speeches she made in Korean and Chinese to hundreds of people in the street.

I came to work as the head of the Young Communist League of Korea even among the Chinese young people and students because I upheld the banner of the communist movement from my early days in Jirin. When we launched the communist movement, the Manchuria provincial committee of the Communist Party of China had not yet been formed and there were not many young communist league members in Jirin.

While engaged in the work of the YCLK I also worked among Chinese young people. As we were at the helm of the YCLK, a great number of Chinese young people followed us. Cao Ya-fan who was the head of the Young Communist League organization at Jirin Normal School, and Chen Han-zhang who was in charge of the Young Communist League organization in the Dunhua area, were Chinese who maintained relations with us.

In the course of making preparations for the demonstration, we were informed that the railway authorities were intending to hold the inauguration ceremony of the Jirin-Dunhua railway on November 1, 1928.

We launched the demonstration a few days earlier than we had planned, with the aim of lighting the torch of opposition to the building of the Jirin-Hoeryong line at the same time as disrupting the inauguration ceremony of the Jirin-Dunhua line. At dawn on October 26, 1928, the propaganda squad scattered leaflets and put up written appeals in the streets of Jirin. Observation squads, each of which consisted of two or three members of the Children's Association, took their designated places at daybreak.

At the appointed time the students at all the schools in Jirin held simultaneous meetings and marched into the streets after issuing appeals against the building of the Jirin-Hoeryong railway. The streets were quickly filled with thousands of students. With placards reading, "Down with Japanese imperialist aggressors!" and "Oppose the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project by Japan!" written in Korean and "Down with Japanese imperialism!" "Down with the traitors!" and "Stop the Jirin-Hoeryong line project!" written in Chinese, they marched the streets and gathered in the square in front of the provincial assembly building situated outside the Xinkai-men Gate.\

Hundreds of soldiers and policemen checked their advance. The students, confronted by them, shouted slogans, awaiting our instructions. They had to advance at any cost. So we sent into action pickets made up of the workers and peasants living in and around the city, as well as the students, in order to protect them. The students, with the pickets leading them, marched forward shoulder to shoulder in the face of the bayonets. In the square a mass rally took place. I appealed to the thousands of people gathered in the square for the young people and students of Korea and China to unite and fight staunchly against the Japanese imperialists' building of the Jirin-Hoeryong line.

After the meeting the demonstrators' column marched in high spirits to New Street where the Japanese consulate was situated. The street was seldom frequented by the people because of the outrageous behavior of the consular police. The demonstrators shouted anti-Japanese slogans in front of the Japanese consulate, getting worked up, and continued their demonstration through Tama, Beijing, Chongqing and Shangyijie Streets as well as other streets in the city.

Hard hit by the demonstration in Jirin, the Japanese railway company indefinitely postponed the inauguration ceremony of the Jirin-Dunhua line. Japanese shopkeepers deserted their shops and fled to their consulate. The windows of the Oriental Hospital run by the South Manchuria Railway Company were smashed.

The demonstration mounted higher as the days passed. We formed several student groups and saw to it that they installed platforms in dozens of places in the city and delivered speeches against the railway construction from dawn until late at night.

The anti-Japanese struggle that had started in Jirin spread all over Manchuria. The students and citizens of Changchun, in response to our struggle, waged a fierce struggle against imperialism and the building of the six railway lines. They also raided the house of the head of the Jirin-Changchun railway bureau. In Harbin and Tianjin they conducted a brave solidarity struggle, with many people sacrificing themselves. Our Korean compatriots living in the Yanji area also joined the struggle. Newspapers in the homeland reported our struggle every day.

As the demonstration expanded, we pushed ahead with the campaign to boycott Japanese goods. The masses ransacked Japanese shops and burned the goods with Japanese trademarks in the streets. Some of them were dumped into the River Songhuajiang. Alarmed by the possibility of the struggle against the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project combined with the boycotting of Japanese goods developing into a full-scale anti-Japanese struggle, the barbarous Japanese imperialists instigated the reactionary warlords to open fire on the demonstrators. We had tried to keep the reactionary warlords in check.

But as they were suppressing us, hand in glove with the Japanese imperialists, we could no longer confine ourselves to this. The demonstration developed onto a wider scale coinciding with a funeral ceremony for the victims under the slogan, "Down with the reactionary warlords aligned with the Japanese imperialists!" That day the demonstration reached its height with the participation of many more citizens. The struggle continued for about 40 days.

In order to improve the situation, the Japanese imperialists sent for Zhang Zuo-xiang who was in Fengtian; but the appeasement measures the Jirin military control station adopted failed to check the surging spirit of the masses. This struggle was a heavy blow to the Japanese imperialists. They were particularly surprised at the united resistance of the Korean and Chinese peoples to Japan's aggression in Manchuria.

The nationalists and those who, frightened by imperialist Japan's invasion, had been thinking of turning tail, received a shock from our struggle. Up until then the nationalists had slighted the young people and students. Seeing that we, in our teens and twenties, had carried out something they had not dared to attempt, they changed their attitude towards us. From that time on they recognized that a fresh force from the new generation that was totally different from their own generation had appeared in the arena of the national liberation movement, and they ceased to slight us.

Through our struggle to oppose the Jirin-Hoeryong railway project we once again became keenly aware that the strength of the masses was inexhaustible, and we formed a firmer conviction that the masses, if properly organized, could display formidable strength that no force of arms could ever crush.

My faith in the strength of the masses became more unshakable and our method of leadership of the masses became more seasoned. In the practical struggle not only was I trained but also the organizations developed.

---

As the "wind of Jirin" blew across many areas of Manchuria, the Japanese imperialists and the reactionary Chinese warlords soon heard of our existence. The youth and student movement in Jirin, the Zhongdong railway incident and the incident of the conference of the General Federation of Korean Youth in South Manchuria, caused rumors of us to spread far and wide, and this made the enemy aware that the young people and students were at the bottom of the disturbances in Jirin and set him on our trail.

The Japanese imperialists planted their spies everywhere to keep a sharp watch on every movement of the Koreans prior to their invasion of Manchuria and, at the same time, egged the reactionary Chinese warlords on to arrest and imprison the communists and anti-Japanese independence fighters.

The situation in Jirin became extremely grave and ordeals were lying ahead of us. As the situation became more threatening, the factionalists who had been lying low in Jirin fled to Longjing, Panshi, Dunhua and other places and the independence fighters either disappeared into China proper with Chinese citizenship or escaped to places like Wangqingmen. Jirin in the autumn of 1929 was no longer the center of the political movement of Koreans abroad, the center which had once been crowded with anti-Japanese champions.

Then the students of Jirin Middle School No. 5 made a senseless fuss at a meeting of a reading circle, which caused our comrades to be arrested. As soon as I had returned from Wangqingmen and was busy trying to save the situation, I was caught in the web of the reactionary warlord authorities. The students of Middle School No. 5 had revealed the secret of the Young Communist League at Yuwen Middle School.

The police claimed that they had rounded up the leaders of the student movement and tortured us brutally every day. They were trying to discover details of the activities we had conducted and of our organizational network in the city, and to find the men behind the scenes. We decided not to say anything except that we had read some Leftist books. We held out to the interrogators, arguing, "What is wrong for a student to read books? We read books that are on sale in the bookshops. If you are going to incriminate anyone, you should lay the guilt first on the authorities who have permitted the publication and sale of the books, shouldn't you?"

One day when I was being put to finger-breaking torture, I saw Mr. Choe Dong O, the former head of Whasung Military Academy, looking at me for a second from behind a screen set up to one side of the interrogation room and then disappearing. It was such a surprise to me that I doubted my own eyes at first, wondering if it was merely an illusion. But it was Mr. Choe Dong O, there was no mistake. As they had gone so far as to summon my old teacher from Whasung Military Academy to the interrogation room, I thought, they were really digging deep into my activities.

The appearance of my old teacher set me thinking. He spoke good Chinese and was an able diplomat, so he was the chairman of the foreign affairs committee of the Kukmin-bu setup. He stayed mostly in Jirin to coordinate relations with the reactionary warlord authorities of the Kuomintang and maintained some ties with the young people and students. If he should disclose my past activities to the warlord authorities, my efforts to settle my case as quietly as possible might come to naught. Moreover, should any of the facts about my activities in support of the Soviet Union at the time of the Zhongdong railway incident come to light, I would not get away with my life.

Instigated and manipulated by the British, American, French and Japanese imperialists, the Kuomintang government and the Fengtian warlord of China had been guilty of treacherous anti-Soviet moves towards the end of the 1920s. Following the unsuccessful Guangzhou popular uprising, the Chiang Kaisek government shot to death the Soviet consul in Guangzhou and broke off diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union. This anti-Soviet move was the boldest move of Chiang Kaisek, who was flattering the imperialist powers in order to secure their protection and support. The slogan "We are against red imperialism" passed the lips of the warlords frequently. Craftily playing on the Chinese people's national sentiments, they covered up the truth about the imperialists' aggression and persistently stirred up anti-Soviet feelings.

Taken in by the propaganda conducted by the warlords, university students and young intellectuals said such bellicose and provocative things as "Let's take the Ural Mountains and seize Lake Baikal!" and "Let's water our horses in Lake Baikal!" as they turned their eyes to Soviet territory. Taking advantage of this atmosphere, the warlords attacked the Zhongdong railway as the first step in their anti-Soviet provocation. According to an agreement, China and the Soviet Union had been managing the railways jointly through a council, sharing its property and equipment with each other. The warlords seized the wireless station and management bureau by force of arms and captured the railways, unilaterally revoking the Soviet side's right of control. Following the seizure of the railways, they invaded Soviet territory in three directions across the border. In consequence, there was an armed clash between the Soviet army and the troops of the reactionary Chinese warlords. At that time some right-wing students at Fengyong and Dongbei Universities, abetted by the reactionaries, took up arms against the Soviet Union.

In order to check the anti-Soviet acts of the Kuomintang government and reactionary warlords, we roused the members of the Young Communist League and Anti-Imperialist Youth League in defense of the socialist country. Some politically ignorant young Chinese gave us a wide berth, vilifying us as evil people who were helping the "trespassers" on the national interests of China. This was very annoying. In many places in the city we distributed handbills exposing the true nature of the warlords' anti-Soviet moves and went among the Chinese people, telling them that the seizure of the Zhongdong railway and the invasion of Soviet territory by the warlords' troops was an inexcusable act of perfidy against the Soviet Union that had repealed all its unequal treaties with China and given material and moral aid to China after the October Revolution, and that this was motivated by a desire to obtain loans from the imperialists.

After hearing our explanation the people who had been deceived by the propaganda of the reactionary Kuomintang Party and warlords and taken a hostile attitude towards the Soviet Union came to recognize the danger and true character of the invasion of the Soviet Union, changed their attitude and position and denounced the moves of the reactionaries. In conjunction with the young progressives of China we dealt a severe blow to the students of Fengyong University who took up arms to attack the Soviet Union. Our activities in connection with the Zhongdong railway incident represented an internationalist struggle to defend the Soviet Union politically.

At that time we regarded the first socialist system established on Earth as a beacon of hope and considered it our solemn internationalist obligation as communists to fight in its defense. Our struggle in relation to the Zhongdong railway incident helped the Chinese people to see clearly the true nature of the warlords and to realize what the imperialists' motives were in manipulating the warlords to turn against the Soviet Union. The incident opened the eyes of the Korean and Chinese peoples.

In those days the Kuomintang warlords would not tolerate the pro-Soviets. Even after I had seen Mr. Choe Dong O in the interrogation room, the interrogators treated me only as the leading spirit of the reading circle. It appeared that the warlord authorities had asked Mr. Choe about my past activities and if I had had anything to do with the Soviet Union, as well as what sort of movement I had been involved in. But it seems that he said nothing against me.

After a while we were sent to Jirin prison. The prison was a cross-shaped building with the passages stretching in four directions? north, south, east and west. The passages were lined with cells on both sides, so that the warder might have a full view of them while sitting in the center. My cell was the second on the right of the northern passage. Being in the north, the room never got any sun all the year round. So it was unbearably musty and, in winter, its walls were white with frost. It was autumn when we were transferred to the prison, but it was as cold in the cell as in winter.

The warlord authorities employed national discrimination in their treatment of the prisoners. The warders would use insulting language like "Korean pigs" and "homeless Korean devils" and fetter the Korean students with heavy leg irons. The authorities drew a distinction between Korean and Chinese political prisoners in their diet and in the use of medical facilities.

I made up my mind not to give up my struggle in prison. It can be said that for revolutionaries the prison is a theatre of struggle. If one regards prison merely as a lockup for prisoners, one will lose the initiative and be unable to do anything. But if one thinks of it as a part of the world, one will be able to do something beneficial for the revolution even in a narrow walled-in space. I calmly began to cast about in my mind for a way to struggle. First of all, I decided to contact the comrades outside and restore and put into action the dislocated organizations within the shortest possible time. Also I decided to wage a struggle against the warlord authorities and hasten the day of my release.

In order to wage a struggle in prison, the problem was to establish contact with the outside world. The solution of this problem required bringing warders round and making them sympathetic towards us. My plan to win over the warders came off more easily than I had expected. The prison authorities had begun to repair the cells, so they kept us together with some infamous offenders for a while. This offered us a favorable opportunity.

One day a Chinese criminal, a fellow inmate, suddenly went down with influenza and took to his bed. He had been arrested on the charge of robbing a rich house, and he was very rough in his manner. When I was transferred to the ordinary criminals' cell, this man, who was known as "Kangtul," and considered himself to be important, demanded peremptorily that I should treat him to something, either money or food. A newcomer to the cell, whoever he was, was in duty bound to keep this rule. And he growled that I, too, should obey the rule. He was an extremely fierce and wild creature.

I fired back point-blank: I have spent days in the interrogation room undergoing severe ordeals, so where do you think I can get hold of money or food? As for a treat, would it not be more reasonable for you who have been in this cell a long time to give me one? At this "Kangtul" was tongue-tied and merely sat glaring fiercely at me, turning alternately pale and red.

He had always been so despotic that none of the other inmates would nurse him, but just looked at him with indifference, although he was suffering from a high fever and unable to eat or sleep. I covered him with the quilt that had been sent to me by the family of the Rev. Son Jung Doh when I was being taken to the prison and called the warder and asked him to fetch some medicine for the sick man from the prison hospital. The warder, whose name was Li and who disliked the gruff and unsociable criminal, was mystified to see a Korean looking after a Chinese with brotherly care. Because I nursed him devotedly, the sick prisoner soon got well.

After that his attitude towards me was different. Seeing that an infamous offender who was so perverse and fierce that even the jailers had found it hard to deal with had suddenly turned obedient to me, a secondary school student, the warder Li was struck with wonder and began to show respect for me. Of all the warders at Jirin prison he was a good-natured person with national consciousness. The members of our organization outside informed me that he was a man of low birth and that he had become a prison guard simply to earn a living. After finding out what kind of a man he was, I decided to win him over, so I seized various opportunities to speak to him.

Soon I came to know that his younger brother was having problems because he could not obtain the articles he needed for his marriage despite the fact that the ceremony was near at hand. When my comrades came to the prison to see me, I told them of the embarrassment of the warder and asked them to rouse the organization to help him. A few days later warder Li came and thanked me for the kind turn of buying the necessary marriage articles. Then he asked me if it was true that I was a communist, as the prison authorities were calling me.

When I answered that it was, he said that he could not understand it and went on to remark with great heat, "They say the communists are all bandits, but can it be true that such good people as you rob others? If it's true that you are a communist, it's absurd to label the communists as bandits." So I told him kindly, "The communists are people who struggle to build a society free from exploitation and oppression where all the people are equally well-off. We, the Korean communists, are fighting to expel the Japanese imperialists from the land of Korea and win back our lost country.

The rascals who are rich and powerful vilify the communists as bandits because the communists want to overthrow the rotten society where the landlords, capitalists, local squires and traitors to the nation rule the roost." At this, the prison guard said, nodding his head, that he had been taken in by the false propaganda of the authorities because he was ignorant, but that from then on he would never take them at their word.

After that Li made it a point to come to see me before going off duty, and he readily complied with my request to pass messages to the other cells. Before long I was able to communicate with the outside with his help. From then on I enjoyed considerable freedom in my prison life. But not all the warders treated me kindly as Li did. There was one unpleasant senior warder who would look into the cells through the peepholes and maltreat the prisoners. There were three senior warders in all at the Jirin prison, and of these he was the worst. When he was on duty, the prisoners were so cowed that they could not even yawn freely. So I decided to teach him a lesson. One day we held a discussion in the cell to select the right person to carry out the task.

A Chinese student from the third year of Middle School No. 5 in Jirin whose name was Huang Xiu-dian volunteered for the job. Of the students imprisoned because of their involvement in the reading circle only two were Koreans and all the rest Chinese. I asked him if he would not mind the pain of at least five months' solitary confinement should he be punished. He answered that he would consider himself a martyr for the sake of his comrades and would do whatever he could to teach the warder a lesson. He told us just to watch while he was correcting the senior warder by an ingenious method. He sharpened one of a pair of bamboo chopsticks, and when the man was peering into the cell through the peephole, he thrust the bamboo stick into his eye.

In addition to blood, a black liquid flowed out of the eye of the man. This was something nobody had expected. All the students in the cell applauded Huang as a hero. But Huang himself suffered terribly for this for several days in an unheated solitary cell in the cold winter. The students pressed the prison officials to release him from isolation, threatening to stab their eyes, too, if they did not release Huang. Finally the prison authorities yielded to the demand of the students. After that we did whatever we liked in the cells. We held a meeting when we wanted to, and visited other cells when the need arose. When I said I wanted to go to a certain cell, the prison guards agreed readily and unlocked the door for me.

While in prison, I received a lot of help from the Rev. Son Jung Doh. Through the whole period of my revolutionary activities in Jirin, the Rev. Son Jung Doh gave me active support just as he would his own relative. From his days in the homeland he had been on terms of close intimacy with my father. That might well have been because they had been fellow students at Sungsil Middle School, but I think rather that the community of their thinking and ideal drew them into a warm friendship. My father in his life time told me a great deal about the Rev. Son Jung Doh.

Immediately after the March First Popular Uprising Son Jung Doh fled to China as an exile and for some time held the post of chairman of the Political Council of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai. Then, in collaboration with Kim Gu, Cho Sang Sop, Li Yu Pil, and Yun Gi Sop, he formed the Veterans' Association with the object of training military personnel to conduct armed resistance and headed the Labor and Industry Department of that organization. But when the association was dissolved and a factional struggle developed in the provisional government, he felt disillusioned and moved to Jirin. In Jirin he set up a chapel and conducted the independence movement.

That was the very chapel which we used extensively as a place for educating the masses. Originally the Rev. Son Jung Doh was a very devout Christian. He was a man of consequence among the Christians and independence fighters in Jirin. Many Korean Christians were respectable patriots like Son Jung Doh who devoted their whole lives to the independence movement. They prayed for Korea and appealed to God to relieve the unhappy Korean people of their stateless plight. Their immaculate religious faith was always associated with patriotism, and their desire to build a peaceful, harmonious and free paradise found expression invariably in their patriotic struggle for national liberation. The greater part of the Chondoists and Buddhists were also patriots.

Since Son Jung Doh was an adviser to the Ryugil Students Association, I met him frequently. Whenever he saw me, he would say he felt chagrined and regret at my father's death at so young an age and encouraged me to take on my father's aspirations and work with devotion for the nation at the head of the independence movement. I owed my three-year-long education at Yuwen Middle School in Jirin to the generous help of my father's old friends like Son Jung Doh. The Rev. Son Jung Doh was worried about the hard life of our family and about my mother who did washing and needlework for other people, and gave me money for my school fees on many occasions. His wife, too, cared a great deal for me. On holidays she would invite me to eat Korean delicacies. The bean-curd and rabbit-meat stew and rice cakes mixed with a herb called jiondugi which I ate at their home was delicious. With leaves covered with soft down, the herb had neither scent nor toxin.

They said they had used the herb in making rice cakes since when they were living in Pyongyang. The rice cakes I ate at the minister's house that day had been prepared with the Jjondugi herb that had been picked in Beishan Park. Son Jung Doh had two sons and three daughters. The second son Son Won Tae and the youngest daughter Son In Sil took part in our movement in Jirin. Son In Sil, together with Hwang Gwi Hon, Yun Son Ho, Kim Byong Suk, Yun Ok Chae and other children, worked as a member of the Association of Korean Children in Jirin. She frequently went on errands for me when I was engaged in the youth and student movement and when I was suffering in prison.

One day the warden threw a new prisoner into our cell. The victim had been tortured so badly that it was almost impossible to recognize him. It was Kang Myong Gun, head of the organizational department of the Ryosin Youth Association. After his sudden arrest by the warlord authorities in the spring of 1929 no one knew whether he was dead or alive. So I was surprised and delighted to meet him again. He had been arrested on a false charge laid by factionalists who had informed against him to take their revenge on him for the incident of the General Federation of Korean Youth in China (GFKYC). The representatives of the Ryosin Youth Association to the meeting of the GFKYC held in Jichangji had withdrawn from the meeting and issued a letter of protest exposing the reckless acts of the factionalists. Out of malice against the protest, the factionalists had been plotting against them and, when a young man died of illness in Jiaohe, they informed the warlord authorities that he had poisoned the young man.

Kang Myong Gun complained with tears in his eyes that he was being punished for no reason. I encouraged him to fight against the warlord authorities and prove his innocence, advising him that a man who had taken up a great cause should not be dispirited because of such things and that there would be nothing impossible for a man who fought with determination, even until he died.

After that, he fought resolutely at the law court as I had told him to do. He lived honorably until the country was liberated. After returning to the liberated homeland, he received an appointment from the Party and worked faithfully with the allied parties. It was only after many years that I learned that he had been living not far from us. I sent a man to him to arrange an appointment for us to meet. The news must have been a great shock to him. To my regret, he had a cerebral hemorrhage before our reunion. If he had not died, we could have talked with warm feeling over our days in Jirin.

While in prison I analyzed the experiences and lessons of the national liberation struggle and the communist movement in our country and went over those of the revolutionary movements in other countries. Our nation had staged demonstrations against the colonial rule by the Japanese imperialists, conducted strikes, waged a Righteous Volunteers struggle and conducted the Independence Army movement against them. But all these struggles had failed. Why did all this bloodshed and all these struggles end in failure?

Factions had appeared in the anti-Japanese struggle and had done tremendous harm to the national liberation struggle. The Righteous Volunteers, which was the first to raise the torchlight of resistance to the Japanese and fought all across the country, had lacked unity of command. The commanders, who came from Confucian aristocratic backgrounds, had wished to restore the royal government, whereas the men, who came from among the populace, had demanded the reform of the outmoded system. The conflict and contradiction between them had seriously affected their fighting efficiency.

Some of the die-hard Volunteers commanders who advocated the restoration of the old system had even organized battles simply to win fame in the hope of receiving official appointments from the government. Such practices had broken the unity of the army. The Volunteers commanders who came from among the ordinary people had refused to cooperate with those of aristocratic origin. This tendency had weakened the army.

The situation with the Independence Army had been much the same. Its organization itself lacked unity and order. Even after the various independence movement organizations operating in Manchuria had merged to form the three major organizations, factional strife among them had continued. Although the merger of the three organizations resulted in the establishment of Kukmin-bu, the top level of the Independence Army had been divided into the pro-Kukmin-bu faction and the anti-Kukmin-bu faction, and their tug of war had never ceased. These nationalist factions were given to useless argument, each looking up to a major power.

Some of the leaders of the independence movement had wished to win Korea's independence with the backing of China, some of them had tried to defeat Japan with the help of the Soviet Union, and others had hoped that the United States would bring them Korea's independence on a plate.

The nationalists worshipped the major powers because they did not believe in the strength of the popular masses. Their movement had remained an aristocratic movement which was divorced from the popular masses. Therefore, it had neither a strong foundation nor support from the people.

The practice of some high level people of wasting time on empty talk and scramble for power instead of rousing the masses to the revolutionary struggle had also been in evidence among some self-styled communists. This was a serious weakness. The communists at the incipient stage of the struggle had given no thought to mixing with the popular masses, educating them, organizing them and mobilizing them in the struggle. They had been divorced from the masses, engaged in empty talk and a scramble for hegemony.

The factions that appeared in the early years of the communist movement had not been eliminated. The factionalists in our country were intellectuals who came from the nationalist line of the bourgeoisie or petty bourgeoisie or from the feudal aristocracy. Swimming with the tide in the years after the October Socialist Revolution when the labor movement was mounting rapidly and Marxism-Leninism was winning enthusiastic support from the masses, these intellectuals had plunged into the revolution in the name of Marxism. But, forming factions from the start, they had been engrossed in a tug of war to gain hegemony. They had employed every manner of fraud and trickery, and had even resorted to a free fight by forming terrorist squads.

Due to their factional strife, the Communist Party of Korea had been unable to ensure its unity and withstand the repression by the Japanese imperialists. Steeped in flunkeyism towards the major powers, the communists in the early years of the struggle had given no thought to organizing a party and fighting for the revolution by their own efforts; each faction claimed that it was the orthodox party and traveled about in order to gain recognition from the Communist International, carrying even seals engraved in potatoes with it.

I analyzed the situations of the nationalist and communist movements in our country and decided that the revolution should not be conducted in that way. I believed that the revolution in my country would emerge victorious only when it was undertaken on our own responsibility and by the efforts of our own people, and that all the problems arising in the revolution must be solved independently and creatively. This was the starting-point of the Juche idea, as it is known nowadays.

While in prison I pondered over the way to lead the Korean revolution. I racked my brains about the forms and methods I should employ in the struggle to defeat Japanese imperialism and liberate the country, how the anti-Japanese forces should be united, and how the party as the leadership body of the revolution should be founded. I also considered what tasks I should undertake preferentially after my release.

At that time, in view of the specific situation and the socio-class relations in our country, I defined the Korean revolution as an anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution, and formulated the fighting policy that an armed struggle should be waged in order to defeat the armed enemy, imperialist Japan, and to liberate the country, that the working class, the peasantry, national capitalists, religious believers and all other patriotic forces that were against the Japanese should be rallied under the anti-Japanese banner and roused to action and that a new revolutionary party, free from factional strife, should be formed.

Because I had acquired a clear viewpoint and attitude towards the Korean revolution and because I was able to visualize the line and policy, I felt an irresistible impulse to get out of prison as soon as possible. I resolved to fight for my early release. Together with the comrades who had been imprisoned on the charge of involvement in a "student incident" I made preparations to battle for our release.

A hunger strike was the method we adopted. We started the struggle with a grim resolve to battle until our just demands were met. Before we began the struggle I thought that it would be difficult to ensure unity of action in a struggle that was to enlist even criminals.

But when we went on hunger strike, I discovered that the meals were being removed from every cell without being touched. Even the criminals who used to fight among themselves over a bowl of food ate nothing. That was the result of the silent education given them by our comrades who had been arrested at the time of the "student incident."

Our comrades outside the prison gave us active support in our struggle. In response to our struggle in prison, these comrades exposed the inhuman treatment in the Jirin prison and won public support. The warlord authorities yielded to our united struggle. I was released early in May 1930. As I walked out through the arched gate of the prison, my heart was full of confidence and enthusiasm.

While in prison I made a summary of the early communist movement and the nationalist movement and, on the basis of the lessons I learnt from this, I planned the future of the Korean revolution.

As I remember, my father sought the way to switch over from the nationalist movement to the communist movement while he was in Pyongyang jail; I planned the Korean revolution while I was in Jirin prison. Being sons of an unfortunate, ruined nation, both my father and I had to think about the future of the nation while we were in prison.

4.1. The Rev. Son Jung Doh

I was released from prison at a time when the situation in Manchuria was dangerous. In the streets of Jirin the atmosphere was tense, as if martial law had been declared, as at the time of the incident of the anti-Japanese reading circle in the autumn of 1929. At every road junction and around the government buildings, gendarmes from the military control station were stopping and searching passing people. Armed soldiers and policemen could be seen searching houses in the back streets. Things were unimaginably dreadful with the whole of Manchuria suffering due to Li Li-san's Leftist line. At that time the May 30 Uprising was at its height in Manchuria.

The struggle which is called the May 30 Uprising by Korean historians was referred to as the "Red May struggle" by the Chinese people. We call it the May 30 Uprising because it began on the occasion of the fifth anniversary of the massacre that had taken place in Shanghai on the 30th of May and also because it was at its high point on the 30th of May. Li Li-san, who was at the helm of the Chinese Communist Party at the time, ordered the whole party to ensure that the working class, students and citizens throughout China should go on strike and, at the same time, develop the struggle in the form of an uprising and raise Soviet guerrilla forces in order to mark the anniversary of the heroic struggle of the Shanghai citizens in May 1925.

Photo: Rev. Son Jung Doh and his daughter. His church was the main meeting place of Jirin Korean expatriates; young Kim Il Sung attended Rev. Son's Sunday services while studying at a Jirin middle school. For further information on Rev. Son, see Rev. Son Jung Doh.

On receiving these orders from him, the revolutionary organizations under the Manchurian provincial committee convened meetings of shock forces throughout Manchuria by mobilizing the masses and encouraged them to rise in revolt under his slogan, "Victory first in one or a few provinces!" Leaflets and manifestoes calling on the people to revolt appeared in the streets of the towns and farm villages of east Manchuria. With the outbreak of the revolt, the enemy stepped up their attack on the communists to a degree never witnessed before. The waves of the attack had already reached Jirin.

After my release, I first visited the Rev. Son Jung Doh's house, which was in Niumaxiang. I thought it proper for me to express my gratitude, before I left the town, to his family for their unceasing concern for me over the seven months I was in prison. The minister received me in delight, as if it were his own son he was welcoming home from prison. "We were afraid that the warlords would hand you over to the Japanese. It is very fortunate for you to have been set free without being given any sentence," he said.

"Minister, my time in prison was much easier than I had expected because you gave me such strong support. I have been told that you gave the warders a lot on my behalf. I feel I must return your kindness. I shall never forget your kindness all my life, Minister."

The minister was preparing for a journey to China proper. I asked him why he was leaving Jirin so suddenly.

"Even Zhang Zuo-xiang has become powerless, so there is no influential person whom we can expect to protect and support us in Jirin," he said, heaving a deep sigh and with a sad smile on his face. "If he cannot help us Koreans, we have nothing to fall back on when the Japanese army comes to attack. I thought that once the three organizations were merged, the independence movement would advance without a problem. But when I see the unceasing tug of war among us I don't feel like staying here any longer."

In China proper he had friends from his days as the vice-chairman and chairman of the political council of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, as well as his former fellow members of Hungsadan. I imagined he had made up his mind to go there in order to get in touch with them again and work harder for independence.

He asked me what I was going to do at a time when the Japanese imperialists might invade Manchuria at any moment.

"I am going to raise a large army and fight a decisive battle with the Japanese imperialists, and that's all," I said. "To fight the Japanese with guns!" he exclaimed, looking at me in surprise. "Yes. There is no other way, is there?" "Remember that Japan is one of the five world powers. The Righteous Volunteers and the Independence Army were nothing when confronted with Japan's modern weapons. But if you are determined, you must be bold."

I was very sad to experience the cold and depressed atmosphere at the minister's house, something I had not noticed when visiting there in my early days in Jirin. Previously I had heard the sounds of a gramophone and the animated voices of the independence fighters discussing the political situation. I used to be able to see pious figures from his congregation and hear the plaintive melody of Don't Blow, You Wind! sung by the members of the Children's Association. But all these things had vanished.

The minister's close associates who frequented his house had all gone into hiding in Liuhe, Xingjing, Shanghai or Beijing. The gramophone which had emitted the doleful songs, The Site of the Old Palace and A Vagabond, was now silent. The minister himself went to Beijing later and stayed there for some time. Beijing was where Sin Chae Ho (alias Tanjae), a renowned historian and writer and his companion from the early days of his term of office in the Shanghai Provisional Government had been active. In that city the minister had many other comrades.

When the minister arrived in Beijing, he found that Sin Chae Ho had been arrested while landing on Taiwan for the purpose of working with the Oriental Union and had been sent to Lushun (Port Arthur) prison. Beijing without Sin Chae Ho seemed very lonely and dreary to the minister, for they were such close friends.

With a view to making our nation's long patriotic tradition and brilliant culture known to the younger generation and inspiring them with patriotism, Sin Chae Ho had devoted enormous time and effort to describing the history of Korea. He had once applied himself to the work of publishing to enlighten the nation. While in exile in Vladivostok he had published the newspaper Haejo Sinmun which had become popular. Park So Sim occasionally contributed articles to this newspaper because the editor Sin Chae Ho was renowned among the Koreans abroad and held in high esteem by them for his remarkable personality and literary style.

Sin Chae Ho was an advocate of the policy of armed resistance. He considered Syngman Rhee's diplomatic doctrine and An Chang Ho's "preparation doctrine" unrealizable and dangerous. He asserted that in the life-and-death struggle between the Korean people and the Japanese marauders, the 20 million Koreans must unite and destroy the enemy by violent means.

When some important figures nominated Syngman Rhee as head of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, Sin Chae Ho resented it and opposed it absolutely because he was against Syngman Rhee's mandate doctrine and autonomy doctrine. He said, "Syngman Rhee is a worse traitor than Li Wan Yong. Li Wan Yong sold out a country that existed, but Syngman Rhee has sold it out even before we have got it back."

That was a famous and stunning declaration made by Sin Chae Ho at a meeting where the provisional government was being formed.

In his "Declaration on the Korean Revolution" which he made after his withdrawal from the provisional government, he criticized Syngman Rhee severely.

Once, in an occasional recollection of those days, the Rev. Son Jung Doh said, "Sin Chae Ho was a man with an incisive mind and of unrelenting logic. I was secretly delighted when he condemned Syngman Rhee as a worse traitor than Li Wan Yong. His criticism represented public opinion. We shared his opinion. That was why he and I broke with the provisional government."

I think that from what he said one can judge the minister's political view to a certain extent. He had declared both the autonomy doctrine and the mandate doctrine to be delusions. He had questioned An Chang Ho's theory of the development of strength, but gave unqualified support to our doctrine that the independence of the country should be achieved by the resistance of the whole nation. This revolutionary inclination of his had led him to believe that it was no longer necessary to remain in the cabinet of the provisional government headed by Syngman Rhee, the flunkeys and political impostor. So he had taken a resolute step to break with the provisional government and move to Jirin.

In Jirin the Rev. Son Jung Doh got in touch with the reformists whom the Japanese police had defined as the "third force," and took an active part in the independence movement. He mixed well with younger people and gave them wholehearted support in their struggle. The chapel which was outside the Dadong-men Gate and in which he was working as the minister was practically a meeting hall for us. I frequented the chapel, to play the organ there and guide the activities of the art propaganda troupe. Because he complied with all our requests and gave us selfless support in our revolutionary activities, I respected the minister and followed him as I would have done my own father. The minister on his part loved me as if I were his own son. It was he who had masterminded the scheme for my release by bribing Zhang Zuo-xiang. He treated me not only as his friend's son but also as a revolutionary with my own independent political view. He did not even hesitate to bring a family problem to me for my advice, a problem which had been discussed in vain by his fellow independence fighters.

The minister's problem concerned his eldest daughter Son Jin Sil's marriage to Yun Chi Chang. The independence fighters in Jirin all objected to it. The minister himself was displeased, believing that his daughter had chosen an unsuitable husband. He thought that her marriage to the man would disgrace the family name. Yun Chi Chang was a younger brother of Yun Chi Ho, a pro-Japanese comprador capitalist. While the minister was annoyed with his daughter because he was unable to dissuade her from marrying the man, a conservative group from the Independence Army detained the man for a week in order to extract funds from him.

"So, what is to be done?" the minister asked me. I hesitated for a while because I was afraid of poking my nose into the matter of a marriage between my elders, before saying cautiously, "They have fallen in love with each other, so there is no way of separating them, is there? I think the best thing to do is to leave them to their own devices." Then, I persuaded the conservative group from the Independence Army to release Yun Chi Chang.

The minister returned to Jirin in the year following his visit to Beijing. Some people said that he had returned at the request of the radicals such as O In Hwa and Ko Won Am, but I am not sure whether this was true or not. Judging from the fact that he then remained in Jirin until the last moment of his life, the independence movement in Beijing had not been promising. It also appeared that he was not in good health. When I met him after my release from prison, he had said that I looked haggard, but I had found signs of illness in his face and worried about him. Because of his recurrent chronic disease, he had not been eating properly.

"On top of the country's ruin I am ill, so I sigh day and night," the minister said. "Even the Omniscient and Omnipotent is not kind to me. My exile seems to be taking a heavy toll of me."

While propagating his religion in Manchuria in 1912 he was arrested, suspected of being involved in the assassination of Katsura Taro, and exiled to Chin Island, where he wasted two years. Probably he had contracted the illness while in exile. I do not believe in superstition, but people who are loved and spared by the public seem to be vulnerable to attack by illness.

At Mingyuegou in the spring of the following year I heard the shocking news that the minister had died of his illness. The man who told me of his death said that he had died before his time at the Oriental Hospital in Jirin.

At first I took the news as a rumor. I could not believe that the minister had died so soon. It seemed to me impossible that the life of the minister who had been walking and talking about the future of the independence movement when I met him only six months before had been snuffed out like a candle in the wind because of a gastric ulcer. But the news, though unhappy, was true. According to information I received from an underground source he had died after vomiting blood on his first day in hospital.

Many people in the Korean community in Manchuria considered his death to have been murder. The first reason for such a conjecture was that the minister, just prior to going into hospital, had not been in such a critical condition. Another convincing reason was that the Oriental Hospital where he died belonged to a Japanese. The common view of the Koreans in Manchuria was that, since the Japanese were capable of using Koreans without hesitation as guinea-pigs in experiments on biological weapons, they could commit acts even worse than murder. The most convincing argument was that the Rev. Son Jung Doh was a renowned patriot. He had been under constant and strict surveillance by the Japanese police.

Apart from being suspected of involvement in the assassination of Katsura Taro, he was a thorn in the side of the Japanese police because of his life-long record in the anti-Japanese struggle as the chairman of the political council of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, its Director-General for Transport, a member of the Association for the Promotion of Political Strategy, and of Hungsadan and a councilor of the Worker-Soldier Association. How close an eye the Japanese had kept on the minister is illustrated by the fact that immediately after his sudden death the Japanese consul-general in Jirin compiled a special paper "On the Death of the Rebellious Korean Son Jung Doh" and sent it to his foreign minister.

As some people said that his nickname Haesok (a sea stone) reflected his personality clearly, so the Rev. Son Jung Doh was an honorable and honest fighter who, under the guise of religious work, dedicated his whole life to the noble struggle against the Japanese. In Jirin, in cooperation with the radical group of Chonguibu, he made tireless efforts to change the direction of the independence movement which had merely been swimming with the tide, and to unite the patriotic forces. At the time when we were forming the Korean Children's Association in Jirin and the Ryugil Association of Korean Students, he had proposed the formation of the peasants' mutual assistance society in Manchuria and had been working hard for its success.

The Rev. Son Jung Doh had bought 50 hectares of land by Lake Jingbohu in Emu County in the name of his younger brother (Son Gyong Do) and had run an agricultural company. This could be termed a part of the "ideal society" advocated by An Chang Ho. The area around Lake Jingbohu had been considered by An Chang Ho to be a particularly suitable place for the building of an "ideal society." The minister had intended to use the income from his company for the independence movement.

The minister's funeral was held solemnly, according to Christian custom, at the Fengtian Public Hall. Apparently, because of obstructions by the Japanese police, only a little over 40 people attended the funeral to mourn the death of a man who had dedicated decades of his life to national independence from the days before the annexation. Considering the fact that in his lifetime the minister had been surrounded by so many people and had inspired the spirit of patriotism in them, his farewell was too quiet and lonely. Since open mooring had not been allowed even at the funeral of the father of the nation in those days, could the mourners weep at a funeral under police watch?

At Jiandao I looked up to the sky above Jirin and wept without cease, praying for the soul of the deceased minister. I grieved over the death of the Rev. Son Jung Doh and of my own father. I made a firm pledge to liberate the country, come what may, in order to safeguard their souls and take vengeance on the enemy. I believed that liberating the country would repay my benefactors' kindness, relieve them of their suffering and break the people's shackles.

Since then, the minister's family and I have traveled different paths. The tragedy of division that still continues now at the turn of the century has been cruel enough to keep the barrier of a wire fence and concrete wall, as well as wide oceans, between us. We did not hear from one another for over half a century, I living in Pyongyang, Son In Ill in Seoul and Son Won Tae in Omaha (in the United States) without hearing from one another. But I have never forgotten the Rev. Son Jung Doh and his family. My memory of them has never been dimmed or stained by the passage of time and distance. The worse the national tragedy became and the higher the barrier of division grew, the greater our yearning for our benefactors and forerunners who shed their tears and blood for the sake of this land has grown in our hearts.

History has not closed its eyes to our yearning. In May 1991 Son Won Tae, the minister's youngest son, a pathologist, who lives in the city of Omaha, Nebraska, paid a visit to our country with his wife (Li Yu Sin) at the invitation of the Ministry of Reception for Overseas Compatriots. A weak primary schoolboy in his teens who used to beg to be on my side whenever the members of the Children's Association and the Ryugil Association of Korean Students divided into the "land" and the "sea" teams to play at soldiers on the sandy beach of the River Songhua Jiang appeared before me as a gray-haired old man nearing his eighties. The persistent work of 60 years of wind and frost had not erased the distinct features clear below his white hair of his days in Jirin.

"President!" he called me, hugging me, tears streaming down his cheeks, tears that meant more than could be implied in tens of thousands of words. What had kept us apart, when our hearts had been burning with a yearning for each other for so many years until our hair had turned gray? What was it that had delayed our reunion for more than half a century? Sixty years is a man's lifetime. We had parted in our teens to meet again only when we were nearly in our eighties in a modern civilization where airplanes fly at supersonic speeds! Isn't the passage of time too cruel and void, the time that had continued to push us to our old age?

"Mr. Son, how is it that you are so white-haired?" I asked him in an official tone of voice, treating him as an old scientist and as a citizen of the United States, not as a former member of the Children's Association. He looked at me with something of the air of playing on my affection as he used to do in the old days in Jirin.

"My yearning for you, President, has turned my hair white," he replied and then begged that I should call him by his first name, reminding me that in his days in Jirin he had followed me as if I were his elder brother and that I had loved him as if he were my younger brother.

"Then I'll call you Won Tae just as I used to do in the old days," I said with smile. Our awkwardness vanished, and we returned to our boyhood. It seemed as if I were talking to him in my lodgings in Jirin, not in my drawing-room in Pyongyang. In those days I had often visited the Rev. Son Jung Doh's house, and Son Won Tae had frequented my lodgings.

It was surprising that the reticent boy who was slight in build and used to go about with his head tilted slightly to one side just like Cha Gwang Su, the schoolboy of Provincial Primary School No. 4 who, once provoked to speak, never failed to excite the laughter of his listeners with his volley of witty jokes and humorous remarks, should appear before me as a pathologist, and it was also surprising that the boy should have become a white-haired old man in the twilight of his life. I was struck by the unbelievable change that had turned the boy into an old man who was taking me back to our remote boyhood when it seemed only yesterday that we had parted with each other in Jirin!

We talked at length about our boyhood, not only about the activities of the Children's Association but also about the happenings in the street where toffee peddlers used to collect the pocket-money of sniveling children. Those peddlers were really cunning. If they wanted to eat some toffee themselves, those peddlers would pick some from their booths, put it into their mouths and lick it until they were tired of it and then put it back in their booths. The children who bought the toffee did not even suspect such a thing. As we talked about these things, we laughed loudly, forgetting all our worldly cares.

Having said that I looked hale and hearty, contrary to the rumor in the West, he took me by the hand, drew it to him and looked into my palm for a good while. I was perplexed.

"You have a very long lifeline, so you will enjoy a long life," he commented with a smile. "You are held in high esteem as the leader of the country because you have a distinct leadership line."

He was the first man ever to read my palm, and it was the first time in my life that I had heard that there was a leadership line on a man's palm. When he said that I had a long lifeline, he must have wished me a long life; when he said that I had a distinct leadership line on my palm, he must have meant that he supported our cause.

Without the slightest sense that he was having an official interview with a head of state, he asked me, "President, when will you buy mejiangziguoji? I also want to eat the bingtanghulu which I used to eat with you, President, in Jirin."

I felt my heart leap at his request, for this was a request one made only to one's own brother. He was talking to me as if he were talking to his own brother. It occurred to me that he had no brother. His elder brother Son Won Il who was once the defense minister of south Korea had died some years before. No matter how I feasted him, it would have been impossible for me to give him the love with which his own brother had taken care of him.

Why can't I meet his wish to eat jiangzi guoji or bingtanghulu? Jiangzi guoji is a Chinese food resembling a doughnut which is sweetened and cooked in bean soup and oil. In Jirin I used to take him and his little sister to buy them jiangzi guoji now and then. They used to love eating it. When I thought of my indebtedness to the Rev. Son Jung Doh, I had wished in those days to buy them all that my purse could buy. But I could hardly afford to pay even my school fees.

I don't think that Son Won Tae asked me to buy him jiangziguoji because he really wanted to eat some. He must have wanted to express his yearning for the friendship we had shared like real brothers and sisters in our days in Jirin.

"If you want to eat some, I will have some cooked next time," I replied, prompted by my desire to serve some to him, although he had asked as a joke. I felt an urge to serve him with some right away, instead of waiting for the next meal. I was deeply moved by his casual request. Two days later my cooks prepared jiangzi guoji for Son Won Tae and his wife. Having eaten it before breakfast, he apparently said with tears in his eyes that, thanks to President Kim, he was eating the favorite food of his boyhood again.

Friendship is much stronger than the passage of time. The passage of time can make everything fade away, but not friendship. True friendship and true love neither grow weaker with age or stale. Our friendship that had been broken off temporarily because of the divergent courses of our life's journeys was linked again by bridging over a gulf of 60 years.

Having met after such a long interval, we sang together Nostalgia which we had used to sing in Jirin. To my surprise, I had not forgotten the words of the song and he, too, remembered it perfectly. Son Won Tae said that he was ashamed to see me because he had done nothing in particular for the good of the nation, but this was self-effacing of him. When he was a university student in Beijing he, as the head of the inspection department of a students association, took part in the student movement and in the boycott of Japanese goods. He was a young patriot. Because of his patriotic activities he had later been arrested and thrown into Nagasaki prison.

I could perceive in this man who had remained outside politics the untainted innocence of the boy in Jirin. It is by no means easy to preserve a clear conscience in the social climate of a battle for survival, in a world which is governed by the law of the jungle.

Son Won Tae expressed his heartfelt sympathy with all the work we had done as well as his great admiration for our country as a "beautiful and noble country, a land of construction for the well-being of the generations to come."

I was happy to have a reunion with Son Won Tae, though belatedly, and to have an opportunity to look back upon our days in Jirin. His image overflowing with love for his country, love for the nation and love for humanity was that of the Rev. Son Jung Doh and of Son In Sil. Whenever he saw me, Son Won Tae said, "President, please live for many years without growing older!" The look with which he wished me good health reminded me of the Rev. Son Jung Doh whom I had seen for the last time 60 years before.

That day, bidding farewell to me, the minister said, "Don't stay any longer in Jirin where the situation is dangerous. Things here are very frightening. Take care of yourself; the situation requires it. Even in Jiandao, you had better regain your health in an out-of-the-way spot for the time being."

I was deeply grateful to him for his kind consideration for my safety. The timeliness of his advice was proved eloquently by the developments in Manchuria after the September 18 incident. The Japanese army and police that occupied Jirin searched for me first. Checking the list of prisoners in Jirin prison, they demanded that the warlords hand me over to them. Had it not been for the support given me by the Rev. Son Jung Doh, Ko Won Am, O In Hwa, Hwang Baek Ha and other independence fighters, I would not have been released before it was too late and would have suffered some ten more years in prison in the hands of the Japanese imperialists. So many more years of imprisonment would have made it impossible for me to wage the armed struggle. It is in this sense that I call the minister the savior of my life.

There would be no end if I were to name all the people who helped me and gave me wholehearted support in my revolutionary activities in Jirin, among them such independence fighters of the previous generation as Choe Man Yong, O Sang Hyon, Kim Gi Pung, Li Gi Pal and Choe Il, such forerunners of my contemporaries as Choe Jung Yon, Sin Yong Gun, An Sin Yong, Hyon Suk Ja, Li Dong Hwa, Choe Bong, Han Ju Bin, Ryu Jin Dong, Choe Jin Un, Kim Hak Sok, U Sok Yun, Kim On Sun, Li Dok Yong, Kim Chang Sul, Choe Gwan Sil and Ryu Su Gyong, and such patriotic children as Li Dong Son, Li Gyong Un, Yun Son Ho, Hwang Gwi Hon, Kim Byong Suk, Kwak Yon Bong, Chon Un Sim, An Byong Ok, Yun Ok Chae, Park Jong Won, Kwak Gi Se and Chong Haeng Jong.

This suggested to me that the situation did not permit me to stay in Jirin any longer. I had more or less expected this while in prison. The minister was very sorry that he could not take care of me in his house and had to send me away. Grateful to him for his advice, I had lunch at his house and then departed immediately for Xinantun.

4.2. A Spring of Trials

On my way to Xinantun I met Cha Gwang Su. The boisterous man's eyes were sparkling with joy behind his powerful glasses. I was so pleased to see him that I hailed him from afar.

Saying that he was on his way to Rev. Son Jung Doh's house to ask after me, he held me in his arms and turned me round and round. He said that as his comrades in the revolution had all been arrested, he was feeling terribly lonely. He talked about the happenings in Jirin for a while and then, looking at me out of blood-shot eyes, said, "Song Ju, the labor movement in Korea is developing by leaps and bounds in all its aspects. The slogans, methods and character of the struggle - they are all fresh. I think the national liberation movement in the 30s will achieve a great change, particularly in the character of the struggle. What do you think of that? Our revolution should advance under a new banner to meet the rapidly-changing situation, shouldn't it?"

I was greatly impressed by the constancy of the man who, undaunted by and unafraid of the enemy's offensive in the alarming situation when it was difficult to save one's own skin let alone one's revolutionary ideals, was traveling in disguise, looking for his comrades and thinking of the future as a communist should.

"I agree with you, Gwang Su, that our revolution should advance under a new banner," I said and then explained what I had decided in the prison. "What, then, should that new banner be? While in prison I gave much thought to this and came to the conclusion that we young communists must now found a party of a new type and switch to an armed struggle. Only an armed struggle will save the country and liberate the nation. The struggle of the Korean people must develop into all-out national resistance, centering on the armed struggle and under the unified leadership of the party."

He expressed unqualified support for my opinion. We went to Xinantun and discussed the matter with Kim Hyok and Park So Sim. They agreed with me. It was the unanimous view of the young communists that it would be impossible to save Korea without taking up arms, or to develop the revolution without being guided by a new line.

An armed struggle was a mature requirement of the specific situation in Korea. The Japanese imperialists' fascist rule was at its height in those days. The Korean people, deprived of all their rights, were living in abject poverty. The waves of the economic crisis which had begun to sweep the world in 1929 hit Japan, too. In an effort to escape the panic through aggression on the Asian Continent, the Japanese imperialists intensified their colonial oppression and plunder of Korea and speeded up their war preparations.

When the Japanese imperialists discovered the way to enrich themselves and strengthen their army in the plunder and oppression of the Korean nation, our nation discovered the way to national revival in the battle against the Japanese imperialists. It was not by chance that the mass movements, including the labor and peasant movements, which had stressed the economic struggle began to move gradually towards a violent struggle.

At that time I observed the strike at the Sinhung Coal-mine with interest, the strike which developed eventually into revolt. Hundreds of coal-miners, under the guidance of the strike committee, raided and demolished the coal-inspection office and other offices, the machine shop and the power generator of the coal-mine, as well as the house of the director of the mine. They cut all the power lines in the area of the mine and destroyed all the winches, pumps and other items of production equipment they could lay their hands on. The strikers inflicted such a great loss upon the company that the Japanese management complained that it would take two months to reconstruct the mine.

The revolt resulted in the arrest of more than 100 people, something which was so terrible that it shook the whole country. This revolt made such an impression on me that in later years, when waging the armed struggle, I visited the Sinhung area, in spite of the danger, and met the leaders of the labor movement. A qualitative change was taking place in the struggle of the working class of Korea in its organization, unity, persistence and solidarity.

More than 2,000 workers affiliated to the Wonsan Labor Federation under the leadership of the federation went, with their families of 10,000, on a several month-long strike. At the news of the general strike in Wonsan, the workers and peasants across the country sent them telegrams and letters of encouragement, as well as solidarity funds, and dispatched delegates to express their support for and solidarity with them.

Apart from the trade union organizations in Hongwon and Hoeryong in the homeland, the members of the Hansong Association under the Anti-Japanese Labor Union we had formed sent them funds from Jirin, thousands of miles away from Wonsan. This shows how high the ideological awareness of the working class of our country was at that time. The general strike in Wonsan was an event that marked the high tide of the labor movement in our country in the 1920s and demonstrated the militant power and revolutionary spirit of the Korean working class in the history of the world labor movement.

While in prison I followed the general strike with keen interest, believing that it was a momentous event in the history of the labor movement of our country and that the fighting experience of the strikers was valuable and should be drawn on and learnt from by all the social campaigners of Korea.

If the new leadership of the federation had not instructed the workers to return to work but pushed the strike on to the bitter end, or if the workers, peasants and intellectuals across the country had gone on a full-scale strike in response to them, the struggle of the working class of Wonsan could have succeeded.

The failure of the general strike in Wonsan again convinced me of the pressing need to found in Korea a Marxist-Leninist party capable of organizing the struggle of the working class and leading it to victory. It also gave me the strong belief that a full-scale armed struggle as the mainstream of the national liberation movement would promote the mass struggle of the workers, peasants and all other sections of the population.

It was inevitable that the Korean people's struggle should assume a violent character when the enemy was clamping down upon the national liberation movement in such a brutal way. Revolutionary violence was the most effective way of defeating the counterrevolutionary violence of the enemy who was armed to the teeth. The saber-rattling enemy compelled the Korean nation to take up arms. Arms had to be countered with arms.

It was impossible to achieve the independence of the country merely by cultivating our strength through the development of education, culture and the economy, or by labor and tenant disputes or by diplomatic activity. The general strike in Wonsan and the revolt by the Sinhung Coal-miners gave us unbounded confidence in the Korean working class as well as warm affection for and a high sense of pride in our excellent working class and our militant nation.

But the question had arisen of the policy of struggle and the leadership. I had the firm conviction that we could defeat any enemy, however powerful, if we had a correct policy that suited the trend of the times, and led the struggle properly. I was impatient with my desire to rehabilitate and consolidate the wrecked organizations and to bring the masses to consciousness and organize and prepare them as soon as possible for the decisive battle with Japanese imperialism.

Meanwhile, my comrades who had heard of my release came to see me. I met the core members of the YCLK, the AJYL, the Anti-Japanese Labor Union and the Peasants Union in the Jirin area and discussed ways to rehabilitate the organizations quickly and rally the masses against the enemy's increasing white terrorism. The word "arms" which had so excited Cha Gwang Su also won the support of these young people. Their support was a great encouragement to me.

We discussed ways to intensify the work of the YCLK in Jiandao and the northern border area of Korea and to make those areas revolutionary quickly, methods to make substantial preparations for the founding of the party and some other tasks to be tackled immediately, and we sent political workers to various places to implement them.

I slept overnight at Xinantun and left for Dunhua. I decided to work in Dunhua because it was a vantage-point allowing me access to all the counties of east Manchuria and because I had many friends and acquaintances there who would help me. I intended to stay there for a while, showing the organizations the direction for their activities to cope with the situation in east Manchuria where the uprising was raging, while drawing up detailed plans for effecting the idea I had conceived in prison.

When leaving Jirin, I felt very sorry that I hadn't carried out the will of my late father who had wished that I should at least finish middle school.

Park Il Pa said he would get his father to negotiate with the authorities at Yuwen Middle School for my reinstatement, and advised me to finish my education there. Park Il Pa was the son of the nationalist, Park Gi Back, who published the magazine Tongu in Jirin. Park U Chon was a pen name. When I was attending Yuwen Middle School Park Il Pa, as a student at Jirin Law College, helped me in my work with the Ryugil Association of Korean Students. He was set on becoming a lawyer. At that time he was seeing a lot of a white Russian officer, learning Russian from him. My comrades, who regarded his behavior as a sort of betrayal of the new Russia, advised me to break with him. I said to them, "Learning a foreign language is very useful for the revolution. I think it would be shortsighted of me to ostracize him simply because he is friendly with a white Russian officer." After liberation Park was able to translate many literary masterpieces such as Tolstoy's The Ordeal because he had learned Russian in his school days.

Kim Hyok and Park So Sim, like Park Il Pa, advised me to finish my middle school education at any cost by studying for another year if my reinstatement was possible. They said that as the headmaster, Li Guang-han, was a communist sympathizer, he would not refuse my request, if I wanted to return.

"I can teach myself," I said. "The people and the disrupted organizations are waiting for us. So I can't return to school, because it would mean turning away from the revolution when it is in difficulty."

As I left Jirin without having finished school, I was tormented with various thoughts: the thought of my late father who had sent me alone all the way to my hometown in the winter cold, telling me to study in the motherland, who had taught me Korean history and geography when I returned home from school, and who, in the last moments of his life, had told my mother that he had wanted me to get middle school education, so she should follow his intention even if it meant her living on grass; the thought of my mother who would be disappointed at the news of my having left school one year before my graduation after the three years of unceasing effort she had made to earn my school fees by sewing and laundering until her fingers were sore; the thought of my brothers who would be no less disappointed; and the thought of the sorrow of my father's friends who loved me as their own son and gave me financial aid, as well as the sorrow of my school friends.

But I thought at least mother would understand me. When my father had left Sungsil Middle School and become a career revolutionary, she gave him her tacit agreement. So I believed that even though her son had left middle school, or even a university, she would not disagree if it was for the revolution and for the motherland. I think it was a turning point in my life when I left school and went among the popular masses. It was at this time that my underground activities and my new life as a career revolutionary started. Because I was leaving for Dunhua without so much as dropping a line to my family after my release, my heart was indescribably heavy. I rebuked myself for my neglect, telling myself that I had no excuse for it no matter what sacrifice the revolution required of me, but I could not write to them.

Even when I was in prison I had not written anything to my mother lest she should worry. My comrades who went to spend the winter holidays at my house in 1929 told her that I had been arrested. Nevertheless, she had not come to Jirin to see me. Mothers would not mind traveling thousands of miles to see their children, if they were in prison, carrying bundles of things for them and imploring the warders to allow them to see their children, but my mother had not done so. She had shown great patience. When my father was in prison in Pyongyang, she had been to see him on several occasions, even taking me with her. But ten years later, she never visited her son in prison. People may wonder why. She did not explain her reason when later she saw me in Antu.

But I thought that it showed her true love for her son. She might have thought: Sung Ju who is behind bars would find it painful to see me; even if I go to see him, what comfort or help can my visit give him? Will he be able to keep on the right path if he is swayed by pity at the first step when he has so many rugged passes to climb? Let him feel lonely in prison rather than seeing me, and that will be a benefit for him.

I judged this from my discovery of a revolutionary in my mother who had been a simple woman. Being out of prison and free from my duties as a student, it occurred to me that it might be my filial duty to go home and stay with my mother for a few days. Nevertheless, I walked resolutely towards Dunhua. Approximately 15 miles southwest of Dunhua there was the mountain village called Sidaohuanggou. I was to work there.

After my imprisonment, several families in Fusong which were affiliated with the organizations of the YCLK, the Paeksan Youth League and the Women's Association had moved to the Antu and Dunhua areas in order to avoid the danger of the sweeping arrests in Jirin reaching Fusong. My mother, uncle Hyong Gwon and brothers had also moved to Antu one bitterly cold winter day. Six families out of the dozens which had moved to east Manchuria at that time had settled in Sidaohuanggou. Ko Jae Bong's family was one of the six.

Ko Jae Bong, who attended Fusong Normal School as a scholarship student of Chongui-bu, had taught at Paeksan School before joining the Independence Army and serving as a leader of the Fusong area flying column. 1-fe was a core member of the anti-Japanese mass organization. Ko Jae Ryong, his younger brother, was one of my classmates at Whasung Uisuk School. Later he joined Yang Jing-yu's unit and was killed in action somewhere in Mengjiang or Linjiang. Ko Jae Lim, his youngest brother, went to Jirin Yuwen

Middle School after leaving Paeksan School and worked as a member of the YCLK with me. From the spring of 1930 he studied at a medical college run by the Japanese Manchuria Railway Company. While in Jirin he had helped me a lot. The Kos had been on special terms with our family from our days in Fusong. They spared nothing if it was for my parents. They helped my father and mother a lot while running their inn.

In those days a great number of patriots and independence fighters visited my house in Xiaonanmen Street at all hours. Some of them would stay at my house for a few days. My mother used to be on her feet in the kitchen all the time preparing food for them. This attracted the attention of the warlords. Knowing that the police were watching my father, Ko Jae Bong's mother (Song Gye Sim) came one day and said:

"Mr. Kim, please don't receive any more guests in your house. If your house is crowded with visitors as it is now, something evil might happen to you. We will look after the visitors from the Independence Army, so please send them to my house."

So, she was held in high trust by my father, and I became friendly with Ko Jae Bong. When my mother was running about to find a school building after the closure of Paeksan School, the Kos offered one of their rooms without hesitation. In less than six months after moving to Sidaohuanggou Ko Jae Bong had established Tonghung Uisuk School and was teaching children. Taking advantage of being the deputy head of 100 household units, he formed YCLK organizations and the Paeksan Youth League in Sidaohuanggou and the surrounding area and made preparations for forming the Anti-Japanese Women's Association and the Peasants Union.

Ko Jae Bong's mother was delighted to see me and recollected our days in Fusong with tears in her eyes. When I said that I had been behind bars from the previous autumn and that I had come to Sidaohuanggou directly on my release a few days before she said, looking closely into my face, that, although she recognized me, I looked so pale and puffy that my mother would be pained if she saw me.

I stayed at their house for more than one month, enjoying their kind care. Ko Jae Bong's mother went to a lot of trouble to nurse me back to health. She prepared meals of barley, millet and seasoned green herbs and served them to me at a separate table, always saying that she was very sorry that the meals were so frugal. But I could not eat with an easy mind at the thought of the family which, unable to run an inn in that strange mountain village, had begun farming only that year and also had to support the daughter's children who were staying there.

The mistress, knowing what was my favorite food from our days in Fusong, borrowed a noodle-press, the only one in the village, and made some noodles for me. Ko Jae Bong went to the walled city of Dunhua and bought some salted trout for me. His sister's husband would go to the spring at dawn every day to catch sanggol to reduce my swelling. Under their warm care I quickly recovered my health. Ko Jae Bong went to visit my mother in Antu and returned. It was about 50 miles from Sidaohuanggou to Antu and he could cover this distance in a day. He told me he had walked 75 miles in a day like Hwang Chonwangdong in the novel Lim Ggok Jong.

On hearing that I was staying in the Dunhua area after being released from prison, my brother, Chol Ju, came with Ko Jae Bong to Sidaohuanggou, bringing a letter and my underwear from mother. The letter said that my family, after leaving Fusong, had lived in a rented room at the house of Ma Chun Uk outside the west gate of Jiuantu and then moved to Xinglongcun. While in Jiuantu my mother had rented a sewing machine from Ma Chun Uk and had worked hard to earn a living as a seamstress. In Xinglongcun, too, she had worked day and night to eke out a living.

Chol Ju did not feel comfortable in the new place. Until then he had lived in such towns on large rivers as Chunggang, Linjiang, Badaogou and Fusong. For him Antu which was far from the railway and the lowland was too quiet and too strange a place to feel settled.

"Brother, did you go to Fusong after your release?" he asked me all of a sudden. "I wanted to, but I didn't. How could I visit Fusong when I came straight to Dunhua without even dropping in at my own house?" I answered. "The people in Fusong miss you very much," my brother said.

"Zhang Wei-hua used to come to our house every day to ask after you. The people were very kind." What he said revealed that he was yearning for the people in Fusong. "Yes, they were. I often think of my friends in Fusong. Please remember me to them if you happen to go there."

"Of course I will. By the way, have you made any new friends in Antu?"

"Not many. There aren't many boys of my age in Antu."

I realized that my brother was longing for the old days in Fusong and that because of that, he had not settled in the new place. His sad eyes and melancholy look told me all this. His unsettled mental state, a sort of resistance to the reality that was common among boys of that age, disturbed me.

"Chol Ju, just as a good farmer does not complain of bad land, so a revolutionary should not be particular about where he finds himself. Why shouldn't there be good friends for you in Antu? You will find them if you look. As you know, father used to say that comrades do not fall from the sky of their own accord and that we should look for them, just as jewel hunters look for jewels. Find many good friends and make Antu an ideal place to work in. You are old enough to join the YCLK, aren't you?"

I stressed that he should prepare himself well for membership of the Young Communist League. "I understand. I am sorry to have troubled you," he said, bracing up, a serious look on his face. Not long after that he joined the YCLK. During my stay in Sidaohuanggou I helped Ko Jae Bong and his brother form branches of the Children's Expeditionary Corps, the Peasants Union and the Anti-Japanese Women's Association and tried to contact the members of the revolutionary organizations scattered around the east and south of Manchuria. On receiving the letters I had sent through Ko Jae Bong to the liaison offices in Longjing, Helong and Jirin, ten of my comrades including Kim Hyok, Cha Gwang Su, Kye Yong Chun, Kim Jun, Chae Su Hang and Kim Jung Gwon came to Sidaohuanggou. They were all leaders of the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League.

I learned from them that the uprising sweeping the east of Manchuria had reached greater heights than I had expected.

The Korean people living in Manchuria were the main force behind the uprising; they had been instigated to revolt by Han Bin and Park Yun Se, who claimed that in order to be admitted to the Chinese Communist Party they should be recognized by the party as having distinguished themselves in the practical struggle.

At that time the Korean communists in the northeastern region of China had abandoned the campaign to rebuild the party in accordance with the Comintern principle of one party for one nation and were conducting brisk activities to become members of the Chinese party. The Chinese party had proclaimed that it would admit the Korean communists on an individual basis after testing them individually through a practical struggle. Worse still, officials from the Comintern went round encouraging people to start an uprising, so the Korean communists under the Manchuria general bureau, who were trying to join the Chinese party, drove the people into a reckless uprising out of their own political ambition and lust for higher positions.

They expropriated those who should not have been expropriated and even set fire to schools and power stations. The May 30 Uprising gave the Japanese imperialists and the Chinese reactionary warlords a good excuse for suppressing the communist movement and the anti-Japanese patriotic struggle in Manchuria. The Korean communists and revolutionaries in Manchuria became the target of their ruthless white terrorism. Having incurred tremendous losses, the masses had to retreat to rural and mountainous areas. Atrocities similar to those committed during the great cleaning-up in the year of Kyongsin (1920) were perpetrated throughout east Manchuria. The police cells and prisons were overflowing with captured rebels. A lot of them were dragged to Seoul and condemned to severe punishment, even death.

The Fengtian warlords, tricked by the Japanese imperialists, suppressed the uprising in a brutal way. In order to drive a wedge between the Korean people and the Chinese people the Japanese started rumors that the Koreans had risen in revolt in east Manchuria in order to conquer Manchuria imperialists. The leading warlords believed these rumors and clamored that all Koreans were communists and that the communists should be killed for they were the puppets of the Japanese imperialists. They killed the rebels right and left. The foolish warlords identified the communists with the puppets of the Japanese imperialists.

Thousands of people were arrested and killed during the uprising; most of them were Koreans. Many of those arrested were executed. The uprising caused tremendous harm to our revolutionary organizations. It aggravated the relations between the Koreans and the Chinese.

Li Li-san's line was later denounced as "a reckless line" and "petty bourgeois lunacy" by the Chinese party. Yet his line of the Soviet Red Army was an adventurous line that did not suit the situation in northeast China. The Third Plenary Meeting of the Sixth Central Committee of the Communist Party of China held in September that year sharply criticized the Left adventurism line of Li Li-san. The Comintern, too, criticized his error in a letter dated November 16. The provincial party committee of Manchuria convened an enlarged meeting of the committee and a joint meeting to expose his error to criticism. We also criticized his line at a meeting held in Mingyuegou in May 1931 and adopted measures to overcome the Left adventurism errors. However, the aftereffects of his line were not eradicated and it badly affected our revolutionary struggle in northeast China for several years.

The young people who had gathered in Sidaohuanggou bitterly lamented the fact that Korean blood had been wasted and wondered how long our revolution would have to drift in confusion. In order to encourage them, I said: "It is true that the loss in the uprising is great. However, what is the use of crying over that loss? We must stop crying and go where we are needed to rehabilitate the organizations and straighten out the situation. It is important to expose the factionalists' wild ambitions and remove the masses from their influence. To this end, we must show them the path the Korean revolution should take. The uprising ended in bloodshed, but the masses must have been trained and awakened to consciousness through that uprising. During the uprising the Korean nation displayed its militant and revolutionary spirit to the full. I was greatly encouraged by this great, self-sacrificing fighting spirit of our nation. I am sure that when we teach them scientific fighting methods and tactics and show them the path our nation should follow, a fresh upsurge will take place in our revolution."

My comrades were not greatly impressed by my call. They said, "You are right, Comrade Han Byol. But where is the new line that is acceptable to the masses?" They looked at me with impatience. I said, "It will not fall from the sky, nor will it be brought to us on a plate. We must map it out for ourselves. I gave some thought to this while I was in prison. I'd like to hear your opinions". So we held a discussion on the line of the Korean revolution which I had already discussed with Cha Gwang Su, Kim Hyok, Park So Sim and others. This was the Sidaohuanggou Meeting. The meeting approved my proposal.

The appalling bloodbath that had taken place throughout the east of Manchuria caused me to feel resentment and awakened me to my sense of duty to the nation. As I pictured the people falling down with bleeding hearts in the midst of the turmoil, I racked my brains over how I should rescue the revolutionary masses of Korea from the sea of blood and how I should save the national liberation struggle of Korea from adversity and lead it to victory.

The revolution needed arms. It was awaiting a well-organized and trained revolutionary army and people, a program that would guide the 20 million people to victory and a political general staff capable of putting the program into effect. The situation at home and abroad required that the Korean communists effect a turn in the noble struggle to liberate the country and nation. Without a change our nation might suffer further bloodshed and tragedy. With a determination to make a breakthrough in effecting the change and to bring about this turn, in the summer of 1930 I jotted down in my pocket-book the essence of the ideas that were floating in my mind.

I promised with the organization members and political workers as they left Sidaohuanggou to meet them again in Kalun in the second half of June after they had carried out their assignments. Afterwards a meeting of the party committee of the eastern region of Jirin Province was held in Dunhua. The issue of the uprising was discussed at the meeting. The factionalists were planning to organize another uprising like the May 30 Uprising. I pointed out that the May 30 Uprising had been reckless, and I opposed their plan.

I had gained a lot of experience from my life behind bars and from the May 30 Uprising. Indeed, the spring of 1930 was a spring of growth and of trial, an unforgettable spring in my life. In that spring our revolution was preparing for a fresh upsurge

---

In late June our comrades began to gather in Kalun as prearranged. We already had revolutionary organizations in Kalun. In 1927 we had realized the need to make a base at a traffic junction which afforded easy access to the different parts of Manchuria and began to send hardcore elements of the Young Communist League to the area to explore it.

We decided to hold a meeting in Kalun, in view of the fact that the place was easy of access and that it was a secluded base that ensured secrecy and the safety of those attending the meeting.

Kalun was frequented by the champions of the anti-Japanese movement, but it was not exposed to the enemy. The place was ideal for holding a meeting because the people there had volunteered to aid us. On arriving at Kalun I found that Chong Haeng Jong, head of the Children's Expeditionary Corps, was waiting for me at the station. When I went to Kalun, he always came to meet me at the station and accompany me.

On my arrival I found that the atmosphere in Kalun was somewhat calmer than in Dunhua and Jirin. The May 30 Uprising having just finished, the atmosphere in Jiandao was very serious. The situation became more tense with the imminent dispatch of the Japanese troops to east Manchuria. The Japanese imperialists were intending to send their troops to Jiandao to suppress the rapidly-spreading revolutionary movement there, occupy Manchuria and Mongolia and secure a bridgehead for their invasion of the Soviet Union. With this aim, Lieutenant General Kawashima, commander of the 19th Division of the Japanese Army stationed in Ranam, was on a tour of inspection of the Longjing, Yanji, Baicaogou and Toudaogou areas.

At the same time the chief of staff of the Kuomintang troops in Jirin and the civil administrator were on a tour of inspection in east Manchuria. It was during this period that the revolutionary organizations in the Jiandao area appealed to the people to drive out the lieutenant general of the Japanese army, the chief of staff of the Kuomintang troops and the civil administrator from east Manchuria.

On that visit to Kalun I stayed at the houses of Ryu Yong Son and Chang So Bong, teachers at Chinmyong School. Chang So Bong taught the children at Chinmyong School and at the same time worked as the branch manager of the newspaper Dong-A Ilbo. Like Cha Gwang Su he was a well-informed, good writer and carried out his duties with credit. So he was loved by his comrades.

A blot on his character was that he often quarreled with his wife. When his comrades offered him advice, he complained that she was too feudalistic. Time and again I tried to persuade him and I criticized him so that he took an interest in his family life, but it was of little avail.

Chang So Bong was arrested by the police when he went to Changchun to buy weapons after the formation of the Korean Revolutionary Army and became a turncoat. He is said to have undertaken "submission work" against me. Kim Hyok and Chang So Bong had rendered particularly distinguished service in making Kalun revolutionary. Pooling their efforts with the public-spirited men of the locality, they had set up schools and evening schools, launched an enlightenment movement centered on these schools, reformed the enlightenment organizations such as the peasants association, youth league, children's association and women's society into revolutionary organizations such as the Peasants Union, the Anti-Japanese Youth League, the Children's Expeditionary Corps and the Women's Association respectively. They also trained people from all walks of life to work for the anti-Japanese revolution.

It was in Kalun that magazine Bolshevik had been founded under Kim Hyok's auspices. In Kalun I continued to speculate on the path for the Korean revolution as I had done in Sidaohuanggou. Sorting out and reviewing what I had been thinking for the past month, I wrote it down, and this became a long article. I wrote the article with the keen realization of the urgent need of the national liberation struggle in our country for a new guiding theory. Without a new guiding theory the revolution could not advance even a single step forward.

The revolutionary advance of the oppressed people demanding independence made further strides in the 1930s on a worldwide scale. Asia was the continent in which the liberation struggle of the oppressed peoples against the imperialists was fiercest. Asia became the central arena of the national liberation struggle in the colonies because in those years the imperialists more openly intensified their aggression to wrest concessions from the developing countries of Asia and because the people of many Asian countries fought bravely in the struggle to safeguard their national independence. No force could check the Eastern people's just struggle to drive out the foreign forces and live in a new society which was free and democratic.

The revolutionary tide raged furiously in China, India, Vietnam, Burma, Indonesia and other Asian countries as the revolution advanced in the Soviet Union and Mongolia. Around this time weavers in India, which had attracted the attention of the world for her non-violent resistance movement, held demonstrations in the streets under a red banner. The Chinese people greeted the 1930s in the flames of a second civil war. The revolutionary struggle in China and many other Asian countries and the active struggle of the people in the homeland greatly excited and inspired us.

We became convinced that if a party was founded and the right guiding theory was advanced it would be fully possible to rouse the people and emerge victorious in the struggle against the Japanese imperialists. In this period, too, in the arena of the national liberation struggle of Korea there appeared different isms and doctrines representing the stands and interests of different parties and groups that would lead the masses this way or that. None of these theories was free from time and class limitations.

We deemed the armed struggle of the Independence Army to have been the highest form of the national liberation struggle up to that time. This struggle was participated in by the most active anti-Japanese independence champions from the Left wing of the nationalist movement and patriots. They had formed the Independence Army and launched an armed struggle because they believed that only by fighting a war of independence was it possible to win back the country.

Some people thought that it was possible to win independence only through the military action of large troops and other people maintained that the best way to drive out the Japanese imperialists was to employ terrorist tactics, while some others said that the strategy suited to the actual situation in Korea was to preserve some well-trained troops and achieve independence in cooperation with the Soviet Union, China, the United States and the like once they were at war with Japan. All these arguments presupposed a bloody fight against the Japanese imperialists.

But in its struggle the Independence Army had neither the scientific tactics and strategy for pursuing its initial aims to the end nor a strong and seasoned leadership capable of fighting the war to the end nor a firm mass foundation capable of supporting the army with manpower, materials and finance. Among the reformist arguments Ahn Chang Ho's "theory on preparation" called "the theory on the cultivation of strength" was much talked about by the independence champions. We respected Ahn Chang Ho as an honest and conscientious patriot who devoted his life to the independence movement but we did not sympathize with his theory.

The Shanghai Provisional Government's line of a non-violent independence movement did not receive the support and sympathy of the masses. Some time after its formation the Shanghai Provisional Government disappointed people because it wasted time, constantly resorting to the diplomatic policy of non-violence which provided no hope. So, the Independence Army which held the military line to be supreme gave it the cold shoulder.

Syngman Rhee's petition asking the League of Nations to place Korea under its mandatory administration did not deserve to be called a line of any sort. The "self-government" idea advanced by the right wing of the nationalists was a wild dream which went against the national spirit of independence. The Communist Party of Korea, founded in 1925, ended its existence without working out the scientific tactics and strategy suited to the actual situation in Korea.

Generally speaking, the common weak point of the strategies and lines of the preceding generation was that they did not believe in the strength of the masses and turned away from them. The movement champions from the preceding generation all ignored the fact that the people are the masters of the revolution and the motive force of the revolution. Only by drawing on the organized strength of millions of people was it possible to overthrow Japanese imperialism, but the champions of our anti-Japanese movement thought that the revolution and the war of independence were conducted by a few special people alone.

Proceeding from this viewpoint, those who were allegedly engaged in the communist movement founded a party by proclaiming the party center to be composed of a few people from the higher levels of society without laying any foundation to speak of. They were divided into groups in such a way as to form parties of three and groups of five and became involved in a scramble for hegemony over several years. The line and strategy of the preceding generation had the serious drawback that they were not firmly rooted in the Korean reality. I decided that in order to work out a correct guiding theory suited to the Korean reality it was necessary to take an independent view of all problems and settle them in an original way that was suited to our own specific situation, instead of holding classic works or the experiences of other countries supreme. It would not do to copy the experience of the October Revolution on the plea of providing a guiding theory or to sit back with folded arms, expecting that the Comintern would provide a recipe for success.

"We believe in the strength of the masses alone. Let us believe in the strength of our 20 million people and, uniting them, let us wage a bloody war against the Japanese imperialists!" This cry came often from the bottom of my heart. Urged by this impulse, I tried to enunciate the idea we now call Juche in a draft report. What I intended to write in that draft report concerned the serious problems facing our revolution. I gave a particularly great deal of thought to the question of the armed struggle. In my draft report I put it forward as the basic line of the anti-Japanese national liberation struggle, as the foremost task for the Korean communists, to wage a comprehensive anti-Japanese war.

It took a long time to decide upon the armed struggle and to fix it as our line. Before it was adopted as a line at Kalun, we were virtually empty-handed. I proposed that if an armed struggle was to be launched, the young communists should found a new type of army. At that time some people were of a different opinion, and said, "Since the Independence Army is already in existence, it will suffice to join it and fight. Is there any necessity to found a separate army? We fear that the anti-Japanese military forces will be divided."

Since the Independence Army had become Rightist and reactionary, it was irrational and impossible to renovate it from within and take military action. In 1930 the strength of the Independence Army was insufficient. The strength of the Independence Army under Kukmin-bu was only nine companies. Even they were divided into the Kukmin-bu group and the anti-Kukmin-bu group due to a split at the higher levels.

The Kukmin-bu group was the conservative force which stuck fast to the line the Independence Army had adhered to for over ten years. The anti-Kukmin-bu group was a new force which opposed the old line and pursued a new line. People from the anti-Kukmin-bu group even attempted to join hands with the communists, claiming to sympathize with communism. The Japanese imperialists named them the "third force" in the sense that they were not nationalists or communists but a new middle-of-the-road force. The appearance of this "third force" of the anti-Kukmin-bu group within the nationalist movement proved that the trend to switch the nationalist movement to a communist movement had entered the stage of implementation. The strength of the Independence Army was reduced due to the antagonism between the Kukmin-bu group and the anti-Kukmin-bu group, and the nationalist movement was thrown into confusion.

The companies of the Independence Army were generally stationed in villages on the plain, but this did not favour guerrilla warfare. It did not have enough equipment, its discipline was loose and its training was at a low level. On top of this, its relations with the inhabitants were not very good. The Independence Army was on a gradual decline since its golden days in the early 1920s when it had mowed down large troops of Japanese at the Battle of Qingshanli<sup>4</sup> and the Battle of Fengwugou.

When I went to Wangqingmen to attend the conference of the General Federation of Korean Youth in South Manchuria, I talked with Hyon Muk Gwan about Kukmin-bu and asked him, "Are you sure that you can defeat Japan with the strength of Kukmin-bu?" I raised this question to goad him because he boasted a lot about Kukmin-bu. "If we fight on like this and if the great powers help us, we will win our independence."

I was disappointed at his reply. I wondered how an army which was fighting blindly without confidence in victory, turning to the great powers for help, could prove its worth. So I said to him by way of a joke, "Will the people of Kukmin-bu hand all their weapons over to us? If they do we will drive out the Japanese in three or four years." This was before the terrorist outrages were committed against the members of the preparatory committee for the meeting, so I could afford to joke. Hyon Muk Gwan had always taken my jokes well since my Jirin days. He made a wry smile but didn't reply. He must have thought that I was indulging in idle dreams. It was difficult to maintain the status quo in the army of Kukminbu. So, we came to the conclusion that it was necessary to form a new type of army.

I was convinced that an armed struggle led by communists alone could wage a thorough anti-Japanese war of resistance and be revolutionary. This was because communists alone could rally in their armed ranks workers, peasants and other broad sections of the anti-Japanese patriotic forces and lead the Korean revolution as a whole to victory, taking charge of and waging the noble war by employing scientific tactics and strategies which would accurately reflect the interests of the masses. The Japanese imperialists we would have to overthrow were a newly-emerging military power that had, in the Sino-Japanese War and the Russo-Japanese War, easily defeated great powers with territories tens of times larger than that of Japan. It would be no easy matter to defeat this power and win back the country.

To overthrow Japanese imperialism meant to defeat the military power of Japan, which had received universal recognition. It meant to overpower the fanatical Japanese spirit and to emerge victorious in a war of attrition against Japan, a country which had been accumulating manpower, materials and financial power for nearly 70 years since the Meiji Restoration. But we thought that if we waged an armed struggle for three or four years we could defeat Japan. It was an idea which no one except hot-blooded young people could conceive. If the Japanese warlords had heard of this, they would surely have thrown their heads back and burst out laughing. If we are asked what guarantee we had for our judgment, we have nothing to say. What guarantee could we, with empty hands, have?

We had only patriotism and young blood. We said three or four years not because we made light of the strength of Japan but because we thought that our patriotism was stronger and we were righteous. Our guarantee was the strength of our twenty million people. We were convinced that if we trained the twenty million people well and induced them to rise in a struggle everywhere and beat the Japanese troops and police we could win our independence. So, we thought that if an armed struggle was to be waged on a grand scale a firm mass foundation should be laid. That is how the idea of the anti-Japanese national united front came into being.

I first felt the necessity for an organization in my Whasung Military Academy, whereas it was at the time of the March First Popular Uprising that I first felt the strength of the nation and engraved it in my heart. It was in my Jirin days that I decided to go deep among the people, rally them and make the revolution by depending on their strength. Without nationwide resistance through the enlistment of the twenty million people it would be impossible to shake off the yoke of colonial slavery. We maintained that in the pure class struggle the workers and the peasant masses alone could be the motive force of the revolution, but since by its nature the Korean revolution was a revolution against feudalism and imperialism not only the workers and peasants but also the young people and students, intellectuals, patriotic-minded men of religion, and non-comprador capitalists could be the motive force of the revolution. Ours was the principle of rallying and enlisting all the anti-Japanese patriotic forces interested in national liberation.

When we advanced this line, some people shook their heads dubiously, saying that no such definition could be found in the classics. They said it was a wild dream that communists should be allied with the social classes other than the workers and peasants and that they could not join hands with religious men or the entrepreneur class. Proceeding from this point of view the Tuesday group<sup>6</sup> removed Kim Chan from the post of head of the Manchuria general bureau of the Communist Party of Korea simply because he had been associated with some people from Kukmin-bu.

Many nationalists gave communists the cold shoulder. Nationalism was a taboo within the communist movement, while communism was a taboo within the nationalist movement. This tendency resulted in the division of the nation's forces into the two camps of communists and nationalists. Sensible people were all pained at this state of affairs. Through their efforts, however, a movement for collaboration between the two camps of the communists and nationalists was launched in the mid20s, and this resulted in the founding of the Singan Association in 1927. All the people warmly welcomed it as an indication that the communists and nationalists could unite for the cause of the nation, although they had different ideas.

But the association had to proclaim its dissolution in 1931 due to the ceaseless destructive maneuvers of the Japanese imperialists and the subversive activities of the reformists who were corrupted and used by them. If the two forces had united firmly in the great cause of patriotism, the association would not have been so easily destroyed even if there had been subversion within and without. We greatly regretted the end of the collaboration between the communists and nationalists with the dissolution of the Singan Association. If ideas alone were held supreme without priority being given to the nation, genuine collaboration could not be attained. It was my view in those days that if top priority was given to national liberation it was possible to join hands with any social class.

Proceeding from this standpoint we collaborated, after liberation, with Kim Gu who had opposed communism all his life and now are appealing for grand national unity. If grand national unity is attained, there will remain only the foreign forces and traitors to the nation as obstacles. When Choe Hong Hui and Choe Dok Sin visited Pyongyang, although they had passed their lives at the anti-communist front with their guns turned on us, we welcomed them out of compatriotic love without caring about their past because grand national unity was our supreme task as well as our policy.

I said to Choe Dok Sin, "Whether one lives in the north or in the south, one must consider the question of reunification with top priority given to the nation. Only when the nation exists are there social classes and isms, don't you think? What is the use of communism, nationalism or a belief in 'God' without the nation?" When we elaborated the line of the anti-Japanese national united front in Kalun over 60 years ago, we made the same appeal.

Politics must be comprehensive and statesmen, broad-minded. If politics is not comprehensive, it cannot embrace all the people. If statesmen are not broad-minded, the people turn away from them. In my draft report I dwelt on the founding of the party, the character and tasks of the Korean revolution, and the basic standpoint for Korean communists to adhere to in struggle. When I had prepared the draft report, I immediately submitted it for discussion to the leading cadres of the Young Communist League and the AJYL who had come from different places to attend the Kalun Meeting. In those days we held discussions at the edge of the field or in the willow grove by the River Wukaijiang in the daytime while we worked in the field, and in the evening reviewed the opinions raised in the daytime in the night duty room of Chinmyong School. During the mass discussions many opinions concerning interesting practical problems were offered.

At first a dispute arose as to how to define the character of the Korean revolution. The definition of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution given in the draft report provoked a heated debate. The focus of the debate was whether a new definition of the character of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution which was not found in the classics and which had not been advanced in any other country conflicted with universal principles and the law of the revolution or not. According to the understanding of the young people of those days, bourgeois and socialist revolutions were the only revolutions which brought about a radical change in modern history. So, they were fully justified in questioning a new concept of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution which was neither a socialist nor a bourgeois revolution.

We characterized the Korean revolution as an anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution on the basis of the conclusion we had formed concerning the class relations prevailing in our country and the tasks facing our revolution. The most urgent revolutionary task for the Korean nation was to overthrow Japanese imperialism, eliminate the feudal relations shackling our people and effect democracy in our country. Hence we defined the Korean revolution as an anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution.

If one squeezes the definition of the revolution into another pattern, one will be guilty of dogmatism. It is not the pattern that is most important but the actual situation. Communists should accept without hesitation a scientific definition suited to the actual situation in the country even if it is not found in the classics or elsewhere. This represents a creative attitude towards Marxism-Leninism. When I thus explained why I had defined the Korean revolution as an anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution, the delegates said that they understood and warmly supported it.

The question of the anti-Japanese national united front was most hotly debated. In those days it was publicly recognized as a difficult problem in both theory and practice, a problem of which an open discussion was troublesome. People around us approached the question cautiously because some people from the Comintern indiscriminately qualified those who supported the united front policy as reformists, citing the failure of the collaboration between Kuomintang and the Communist Party in China. So those without courage could not propose the national united front policy as a line, for to do so might have been taken as a challenge to the standpoint of the Comintern. Then the comrades raised many questions.

Should the son of a landlord support the revolution, how should he be treated?

Should a capitalist have donated a lot of money and provided a great deal of material aid to the Independence Army but wants nothing to do with communists, how should he be approached?

Should a sub-county head mix well with both the people and the Japanese, can he be enlisted in the revolution?

In reply to these questions I said, in short, that people should be judged mainly by their ideological tendency. Our views of those days later took shape in the ten-point program of the Association for the Restoration of the Fatherland and was specified as state policy in the 20-point program after liberation. The validity of the anti-Japanese national united front policy we advanced in Kalun was later proved in practice. Our comrades' opinions were a great help in perfecting the draft report.

The Kalun Meeting was formally opened in the evening of June 30, 1930. Our comrades in Kalun prepared a meeting place in a classroom of Chinmyong School. They spread straw mats on the floor of the classroom for the delegates and hung lamps from the ceiling. On the first day of the meeting the delegates listened to my report. The next day they began to discuss measures to carry out the tasks set in the report. The discussions took place in groups or all together on the riverside or in the willow grove, while we helped the peasants in their work. Thus the meeting was held in an original way. We held the meeting with easy minds because the members of the revolutionary organizations in Kalun were keeping guard in the village. Members of the Children's Expeditionary Corps also did a lot to protect us during the meeting.

The Japanese imperialists, having smelled out that a large number of young communists had gathered in central Manchuria, dispatched many secret agents to the counties of Changchun, Huaide and Yitong which were the arena of our activity. Some secret agents carried a photograph of me with them and asked where I was. Informed by the secret agents from the Japanese consulate in Manchuria and from the police affairs department of the government-general in Korea that some young communists belonging to a group different from those of the old-time communists who differed from them in the way they conducted their activities had appeared around Jirin in Manchuria and were expanding their forces, the Japanese imperialists chased us persistently in an effort to capture the leading core elements, straining their nerves from the beginning.

Because we had established a wide foothold and went deep among the people without making much fuss, they seemed to take us seriously. At that time Kim Won U was in charge of the guard at the village and commanded the members of the Children's Expeditionary Corps and the ALYL. Even when he was attending a meeting, he would leave stealthily and patrol the village to check the guard. When I sat up at night because of the pressure of work in the classroom of Chinmyong School, he kept watch outside to ensure my personal safety. Sometimes at night he roasted potatoes in the fire-place in the kitchen of the night-duty room of the school, and offered me some.

Kim Won U rendered great service in exploring Kalun, Guyushu, Wujiazi and other areas. He did a lot of work in leading the youth and student movement in Jirin. In the spring of 1928 we dispatched him to the rural communities in the Changchun area to make them revolutionary. At the time he was teaching at Chinmyong School and educating the young people by touring the Kalun and Guyushu areas. Beginning in the spring of 1930 he took part in the preparations for the formation of the Korean Revolutionary Army, helping Cha Gwang Su. As he had a handsome face we once disguised him as a woman and sent him to do underground work, "pairing" him with Hyon Gyun as man and wife.

When he went about to buy weapons after the formation of the Korean Revolutionary Army, he was arrested by the enemy and imprisoned for several years. Even behind bars he fought staunchly. When the internal and external situation was complicated after the war, Kim Won U fell at the hands of the factionalists while fighting in defense of the Party's line in the provinces. At that time factionalists plotted in various ways to harm those who were faithful to the Party. His original name was Pyon Muk Song.

Kalun became a reliable base for our activities and a revolutionary village for realizing our ideas due to the persistent efforts Kim Won U, Kim Lee Gap, Cha Gwang Su, Kim Hyok and other young communists made earlier to explore the village. Before we arrived the people there were divided into the southern provinces group and the northern provinces group and lived with their backs turned on each other. Once the two groups had a gang fight over water from the River Wukaijiang. When people from the southern provinces group blocked the irrigation ditch to reclaim their field, the people from the northern provinces group came rushing out with their shovels and reopened the ditch, shouting that their paddy fields were drying up. Even their children were divided into two groups and would not play together, which was very sad.

Kim Hyok, Kim Won U, Kim Lee Gap, Chang So Bong and others made a great deal of effort to straighten out the situation. They put an end to the gang fight through persuasion and formed various mass organizations, set up a school in Kalun and provided free education. In the evening on the second of July the delegates again gathered in the classroom of the school and resumed the meeting. That evening the meeting was concluded with the announcement of an assignment plan. Towards the close of the meeting Cha Gwang Su who was presiding over the meeting rose abruptly from his seat and made a fervent speech. Nicknamed "boisterous," he often acted rashly and easily got excited, but he never lost his reason. He stirred up the hearts of people, addressing them in an impassioned and fluent speech. He shook his fist as he spoke:

"While the Korean communist movement is going through ordeal and the people are lamenting its setbacks, we here in Kalun have made a historic statement marking a fresh start of the Korean revolution. With this statement heralding a new dawn we Korean communists will advance along a new path. Comrades, let us take up arms and come out in a life-and-death struggle against Japanese imperialism."

Having heard his speech, we raised shouts of joy and sang the Revolutionary Song. We could proclaim the new path for the Korean revolution in Kalun because already in the course of the youth and student movement launched in our days in Jirin we had established the Juche stand on and attitude towards the Korean revolution and cleared a new path for the communist movement. I made public in The Path of the Korean Revolution the idea and standpoint I had perceived in my days of struggle and elaborated in prison. This has become the line of our revolution and its guiding idea.

We can say that the content of the treatise was based entirely on the Juche idea. Since then the idea has been steadily developed and enriched through the various stages of the revolution, including the anti-Japanese revolutionary struggle, and through a difficult and complicated practical struggle and it has become a philosophical idea in which ideas, theories and methods have been brought together as an integral whole as we now see it. It was when we were building the foundation of socialism after the war that we particularly stressed the need to establish Juche after liberation.

I delivered a speech on eliminating dogmatism and the worship of the great powers and establishing Juche to party propaganda and agitation workers in 1955. It was made public in the document On Eliminating Dogmatism and Formalism and Establishing Juche in Ideological Work. Later I stressed the need to establish Juche whenever the occasion offered itself. Time and again I explained the essence of the Juche idea, how it was created and has been implemented in my talks with foreigners. But I never thought of systematizing it and publishing it in book form. If our people accepted the idea as just and implemented it in their revolutionary practice, I was satisfied.

Later Secretary Kim Jong Il systematized the idea in a comprehensive manner and published his treatise On the Juche Idea. We became convinced, while waging the anti-Japanese armed struggle after the Kalun Meeting, that the line we advanced at the meeting was just. The enemy likened us to "a drop in the ocean," but we had an ocean of people with inexhaustible strength behind us. Whatever line we put forward, the people easily understood it and made it their own, and they aided us materially and spiritually, sending tens of thousands of their sons, daughters, brothers and sisters to join our ranks.

We could defeat the strong enemy who was armed to the teeth, fighting against him in the severe cold of up to 40 degrees below zero in Manchuria for over 15 years, because we had a mighty fortress called the people and the boundless ocean called the people.

4.4. The First Party Organization: the Society for Rallying Comrades

The fact that we formed a new type of party organization on July 3, 1930, the day following the Kalun Meeting, was made public many years ago and the speech I made at the meeting has been published.

It is known to everyone that the party plays the role of the general staff in the revolution and that victory in the revolution depends on the role of the party. If the revolution is the locomotive of history, the party can be called the locomotive of the revolution. This is the reason why revolutionaries attach importance to the party and work heart and soul to build up the party.

The fact that Marx founded the League of Communists and issued the Communist Manifesto at the start of his practical struggle following his creation of a scientific theory on communism is praised even now as the greatest of his exploits. This is because the mission and role fulfilled by the party in the struggle of the communists to transform the world are very important. It can be said that the various opportunist and reformist tendencies that appeared in the international communist movement and working-class movement resulted, in the final analysis, from a wrong view and attitude towards the party.

Among all the epoch-making changes that have been made up to the present day by communists throughout the world since the appearance of communism in the arena of the working-class movements as the new thought of the time, there is nothing that is not linked with the noble name of the party.

In order to implement the tasks put forward at the Kalun Meeting, The fact that we formed a new type of party organization on July 3, 1930, the day following the Kalun Meeting, was made public many years ago and the speech I made at the meeting has been published. This is because the mission and role fulfilled by the party in the struggle of the communists to transform the world are very important. It can be said that the various opportunist and reformist tendencies that appeared in the international communist movement and working-class movement resulted, in the final analysis, from a wrong view and attitude towards the party.

Among all the epoch-making changes that have been made up to the present day by communists throughout the world since the appearance of communism in the arena of the working-class movements as the new thought of the time, there is nothing that is not linked with the noble name of the party.

In order to implement the tasks put forward at the Kalun Meeting, we first of all started to form a party organization. It was after hearing that the Korean Communist Party had been expelled from the Comintern that we resolved to found a new type of party and started to make all-out efforts to find the way.

It was in April 1925 that the Communist Party was formed in our country. In those days in various countries political parties representing the interests of the working class had appeared and were leading the masses. The fact that, in keeping with this worldwide trend, a communist party was founded in our country, a land where no freedom of political activity and no rights were allowed proves how quick and rich was the political sensibility of the Koreans towards the new thought and the trend of the times.

The founding of the Korean Communist Party was the inevitable result and law-governed product of the development of the working-class movement and the national liberation movement in Korea.

After its foundation the Korean Communist Party disseminated the socialist idea among broad sections of the masses, such as the workers and peasants, and led the working-class movement, thus turning a new page on which the national liberation struggle in our country was guided by communists. While the Korean Communist Party existed the Korean communists displayed the mettle of our nation by leading such a large-scale struggle as the June 10th Independence Movement. They also contributed to the work of rallying the anti-Japanese patriotic forces by forming such a mass organization as the Singan Association with the cooperation of the nationalists.

The fact that the Korean Communist Party was founded and the mass movement of various social sections such as the working-class movement and the peasant movement was conducted under its leadership was a historic event that promoted the development of the national liberation movement to some extent and marked the beginning of the communist movement in our country. However, the Korean Communist Party ended its existence as an organized force in 1928 owing to the cruel suppression on the part of the Japanese imperialists and the factional strife in its highest circles.

At its Sixth Congress held in the summer of 1928 the Comintern pronounced the withdrawal of its recognition of the Communist Party of Korea. This was tantamount to the expulsion of the Korean Communist Party from the ranks of the Communist International.

It goes without saying that while the Korean Communist Party existed we were not satisfied with its highest circles who were engrossed in factional strife. However, we could not repress our indignation and shame at the news that the party had even been expelled from the ranks of the Comintern. We regretted the action of the Communist International. It was at that time that I began to think that, although we were young and had little experience in the communist movement, we ourselves must become masters and work hard to found a new type of party.

If we were to found a party of a new type which would be pure and original, we had to overcome many obstacles and difficulties. The greatest difficulty was that there was still factionalism in the communist ranks. Because factionalism had not been eliminated the communists of the early years could not conduct the movement to rebuild the party in a unified manner but did it divided into various factions.

After the Korean Communist Party was expelled from the Comintern the communists of our country conducted an intensive movement at home and abroad to rebuild the party. But no faction succeeded owing to the indiscriminate suppression and obstructive moves of the Japanese imperialists. The Tuesday group and the M-L group<sup>8</sup> abandoned their efforts to rebuild the party and declared that they would dissolve the general bureau that had been formed in Manchuria. Following this the Seoul-Shanghai group made an effort to rebuild the party at home, but even this became known and ended in many party members being dragged off to prison.

So we came to the conclusion that it would be impossible to found a revolutionary party by rebuilding the party that had been dissolved or by relying on the existing generation that was infected with the vicious habit of factional strife.

Another difficulty in founding the party was that it was impossible for the Korean communists to found their own party in Manchuria because of the principle of one party for one country laid down by the Comintern.

In the general provisions of its Rules adopted at its Sixth Congress the Comintern laid down this principle, to the effect that each party belonging to the Comintern should carry the name of the communist party of the country concerned (the branch of the Comintern) and that in each country only one communist party could exist within the Comintern.

The eastern propaganda department of the Communist International convened the Conference of the Korean and Chinese Communist Parties in Khabarovsk in May 1930 and informed the delegates of the decision of the Comintern of the organizational question regarding the Korean Communist Party. In that decision the Comintern set the Korean communists in Manchuria the task of joining the Chinese party and working as members of that party. Such being the case, those communists who had been working hard to rebuild the party changed their attitude and issued a statement on dissolving the party. Then they started to convert to the Chinese party and, with this, the flames of the May 30 Uprising swept east Manchuria.

The matter of the Korean party members having to work in the Chinese party could not but seriously excite the young Korean communists who had a stronger national pride than others. Our comrades had a heated argument on the matter. Some young people denounced the order of the Comintern as irresponsible and as an incomprehensible decision, some regarded the measure as fair and yet others gave vent to their pent-up anger and indignation, saying that the demand of the Comintern that the Korean communists should join the Chinese party meant rejecting for ever the possibility of rebuilding the party.

My comrades brought this matter up as a topic of conversation and asked me my view. I told them clearly that the demand of the Comintern that the Korean communists should join the Chinese party in accordance with the principle of one party for one country should not be censured and that the demand did not imply depriving the Korean communists of the possibility of rebuilding their party.

"In the present circumstances the demand of the Comintern was somewhat inevitable. If the Korean communists had their own party, why would it demand that they live in a rented room? Therefore, we must respect the decision of the Comintern. That is an internationalist standpoint. If one becomes a member of the Chinese party, it will be all right if one does not forget Korea and fights for the Korean revolution. However, on the plea of following the instructions of the Comintern, one cannot abandon the building of one's own party and live in rented room for ever. Koreans must have a party for Koreans."

This was my view and standpoint with regard to the problem of converting to another party. However, I could not be sure that this view accorded with the principle of the Comintern of one party for one country.

In order to deepen my understanding of the principle of one party for one country and decide upon a policy for party building as soon as possible, I met Kim Gwang Ryol (Kim Ryol), a liaison officer of the Comintern, in Jiajiatun in the latter part of June 1930. Kim Gwang Ryol was an intellectual who had graduated from Waseda University in Japan and had been in the Soviet Union before going to Jiajiatun. He stayed for a long time in Guyushu, Wujiazi and Kalun, which were the areas of our activity.

In his capacity of a liaison officer, he strove to link us with the Communist International. Chang So Bong and Li Jong Rak were unsparing in their praise of him, saying that he had been greatly influenced by socialism in the Soviet Union. So I met him with hope. I found him to be a well-read man, as was his reputation. He had a good command of Russian and Japanese, danced Russian dances just as well as Russians and was a good public speaker. Kim Gwang Ryol advised me to go to the Comintern instead of listening only to his opinion. He said that he would introduce me to the Harbin liaison office of the Comintern and asked me to go there and argue about the principle of one party for one country.

After meeting Kim Gwang Ryol I repeated the argument about the principle of one party for one country with my comrades.

We construed the principle of one party for one country as meaning that two or more communist parties in a country could not join the Comintern, that only one communist party could become a member of it, and that no more than one center of the communist party could exist in one country.

The essence of this principle was that there should not be more than one party center with the same interests and aim in a country. The fact that the Comintern advanced the principle of one party for one country and demanded its strict observance was mainly aimed at eliminating the different forms of opportunism, including factionalism, in the international communist movement and ensuring the unity and cohesion of its ranks. The historic lesson of the international communist movement made the Comintern put forward the principle of one party for one country and strictly guard against the infiltration of alien elements into the communist movement.

That the Comintern laid down the principle of one party for one country was connected with the fact that the enemy was making vicious attempts to split and break up the communist ranks from within.

However, the Rules of the Communist International merely laid down the principle of one party for one country. They did not clarify how those conducting the communist movement in a foreign country should be converted to the party of the country of their residence and how revolutionary tasks should be set for them after their conversion. It was precisely because of this that the matter of the Korean communists active in Manchuria converting to the Chinese party gave rise to extremely complex arguments. So some people even regarded the formation of their own party organization by the Korean communists in China as contradictory to the principle of one party for one country.

At a time when, owing to the various interpretations of the Comintern principle of one party for one country, terrible confusion and vacillation were created in the activities of the Korean communists for the liberation of their country, and even the right of the Korean revolutionaries to fight for their country was regarded as doubtful, I was seeking tirelessly the way to found a party.

Was there no way which would conform with the instructions of the Comintern and also powerfully promote the Korean revolution?

The way out which I discovered at the end of my search was steadily to lay the organizational and ideological foundation for the formation of a party and, on the basis of this, found a party that was capable of playing both nominally and in fact the role of the general staff of our revolution, proceeding from the lesson of the preceding communist movement, instead of hastily proclaiming a party center. It was impossible to found a party proceeding only from one's subjective desire without training an organizational backbone of people who were awakened to class consciousness and qualified, without the unity of the ranks in ideology and purpose and without laying down a mass foundation on which the party could rely.

I considered that forming the party by setting up basic party organizations first, with communists of the new generation, who had nothing to do with factions, as the backbone and then steadily expanding them, was the most suitable and realistic method for us of founding a party. I was convinced that the Comintern would welcome it if we founded a party in this way.

I believed that if we formed party organizations first with the communists of the younger generation whom we had been training and steadily increased their role, at the same time as expanding and strengthening the basic party organizations everywhere our steps reached, we would be quite able to lead the communist movement and the national liberation struggle and also fulfill our internationalist duties satisfactorily.

If we refrained from forming a separate party center in China lest it should coexist with the Chinese party, we would not be contradicting the Comintern principle of one party for one country.

By establishing this idea we advanced the policy of founding a party at the Kalun Meeting and formed the first party organization. Forming a revolutionary party organization was also an inevitable requirement of the development of our revolution.

Because there was no party in Korea, the leaders of the Tanchon Peasant Uprising visited the Comintern to get its opinion on the tactical problems of the uprising. If there had been a revolutionary party in Korea representing the interests of the workers and peasants, as well as a seasoned leadership force, they would not have had to spend money on going to the Comintern.

The national liberation movement in our country at the beginning of the 1930s developed much further, to an extent which was incomparable with the anti-Japanese struggle of the past in its width and depth.

Our struggle also became much more advanced compared to its first stage. The sphere of our activities passed beyond the bounds of Jirin and spread to far-off east Manchuria and areas of northern Korea. Our revolutionary struggle, which had been confined to a youth and student movement, stretched to the broad sections of the workers and peasants and became underground activities. When we had accumulated experience and the military and political preparations had been made, we would have to form a standing revolutionary army and wage a full-scale guerrilla war with large units.

The Young Communist League, however, was not equal to leading all this. The leadership given by the Young Communist League to various mass organizations in the past was a transitional phenomenon, not a perpetual one.

Now it was necessary to form a party which would have to control and guide the Young Communist League and various other mass organizations, give leadership to the national liberation movement as a whole, establish relations with the Chinese party and work with the Communist International. In the name of the Young Communist League it would be impossible for us to deal satisfactorily with the Comintern.

The communists of the early years visited the Comintern to obtain its recognition, each group posing as the "legitimate party." Therefore, the Comintern was quite at a loss. The Comintern began gradually to realize that it would be impossible for a genuine vanguard of the working class to appear in Korea unless factions were eliminated and that, in order to eliminate the factions and found a new party, there should appear a new generation who had nothing to do with the factional strife and had no ambition for power. So they became interested in our struggle and tried various ways to join hands with us. Over many years of revolutionary activity we laid down the foundation for forming a new type of revolutionary party organization.

The formation of the DIU was the starting point for the founding of a new type of revolutionary party which differed from the previous party in the Korean communist movement. Everything started from the DIU. The DIU developed into the Anti-Imperialist Youth League and then the Young Communist League.

The hardcore detachment of our revolution trained by the Young Communist League and the mass foundation of our revolution laid by the Anti-Imperialist Youth League immediately became the basis for founding the party. In those days when the Young Communist League had been formed and was leading the revolutionary movement as a powerful vanguard organization, the communists from among the new generation overcame the mistakes made by the communists of the preceding generation and pioneered a new way of winning over the masses and employing the art of leadership. The heroic fighting spirit and the revolutionary fighting traits displayed by the communists of the new generation became the motive force enabling us to defeat the Japanese imperialist aggressors. Later they became the spirit and moral strength of our Party.

A peak in the activities of the communists of the new generation was that the guiding idea of the Korean revolution was established with the Kalun Meeting as the impetus. The decision of the Kalun Meeting clarified the strategic points which the communists had to observe as their principles in the struggle to effect the programme of the DIU and the Young Communist League. They constituted the ideological basis for the foundation of a new type of party and a guide in the activities of the communists who had long been groping blindly in the dark, suffering failures and setbacks, to find the way ahead.

The guiding idea, leadership core and mass foundation, these can be said to be the essential elements for the formation of a party organization. We had all these elements.

On July 3, 1930 we formed the first party organization in a classroom at Chinmyong School in Kalun with comrades Cha Gwang Su, Kim Hyok, Choe Chang Gol, Kye Yong Chun, Kim Won U and Choe Hyo Il. Although they were not present at the meeting, comrades Kim Lee Gap, Kim Hyong Gwon, Park Gun Won and Li Je U also became members of the first party organization as did Park Cha Sok and Li Jong Rak whom I was intending to appoint as the commander of the Korean Revolutionary Army.

Chinmyong School stood in the fields in front of Jiajiatun, some 500 meters away from the village. Pussy willow fields covering some five or six hectares stretched to the east and south of the school, and in the middle of the willow fields a wide river, the River Wukaijiang, flowed around the southeast side of the school. There were ponds and marshes from the east side of the school to the village. There was a path to Chinmyong School only from the west. If the corner was properly guarded there was no knowing if anything was happening at the school. Even if there was some danger one could easily escape into the willow fields.

That night we held a meeting by posting double and treble sentries on the west gateway where spies might appear. I still remember how the frogs croaked noisily in the rice fields. This noise stirred up mysterious feelings in me.

My most unforgettable impression of when the first party organization was formed is how Kim Won U took such trouble to put up a red flag beside the speaker's table when preparing the meeting place. The red color of that flag clearly reflected our determination to fight for the revolution till the last drop of our blood.

Even now I think of Chinmyong School whenever the first party organization is mentioned, and when I think of Chinmyong School I picture in my mind the unforgettable flag that stood slantwise by the speaker's table.

That day I did not make a long speech. We had talked a great deal about forming the first party organization during the Kalun Meeting. Therefore, there was no need to explain our aim in forming it at length.

I simply set the tasks for the members of the party organization of expanding the basic party organizations and establishing a system of unified guidance over them, of achieving firm organizational and ideological unity within the ranks and comradely solidarity, and of laying a solid mass foundation for the revolution. As the means for realizing this I emphasized the need for the party organization to hold fast to the independent stand in all its activities and closely combine the work of building up the party organization with the anti-Japanese struggle.

We did not adopt a new Programme and Rules for the party. The Programme and Rules of the DIU clarified the ultimate goal and immediate fighting tasks for us communists, and the revolutionary line and strategic policies adopted at the Kalun Meeting provided details on the path we should follow and the rules for our conduct.

We gave the first party organization the simple name of the Society for Rallying Comrades. That name embodied the high aims and will of us who were taking the first step in the revolution by winning over comrades, and who were determined to develop the revolution in depth and achieve its final victory by continually discovering and rallying those comrades who would share their fate with us.

All the comrades who joined the Society for Rallying Comrades stood up and made fiery speeches full of strong emotions. Kim Hyok recited an impromptu poem the content of which was: "Now we are sailing. Our ship has left the port. We're rowing towards the ocean on a heavy sea."

Following Kim Hyok's recitation Choe Hyo Il stood up and delivered a speech. On finishing his speech he said:

"Sung Ju, if we were not in a classroom but on a mountain, I would like to fire a salute in memory of this occasion!"

I told him he should fire a gun to his heart's content on the day we confronted the Japanese, and that the day was not far off. We felt the urge to fire big guns, not just pistols, in commemoration of the formation of the first party organization. Indescribable indeed were our joy and pride as we solemnly pledged to the times and history that, being party members of Korea with their own party organization, we would devote our lives to the revolution.

When, 15 years later, I was lying on a straw mat in the floor-heated room of my home which smelled of my childhood, following the founding of the Party in the liberated country, I set aside all my cares and recollected with deep emotion how we had formed the first party organization in Kalun.

The first party organization, the Society for Rallying Comrades was the embryo and seed of our Party; it was an organization with the importance of a parent body in forming and expanding the basic organizations of the party. Since acquiring its first party organization our revolution has been winning victory after victory under the leadership of the communists from the new generation who have not been influenced by factions and are as pure and fresh as driven snow. From that time the struggle of the Korean communists to build an independent party made dynamic headway on the strong current of the great anti-Japanese war.

Afterwards we sent the members of the Society for Rallying Comrades to various areas and formed party organizations in the northernmost part of Korea along the River Tuman and in many regions of Manchuria.

I took charge of the work of forming party organizations in the homeland. In the autumn of 1930 I went to Onsong County, North Hamgyong Province, where we had a reasonably great influence, and there formed a party organization in the homeland.

Sharing life and death, good times and bad with the popular masses, our young party organizations marched through the anti-Japanese war, always in the vanguard. In the course of this they became tempered as an iron-strong vanguard detachment and grew into an indestructible force which enjoyed the absolute love and trust of the masses.

We had our own organization, but in conducting our work we maintained close relations with the Chinese party. Although we were Korean communists we consistently supported the Chinese revolution and fought in the interests of the Chinese party and people, proceeding from the time-honored neighborly relationship between the Korean and Chinese peoples, the similarity of the circumstances in which the two countries found themselves and the commonness of the mission which the revolutionaries of the two countries assumed before the times. Whenever the Chinese party and people won a victory in their struggle to liberate their nation, we rejoiced over it as over our own, and when they experienced a temporary setback or went through twists and turns, we shared their sorrow.

Since the Korean communists were conducting their activities in China, they could not receive help from the Chinese people nor could they firmly maintain the anti-imperialist united front unless they had contact with the Chinese party.

We attached importance to our relations with the Chinese party also because there were many Koreans in the party organizations under the Manchurian provincial party committee. There were also many Koreans in the east Manchuria Ad hoc committee; the leadership bodies of the county party committees and district party committees in east Manchuria were made up mainly of Koreans, and more than 90 per cent of party members in east Manchuria were Koreans. They played a central, leading role in the party organizations in east Manchuria.

The large number of Korean party members in Manchuria was attributable to the fact that Koreans comprised the greater party of those pioneers who launched the communist movement in Jiandao.

It was after the Japanese imperialists occupied Manchuria that I began to have relations with the Chinese Communist Party. When I was forming the DIU at Whasung Uisuk School and when I was working in Jirin and Wujiazi I had no contact with the Chinese Communist Party. A revolution is naturally an undertaking that is launched independently in accordance with one's own conviction and aim, not at the dictation of somebody else. Therefore, we ourselves evolved the guiding ideology for our revolution and formed the DIU, the genesis of our Party, independently.

Imperialist Japan's occupation of Manchuria after the September 18 incident created a new situation in which Japanese imperialism became the common enemy of the Korean and Chinese peoples. This new situation required that we establish relations with the Chinese Communist Party.

Around the time of the meeting at Mingyuegou in the winter of 1931, while staying at Cao Ya-fan's house, began to have relations with the Chinese Communist Party for the first time. When he was studying in Jirin, Cao Ya-fan did Young Communist League work with me, and later at Hailong he taught at a school, and was in contact with the Chinese Communist Party. Later, when I was conducting activities in Wangqing and other areas after forming the guerrilla army, I established contact with Wang Run-cheng who, in a high position on the Ningnan county party committee, was also in charge of east Manchuria. When Dong Chang-rong was transferred from Dalian to the east Manchuria Ad hoc committee, I established contact with him.

I established relations with the Chinese Communist Party in this manner, and in the course of this I became a cadre of an organization of the Chinese party. After the death of Dong Chang-rong I came into contact with Wei Zheng-min, as well as with Comrade Pan, an inspector from the Comintern.

I maintained my relations with the Chinese Communist Party throughout the whole period of the anti-Japanese armed struggle, and these relations contributed to extending the common front against the Japanese imperialists and to developing the joint struggle.

We developed the joint struggle by maintaining close relations with the Chinese Communist Party. This was a flexible measure we adopted to cope with the complex situation in those days when the Korean communists had to wage the revolutionary struggle in a foreign land. The measure also accorded with the Comintern line of recognizing one party for one country. While developing the joint struggle with the Chinese Communist Party in every possible way, we always held high the banner of Korean liberation, the independent line of the Korean revolution which we carried out honorably. Our Chinese comrades-in-arms spoke highly of our principled stand and sincere efforts, calling them a shining example of properly combining national revolutionary duty with international duty.

Upholding the banner of proletarian internationalism, tens of thousands of the fine sons and daughters of the Korean people took part, together with the Chinese communists, in the protracted anti-Japanese struggle, experiencing trials and hardships.

When Comrade Choi Yong Kun visited China in 1963, Premier Zhou En-lai arranged a banquet in Shenyang in honor of his birthday at which he made a congratulatory speech. In his speech he said: "The Koreans played a leading role in paving the way for the revolution in northeast China. Therefore, the friendship between China and Korea is unbreakable and lasting. The Anti-Japanese Allied Army was a united armed force of the best sons and daughters of the Chinese and Korean peoples."

Comrades Yang Jing-yu, Zhou Bao-zhong and Wei Zheng-min also said on numerous occasions that the Koreans had performed great exploits in clearing the way for the revolution in northeast China.

Because we had freely given our aid in the Chinese revolution, the Chinese helped us in our cause, even at the risk of their lives.

After the reorganization of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army into the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, we formed the party committee of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army within the guerrilla units. That was a fruit of the expansion and development of the first party organization formed in Kalun. Later our independent party organization spread its roots to the Korean National Liberation League, an organization at home of the Association for the Restoration of the Fatherland, as well as to the peasants' associations and trade unions.

We were able to found a party within a month of our triumphal return home. This was because we had gained success and experience in the course of the struggle to realize the cause of party building during the protracted anti-Japanese revolution.

4.5. The Korean Revolutionary Army

---

The building of a party organization put forward as an important task at the Kalun Meeting was started with the formation of the Society for Rallying Comrades, the first party organization. But we could not rest content with this. Ahead of us lay the difficult task of making rapid preparations for an armed struggle.

As the first step by way of preparation for an armed struggle we formed the Korean Revolutionary Army at Guyushu. In founding a temporary political and paramilitary organization such as the Korean Revolutionary Army while planning to form standing revolutionary armed forces within a year or two, our intention was to prepare ourselves for the building of a large guerrilla force through the army's operations.

We intended to lay a mass foundation for an armed struggle and gain the necessary experience for it in the course of the political and military activities of the Korean Revolutionary Army. The fact was, we had little of the knowledge we would need for the armed struggle. Our armed struggle would have to be conducted not in our own land but on the territory of a foreign country, and we needed appropriate experience. But there was no military manual or experience for us to learn from. All we had as resources was some people from the Independence Army, a small number of former cadets of Whasung Military Academy and a few pistols. Beyond this we had nothing. We had to secure our own arms and accumulate military experience for ourselves.

We formed the Korean Revolutionary Army as a temporary setup in order to attain this goal. At Guyushu, Kim Won U and Li Jong Rak made preparations for founding the Revolutionary Army initially and then, later, Cha Gwang Su was sent to complete the preparations. Such preparations were promoted extensively in many places. The main aspect of the preparations was to select young people as recruits and obtain arms. As a guideline for gaining people and arms we set good work with the soldiers of the Independence Army and the winning over of sensible people who fell in with progressive ideas.

If many ex-soldiers joined the Revolutionary Army, they could form its first teaching staff so that it would be quite possible to train those young people who were novices in military affairs. That was why our comrades did a great deal of work among the Independence Army men under the influence of the Kukmin-bu organization. It was our policy to persuade and win over to our camp the progressive-minded men of the Independence Army and enlist them in the Revolutionary Army when they were fully prepared ideologically.

In this period the Kukmin-bu organization was still divided into two groups: the pro-Kukmin-bu and anti-Kukmin-bu factions and the struggle for power continued. The pro-Kukmin-bu faction had control over the Korean residents in Manchuria and the anti-Kukminbu faction held sway over the Independence Army. This led in the end to an estrangement between the people and the army.

In the summer of 1930 the antagonism between the two factions developed into terrorist activity to assassinate the cadres of the other side, and this resulted in a complete rupture between the two forces. This being the situation, not only the rank and file but also the platoon leaders and company commanders looked upon the people of the highest levels with distrust and would not readily obey their orders. They were more willing to listen to our operatives.

Cha Gwang Su conducted his work with the soldiers of the Independence Army in the Tonghua, Human and Guanxi areas, and Li Jong Rak educated his men at Guyushu in preparation for their enlistment in the Revolutionary Army. Li Jong Rak had originally belonged to the first company of the Independence Army under the control of Chongui-bu at Guyushu before coming to Whasung, where he joined the Down-with-Imperialism Union.

The cadets at the school who came from the first company with Li Jong Rak included Park Cha Sok, Park Gun Won, Park Byong Hwa, Li Sun Ho and many other young men. After the school had closed, Li Jong Rak returned to his old company at Guyushu and was appointed its deputy commander and then commander. In those days, unlike now, the strength of the army was quite small, so the company counted for a great deal as an armed force.

Even the Kukmin-bu machinery, which was regarded as the most powerful of all Korean organizations in Manchuria, had only nine companies under it. Naturally, therefore, a company commander was highly respected among the Independence Army soldiers. At Guyushu Li Jong Rak enjoyed great prestige.

As Kim Hyok, Cha Gwang Su and Park So Sim conducted revolutionary activities vigorously under the protection of the Independence Army force controlled by Choe Chang Gol in the Liuhe area in the years 1928-29, so our comrades dispatched to Guyushu worked under the protection of the Independence Army unit commanded by Li Jong Rak. Li Jong Rak still had a very strong will and was extremely enthusiastic about the revolution.

After Whasung Military Academy was closed down, he returned to his old company and acquitted himself well in the assignment I had given him in Huadian to work efficiently with the Independence Army men. He was daring, resolute, quick of judgment and had great ability to command. On the other hand he lacked cool reason and thinking power. He was rash, hot-tempered and self-opinionated. These I think were his chief faults which in later days led him to betray the revolution.

Certain people said that since the Independence Army's line of command was in disorder and there was great confusion within it, the companies scattered in different areas should be disarmed and the reactionaries of Kukmin-bu purged. They insisted that the mantle of the Independence Army be thrown off and operations conducted openly, arms procured and a showdown be had with the Kukmin-bu organization. We strictly guarded against such a tendency, so as to avoid a Left error being committed in work with the Independence Army.

My uncle Hyong Gwon formed two operational groups and went to the Changbai area. He set up his base of operations on the mountain behind Zhiyangjie and formed branch organizations of the Paeksan Youth League, Peasants Union, Anti-Japanese Women's Association and Children's Expeditionary Corps throughout Changbai in order to obtain weapons and awaken the people politically. Young people in the area were drawn into these organizations and given military training. Through the efforts of uncle Hyong Gwon the Independence Army forces in the Changbai region came under our influence.

In parallel with the work of selecting new recruits and creating military reserves, activities to obtain weapons continued at full pace. In the procurement of arms, the greatest feat was performed by Choe Hyo Il. Choe was a salesman in a Japanese guns shop in Tieling. At the time many Japanese dealt in firearms in Manchuria. They sold guns both to bandits and to Chinese landlords. Choe Hyo Il was a young man with only a primary school education, but he was proficient in Japanese. When he spoke it, he was so fluent that nobody could tell if he was a Korean or a Japanese. Because he was too bright for a shop-assistant and because he spoke Japanese so well, the owner of the shop put great trust in him.

The man who won him over to our cause was Chang So Bong. When we were working to establish a base in Kalun, Chang So Bong moved about the areas of Changchun, Tieling and Gongzhuling and, by chance, made the acquaintance of Choe Hyo Il. Having met him several times, he realized that Choe was a faithful and upright man. He drew him into the membership of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League and introduced him to Li Jong Rak. From that time on Choe Hyo Il conducted activities among our enemies in Tieling.

Maintaining contact with Li Jong Rak, he secretly sold weapons to the companies of the Independence Army. Although the owner of the shop knew that the weapons sold by Choe Hyo Il were going to Koreans, he was so eager to boost his sales that he showed no signs of knowing about it. At first he sold weapons to the Chinese and then to the Independence Army men but, in the end, turned the Japanese shop in Tieling into something of an exclusive shop for supplying and delivering weapons to the communists.

In the process of this his world view changed beyond recognition. Every time Li Jong Rak and Chang So Bong met me, they boasted that they had taken in a fine young man in Tieling. So inwardly I came to entertain great expectations of Choe Hyo Il.

In 1928 or 1929 Choe came to Jirin to see me. I found him handsome, with the fair complexion of a young girl. Nevertheless, despite his looks, he was a heavy drinker. According to the criterion of a revolutionary, this was something of a drawback. We dined together and talked for many hours in a hotel. When he, imitating the insinuating voice of a Japanese “madam,” told me some scandal about the emperor and high-ranking military and political figures of Japan and the five quisling ministers of Korea, I held my sides with laughter. He had a wife of rare beauty and was looked on with envy by others, but he was carefree and quite indifferent to the comforts of home.

For all this, he was amazingly bold and strong-willed in the revolutionary struggle, which belied his fair, girlish features. It was on the eve of the Kalun Meeting that he fled to Guyushu with his wife, bringing ten or so firearms along with him from the Japanese shop. He was given a hearty welcome because he had come when we were busy preparing for the formation of a small military and political organization as a temporary step towards building a permanent revolutionary armed force.

We realized through reports made by our comrades that everything was ready for founding the Revolutionary Army. When I arrived in Guyushu I found that the list of names of the men selected for the army and the necessary weapons were all in order and that even the site for the ceremony of founding the army and the names of those attending the ceremony had been decided.

The ceremony of founding the Korean Revolutionary Army took place in the yard of Samgwang School on July 6, 1930. Before distributing the arms I made a brief speech. I made it clear that the Korean Revolutionary Army was a political and paramilitary organization of the Korean communists formed in preparation for launching an anti-Japanese armed struggle and announced that it would serve as the basis for building a permanent revolutionary armed force in the future.

The basic mission of the Korean Revolutionary Army was to enlighten and awaken the masses of the people in towns and farm villages and unite them under the banner of anti-Japanese resistance and, at the same time, to gain experiences in the armed struggle and prepare for the formation of fully-fledged armed forces in the future. In the speech I set out the immediate tasks of the army to build up a backbone to serve as the basis for the formation of anti-Japanese armed units in the future, to lay a mass foundation for the revolutionary army to rely on, and to make full military preparations for starting an armed struggle.

We formed many units under the Korean Revolutionary Army, calling them by number. On my recommendation Li Jong Rak, who was a veteran of military affairs and had great leadership ability, was appointed commander of the Korean Revolutionary Army.

Some historians confuse the Korean Revolutionary Army created by Kukmin-bu with the military organization of the same name we founded at Guyushu. They have good reason to do so because many of the members of the former were admitted to our Revolutionary Army. The two military organizations had the same name but differed in their guiding idea and mission. The Korean Revolutionary Army produced by the Kukmin-bu setup had no real identity because its name and commanders were changed often due to the continued antagonism and disputes in its practical activities, which was a reflection of its internal conflicts.

But our Korean Revolutionary Army was a political, paramilitary organization guided by the communist idea which engaged in both mass political work and military activities. When we founded the Korean Revolutionary Army, we debated a great deal over its name. Because it was the first armed force organized by the Korean communists, its name should have the flavor of something new, we said and discussed the matter heatedly. Various proposals were made.

I persuaded them to call our armed force the Korean Revolutionary Army, adopting the name of the army of Kukmin-bu. I told them that when forming the Down-with-Imperialism Union we had named it without using words suggestive of communism in order not to irritate the nationalists, and that if the army we were founding should assume the cover of the Korean Revolutionary Army, it would not offend the nationalists and would be convenient for it to operate. The name the Korean Revolutionary Army benefited our force in many ways in its later activities.

After its formation the Korean Revolutionary Army was organized into many groups and these groups were dispatched to various areas. A few groups were sent into the homeland. When we sent them into Korea, we wanted to lay the mass foundation for an armed struggle and step up the revolutionary struggle at home while at the same time aiming to test the feasibility of an armed struggle in the homeland.

We decided to form an operational group to work in the homeland with Li Je U, Kong Yong, Park Jin Yong and others who had been absent at the foundation ceremony of the Korean Revolutionary Army and to assign it the task of forming revolutionary organizations among the broad masses by going to North Pyongan Province by way of Singalpa and the Rangnim Mountains. Li Je U was to lead the group.

In 1928 we gave instructions to those who were operating in the areas of Fusong and Naidaoshan to move their operational base to the Changbai area where there were many Koreans. On these instructions Li Je U moved to the Changbai area where he organized people and conducted activities for the political enlightenment of the masses, going deep into the homeland.

We decided to send into the homeland another operational group headed by my uncle Hyong Gwon and consisting of Choe Hyo Il, Park Cha Sok and another. The task of this group was to cross the River Yalu at Changbai and advance almost as far as Pyongyang, going via Pungsan, Tanchon and Hamhung. The inclusion of Park Cha Sok in this group was due to uncle Hyong Gwon's friendship with him.

He had been engaged in underground activities while working as a teacher in the rural areas outside Jirin until the winter of 1928 when he took part in forming revolutionary organizations in the Fusong area together with Kye Yong Chun and Ko Il Bong. At that time Park Cha Sok became a bosom friend of my uncle. When he heard that my uncle was going into the homeland, Park insisted on going with him. Understanding his feelings, we readily granted his request. The members of the Korean Revolutionary Army who had left for their appointed areas of activity conducted their operations fearlessly everywhere.

There was a man by the name of Hyon Dae Hong among the members of the Korean Revolutionary Army who were working in the Sipingjie and Gongzhuling areas. He was arrested while working among the masses in Sipingjie and taken to Changchun. At the moment of his arrest he handed over his weapon to his comrade unnoticed. The police tortured him brutally to get him to tell them where he had concealed his weapon. Hyon Dae Hong mentioned the name of a railway station and "confessed" that he had buried it under an aspen tree near the station. He was seeking a chance to escape. Pleased to hear this, the police took him by train to where he said he had buried his pistol.

While the train was moving Hyon knocked down the two policemen escorting him with his handcuffs and jumped off the train. Then he crawled on all fours using his elbows and knees and returned to his revolutionary organization in Kalun. His comrades in Kalun released him from the handcuffs by using a file. Even after undergoing this dreadful ordeal, he went to Gongzhuling as soon as he was restored to health and continued to work, only to be caught again, this time by the Japanese police.

Gongzhuling was a leased territory wrested from China by the Japanese imperialists, so it was under the jurisdiction of the Japanese. He fought bravely in the court, too. He was sentenced to life imprisonment and was serving his term in the Sodaemun prison in Seoul when he died of the injuries he had suffered at the hands of the brutal Japanese imperialist torturers.

Entering the 1930s, the strength of Li Je U's group increased to dozens of men. Through their efforts, successive anti-Japanese organizations came into being in the Changbai area, a school and an evening class were opened in every village, and debating contests, entertainments and athletics meetings took place frequently. This filled the people with revolutionary ardor. But at that time the Japanese imperialists played the trick of sending an armed group of blackguards disguised as mounted bandits to rob a Korean village to lure out Li Je U and his company. But we had warned them to be wary of mounted bandits, so they did not allow themselves to be caught in the trap. There was only a skirmish in which a few men were wounded, and the incident did not develop into a full-scale battle.

Later the soldiers of a reactionary warlord, in league with the mounted bandits of the Japanese imperialists, launched a surprise attack on the armed men of Li Je U causing a great damage. Park Jin Yong died a heroic death during the battle and Li Je U was taken prisoner. In an attempt to escape the disgrace by killing himself, Li Je U, though bound hand and foot, thrust a kitchen knife into his throat, but he failed. He was handed over to the Japanese police and escorted to Seoul. There he was sentenced to death and died immediately in prison. Kong Yong was also killed, trying to form a united front with some bogus communists who had been sent there by the Japanese imperialists to lure out and capture the anti-Japanese fighters in Manchuria.

It was immediately after the massive peasants' uprising in Tanchon that I received word of the tragic fate of Comrades Kong Yong, Li Je U and Park Jin Yong. When the messenger told me of the fact, I could not calm myself for a long time. My head fell, above all because I felt I had committed the sin of being seriously undutiful to my father. The three men were all members of the Independence Army my late father had particularly cared for and were pioneers of the change of course from the nationalist movement to the communist.

My bitter grief over the tragic fate of Li Je U, Kong Yong and Park Jin Yong was partly due to having lost a reliable operational group that was committed to the implementation of the decision of the Kalun Meeting, but mainly it was due to the regrettable loss of pathfinders in the change of course who had been striving to make my father's will the reality.

At my father's funeral Kong Yong and Park Jin Yong had led the pallbearers. They told my mother they would dress in mourning in my place, so that I need not wear a mourning suit. They must have thought it would be a pitiful sight if I, a boy of 14, took to mourning. For three years the two of them remained in mourning, wearing mourner's hats made of hemp. At the time the Independence Army training center was located at Wanlihe a short distance from the town of Fusong. Once or twice every week Kong Yong would come to my home with a load of firewood on his A-frame carrier and pay his respects to my mother. His wife, too, often visited my home bringing with her edible herbs such as aralias shoots and anise.

Sometimes, Kong Yong would come with a sack of rice over his shoulder. Their support was a great help to our family. My mother treated them as kindly as she would her own brother and sister, sometimes, even admonishing them sternly for their mistake with the authority of an elder sister. After Kong Yong left for Manchuria to join the independence movement, his wife had lived alone in Pyokdong. Then one year she had come to Fusong, to her husband. On her face was a scar from a burn she had got while cooking noodles at home. As he looked at her scarred face, Kong Yong said sullenly that he would not live with her any longer because her face was so ugly.

My mother got angry and scolded him severely, "I say. Are you in your right mind to say that? Your wife has come a long way to see you, and instead of seating her on a cushion of gold for that, you have the outrageous idea of saying that you won't live with her." Kong Yong had always been submissive to my mother, and that day he apologized to her with a deep bow.

I first learned through a newspaper report about the activities of the armed group led by my uncle Hyong Gwon that had gone into the homeland. I cannot remember accurately if it was when I was in Harbin or somewhere else that a comrade brought me the newspaper. It said that an armed group of four men had appeared in Pungsan and shot down a police sergeant, before hijacking a car coming from Pukchong and disappearing in the direction of Huchi Pass.

The comrade who brought me the newspaper was in raptures about the gunshot that had rung out in the homeland, but that gunshot caused me great anxiety. How was it that they had fired shots in Pungsan, which could be called the threshold of the country? I remembered my uncle's fiery temper. It seemed likely that he had lost control of himself and fired his gun.

From his early childhood he had behaved in a manly fashion and was as stubborn as a mule. In mentioning uncle Hyong Gwon, I recall the episode of a bowl of gruel made from coarsely ground millet. As this happened while I was staying in Mangyongdae, my uncle must have been eleven or twelve years old at the time. Our family used to eat gruel of coarsely ground millet every evening. Needless to say it tasted bad, but the most irritating thing of all was that every time we swallowed it the husks of millet pricked our throats. I hated the gruel.

One day my uncle, who was sitting at the table, hit his bowl with his head and overturned it, spilling the hot millet gruel placed before him by his mother, that is, my grandmother. He knocked his head so hard against the bowl that the bowl went flying down to the floor and his forehead began to bleed. He was still young and not fully matured, and was angry to be so poor as to have to eat gruel, so he had vented his grievance on the bowl of coarse gruel. Grandmother gave him a good scolding, saying, "To see you complain about your food, you won't amount to anything." But turning round, she wept.

As he grew up, my uncle would bother about the scar on his forehead. When he came to China to live with us, he used to wear quite a long forelock to hide the scar. He came to China when we were living in Linjiang. My father had him stay with us in order to educate him. As he was a teacher, he could see that his brother, while he lived with us, would get through a secondary school course without even attending school. His idea was to bring him up to be a revolutionary.

While my father was alive, my uncle grew up reasonably soundly under his influence and control. But after my father's death, he lost control of himself and began to behave recklessly. His disposition of his younger days when he had hit his head against the bowl of coarse millet gruel revived, to our astonishment. Now that his eldest brother was gone, he could not remain calmly at home but roamed everywhere, including Linjiang, Shenyang (Mukden) and Dalian.

He had been betrothed to a girl of his parents' choosing when he went home. People with an inside knowledge of our family would say that having returned from home he was unsettled because the girl was not to his liking. Indeed, that could have been the reason, but the main reason for his restlessness was that he could not overcome the despair and sorrow he felt over my father's death.

When I returned home after leaving Whasung, my uncle was still continuing to live recklessly without coming to his senses, like a drunken man. Life for my family was very difficult; my mother was barely eking out a living from her job of washing and sewing. Lee Gwan Rin had come to my house with some money and rice and was helping my mother in her work. She must have felt sorry to see how hard life was for our family. My uncle should have acted as the head of the family in place of my deceased father. In our household there were things he could have attended to.

There was my father's surgery, where some medicines remained, though not very many, but if it had been run properly, it could have been of some help to us. But my uncle ignored the surgery. Frankly speaking, I was extremely displeased at his behavior at the time. So one day at home I wrote a long letter to be read by my uncle when I was away. As I was in my secondary school days, and had a strong sense of justice, I could not stand anything that was unfair, no matter if it concerned someone older than me or not.

I placed the letter under my uncle's pillow before leaving for Jirin. My mother, however, thought it quite improper for me to criticize my uncle in that way.

"Although your uncle is now up in the air like a cloud unable to set his mind on anything, he will surely join the right path in due course. Say what you may, he will not lose sight of the main thing. He can be relied upon to return home when he gets tired of roaming. So don't do anything, not even criticize him. How dare a nephew criticize his uncle?" Thus my mother admonished me. It was typical of my mother to think that way. But I still left the letter for my uncle.

When I returned to Fusong on a holiday after a year at Yuwen Middle School in Jirin, I was surprised to find my uncle Hyong Gwon leading a steady life. My mother's prediction had been correct. He did not say a word about my letter, but I could surmise that the letter had had a considerable effect on him. In the winter of that year he joined the Paeksan Youth League.

After my departure from Fusong he became deeply involved in the work of expanding the youth league. The next year he was admitted to the Young Communist League on the recommendation of his comrades. This was how he became associated with the revolutionary ranks. From 1928 he guided the work of the Paeksan Youth League organizations in the Fusong, Changbai, Linjiang and Antu areas on the instructions of the Young Communist League.

After their neighbors, who had read in the newspapers that in Pungsan there had occurred an incident in which a Japanese police sergeant was shot dead, reported the fact, our family in my home village of Mangyongdae learned of my uncle's arrest. Hearing of it, my grandfather said, "Why, just as his eldest brother did, is his youngest brother also shooting the Japanese to death? Who knows what will come of it in the end? But in any case, it was well done."

Only after some time had passed did I hear the full story of the activities conducted by the operational group in the homeland at Pungsan. August 14, 1930, on the way to Tanchon the group stopped for a while in the blueberry fields of Hwangsuwon near Pabal-ri, Pungsan, where they were regarded suspiciously by the wicked police sergeant Opashi (real name Matsuyama) who was passing on a bicycle. The fellow was a devil who came to Pungsan in 1919 and had been tormenting the Koreans ever since. So the local people called him by the nickname Opashi (Stinging bee?Tr.).

The inhabitants of the area harbored a deep-seated grudge against this villain. As the group were passing in front of the police sub-station this Opashi called them into his office. No sooner had he set foot in the house than my uncle fired and killed the scoundrel. Then he made an anti-Japanese speech openly before the people. Dozens of people listened to his speech. Li In Mo, the war-correspondent of the Korean People's Army, who is known to the world for never having recanted in spite of many years in prison in south Korea, said that he heard his speech in Pabal-ri.

Although the members of the group had the enemy at their heels, they attempted to approach the areas being swept by the flames of the peasants' uprising. We considered the peasants' uprising in Tanchon to be very important. In the places where the uprising broke out there must, without doubt, have been leaders of the mass movement and a large organized force of politically and ideologically awakened and active revolutionary people.

While the enemy was searching frantically for the prime movers in the rebel areas, we were eager to find the central figures from among the insurgent masses such as Oh Jung Hwa of Wangqing, Kim Jun of Longjing and Chon Jang Won of Onsong. By establishing contact with such core elements and exerting a good influence on them, we could lay the foundation for promoting the revolutionary struggle at home. If we could open the door into the Tanchon area, we could proceed by this route to Songjin, Kilju and Chongjin and, further, advance to Pyongyang by way of Hamhung, Hungnam and Wonsan. This was why we had given the operational group at home led by my uncle Hyong Gwon the assignment of meeting the heroes of the peasants' insurgence in Tanchon.

The armed group which had left Pabal-ri after the shooting captured a motor coach carrying the head of the criminal section of the Pungsan police station at the approach to the valley of Pongo. They disarmed the police officer and then made an anti-Japanese address to him and the other passengers. They proceeded to Munang-ri, Riwon County, and talked to the charcoal burners in the valleys of Paedok and Taebawi and in various other places to enlighten them politically. They worked actively all the time in spite of the difficult conditions. On their way to Pukchong, they divided the armed group into two teams - one with my uncle and Chong Ung and the other with Choe Hyo Il and Park Cha Sok. They agreed that the two teams would meet in the town of Hongwon before going on their way.

Early in September my uncle and Chong Ung raided the Kwangje Temple on Mt. Taedok, Pukchong County, where an enemy search party was ensconced and then, while moving towards Hongwon and Kyongpo, encountered an enemy squad in the vicinity of the Cholbu Temple. There they shot the head of the Chonjin police sub-station dead. My uncle entered Hongwon that very day and went to the house of Choe Jin Yong which was where they had promised to meet. Choe Jin Yong had been a member of the Independence Army and a close acquaintance not only of my uncle but also of myself.

When he had been the head of the Ansong area control office in Fusong, he had often called at our home. Earlier, when he had been a sub-county chief in Korea, he had embezzled some public money and, when this was brought to light and a scandal ensued, he had absconded to Manchuria where he had placed himself under the orders of the Chongui-bu organization. He had once stayed with us for many months, eating the meals served him by my mother.

When the Japanese imperialists showed signs of invading Manchuria, Choe left Fusong on the excuse that he was too old to work for the Independence Army any longer. He left for Hongwon saying that he would buy a small orchard, and spend the rest of his life honestly. As soon as he arrived in Hongwon he became a secret agent of the Japanese imperialists. My uncle did not know this.

Choe hid my uncle in a corner of the yard on the pretext that the enemy was keeping a sharp lookout, and then rushed off to the police station and informed them that the armed gang from Manchuria was staying at his house. When my uncle was taken to the police station, Choe Hyo Il was already there. Needless to say, it was Choe Jin Yong that had informed against Choe Hyo Il, too. Only then did my uncle realize that Choe Jin Yong was a stooge of the Japanese imperialists.

The treachery of Choe Jin Yong was a shock, a bolt out of the blue. He used to repeat over and over again, like a chant to Amitabha, that he would never forget, even in his grave, the kindness of Sung Ju's mother who had served him with three hearty, warm meals and a bottle of wine every day for many months. Who could have imagined that this creature would some day turn traitor? When I first heard that Choe Jin Yong had turned informer against my uncle, I could hardly believe my ears. Even now I say that it is good to believe in people but that it is mistaken to harbor illusions about them. Illusions are unscientific things and so, if one harbors illusions, one may commit an irreparable mistake, no matter how perceptive one may be.

Chong Ung was the only one who slipped out of the enemy's net. He had been taken into the group as a guide by my uncle when leaving for the homeland. Being a native of Riwon, he was familiar with the area on the east coast. But later he, too, was arrested in Chunchon because of a spy.

My uncle was detained in Hongwon police station for a while after his arrest, and then transferred to Hamhung jail where he was put to mediaeval torture. The news of his litigating action in Hamhung local court reached me through many lips. Having accused the Japanese imperialists of their crimes, he had loudly declared that armed burglars should be fought off with arms, I heard. What force was it that had made him behave so proudly in the court? It was his faith in and devotion to the revolution, I believe. If there was anything my uncle feared more than death, it must have been the betrayal of the faith which makes a man righteous and courageous and enables him to be the most dignified being in the world.

Choe Hyo Il was sentenced to death and my uncle to 15 years imprisonment. My uncle and his comrades-in-arms sang revolutionary songs loudly in the court. After singing they shouted slogans. The members of the operational group appealed to the Seoul court of review in order to continue their struggle for a longer period. The Japanese imperialists, after their bitter experience at the trial in Hamhung, heard the case behind closed doors in Seoul, without an audience. They sustained the decision of Hamhung local court. Choe Hyo Il was hanged shortly after the court ruling.

He walked out to the gallows with perfect composure after making his last request to his comrades that they fight on unyieldingly. My uncle was thrown into Mapo prison in Seoul, a prison intended mainly for long-term prisoners sentenced to more than ten years. He did not cease his struggle in prison, either. When the Japanese ruffians tried to seduce the long-term "political offenders" to abandon their stand, my uncle made a passionate speech against ideological conversion before a crowd of prisoners to stir them up and then waged a dauntless struggle at the head of the prisoners for an improvement in their treatment. I think the facts about his struggle are already widely known to the public.

Stepping up their war preparations, the Japanese rogues drove the prisoners out to work on making ammunition boxes. The prisoners were forced to do murderous labor on seventh-grade rations. Indignant at this, my uncle led a prisoners' strike in the prison factory to protest against the jail guards who were forcing them to do the murderous labor, the anniversary of the October Revolution marking its launch. A large number of prisoners participated in this strike. In an attempt to stay the influence of my uncle, the prison authorities locked him up in a dark isolation cell and, not content with this, put irons on his wrists and ankles so that the irons cut into his flesh whenever he made the slightest movement.

He was given only one meal a day, and this a ball of rice mixed with soy beans as small as a child's fist. Since my uncle continued with his struggle in such terrible conditions, the prison authorities whimpered that Kim Hyong Gwon was turning the Mapo prison red. One day, while working in the prison factory, Park Cha Sok heard that we were actively engaged in an armed struggle throughout Manchuria. He conveyed this news to my uncle. On hearing it, my uncle wept for the first time since being put behind bars and, holding the hands of Park Cha Sok, said in a faltering voice, as I heard later:

"I think my days are numbered. But you survivors, I pray that you fight on to the last. When you have served your time and get out of here, be sure to go and see my mother in Mangyongdae and tell her about me.... If you meet Sung Ju some day, tell him my story and let him know that I fought to the last moment of my life without yielding. This is my last request."

My uncle was now so weak that he was confined to bed. When he was on the verge of death, the prison authorities sent notice to Mangyongdae permitting us to go and see him. My uncle Hyong Rok got a loan of 40 won and went to Seoul with Bong Ju, a relation, and met his younger brother Hyong Gwon for the last time.

"When we arrived at the prison, a warder took us to the infirmary. I saw all the other sick prisoners sitting up, but our Hyong Gwon who was at death's door was lying in bed looking like a skeleton. To think how bitter I felt at that time! ... Seeing me, he just mumbled, unable to utter a word. He was so ghastly I could hardly believe he was my brother. In spite of that, he smiled at me and said, 'Elder brother, although I'm going before attaining my aim, the Japanese villains are bound to fall.' Hearing him say this, I thought it was just like our Hyong Gwon."

This is what uncle Hyong Rok said to me when I visited my old home after my triumphal return to the homeland. When I heard this, I wept at the thought of uncle Hyong Gwon. And I felt remorse for the criticism I had once leveled at him in a letter. My uncle Hyong Rok, who had almost fainted at the sight of his brother in such a terrible condition, said to the warder:

"Please allow me to take my brother Hyong Gwon home for treatment."

"No," said the warder, "your brother will live in prison if he should live and should die the ghost of a prison if he should die.... You can't take him home."

"Then I will take his place in prison. After he has received treatment and recovered, he can come back here."

"You fool, where is there such a law that permits a man to serve a prison term in the place of another?"

"Why, you make up laws as you please, so why can't you do this? Grant me my request, I beg you."

"You rogue, where do you think you are to talk such nonsense? Just as the younger brother is a rogue, so the elder brother is, too. You're all a bad lot. Get out of here right away!"

The warder shouted at him and turned him out of the prison. At his wit's end, uncle Hyong Rok put 16 won in the hand of the warder and asked him, "Please take care of my brother Hyong Gwon." With this he left for Mangyongdae. Doubtless such a small amount of money had no effect on the prison guard, but that was all he had.

After returning from the prison, my uncle could not sleep for a month. When he closed his eyes, the vision of his brother rose before him and he could not bring himself to sleep. Three months later, uncle Hyong Gwon died in prison. It was early in 1936 and I was on the way to the Nanhutou area with the guerrilla unit, having returned from the second expeditionary campaign to north Manchuria. My uncle was 31 years old when he died.

So, by then gone were my father, my mother, my younger brother and now even my uncle. So all my family who had gone through unspeakable hardships and privations for the sake of the revolution were no more. When I received word in the mountains that my uncle had passed away, I made up my mind that I would not die but by all means survive to avenge the death of my uncle who was lying alone on a nameless hill in the homeland with his grief over the nation's ruin unassuaged, and would win back my country, come what may.

I have already mentioned the painful fact that when the notice of his death came, our family at Mangyongdae could not go and recover his body because they could not afford the travel expenses, and that therefore, his body was buried in the cemetery of the Mapo prison. Just before he breathed his last, uncle Hyong Gwon told the other inmates of a fact he had been keeping secret:

"Kim Il Sung is my nephew. He is now leading a large revolutionary force in Manchuria, thrashing the Japanese pigs. It will not be long before his army storms into the country. Wait in arms to greet them. Only when we fight can we expel the Japanese ruffians and liberate the country!"

Whenever I think of my uncle Hyong Gwon, I see before my eyes my innumerable comrades-in-arms who laid down their young lives without hesitation on the road to the implementation of the decision of the Kalun Meeting. Uncle Hyong Gwon had a daughter called Yong Sil. After liberation she attended the Mangyongdae Revolutionary School. I thought I would bring her up with all care to succeed her father. But his only child was killed during a bombing raid during the war.

The feats performed by the members of the Korean Revolutionary Army who had opened up the path ahead of our revolution were truly great and noble. It was by drawing on the experiences and lessons of their heroic struggle and at the cost of the precious blood shed by them that the Korean People's Revolutionary Army came into the world as a permanent revolutionary armed force.

4.6. Poet Kim Hyok and How I became 'Kim Il Sung'

A revolution begins with the recruiting of comrades. For a capitalist money is capital; for a revolutionary the people are the source of his strength. A capitalist builds up a fortune in money, whereas a revolutionary changes and transforms the society by drawing on the efforts of his comrades. When young, I had many comrades. Some of them I had become friendly with in my everyday life, and some had come to share the same idea as me in the course of our struggle. Each of them was worth his weight in gold. Kim Hyok, who nowadays is known as a revolutionary poet, was a comrade of mine. He made a lasting impression on me in my youth.

It is more than half a century since his death, but I still remember him. I first met him in the summer of 1927. As I was talking with my teacher Shang Yue in the corridor after a Chinese lesson, Kwon Tae Sok hurried up to me and told me that I had a visitor. He said that the stranger was standing with a spectacled man named Cha Gwang Su at the front gate.

I found a young man with a girlish, handsome face, standing, a trunk in his hand, at the gate with Cha Gwang Su, waiting for me. It was the young man, Kim Hyok, whom Cha Gwang Su had been extolling as a talent whenever he had the opportunity. Before Cha Gwang Su had time to introduce him to me, he introduced himself, saying, "I am Kim Hyok," and held out his hand for a handshake. I gripped his hand and introduced myself I felt a special attraction towards Kim Hyok not only because his name was already familiar to me, thanks to Cha Gwang Su's enthusiastic "advertisement," but also because his face resembled that of Kim Won U.

"Will you take Kim Hyok to the hostel and wait for me there for an hour? I could excuse myself from an ordinary lecture, but the next lesson happens to be a literature lesson given by Shang Yue," I said to Cha Gwang Su, after apologizing to Kim Hyok. "Oh! Everyone is fascinated by his literature lessons. You are set on becoming a man of literature like Kim Hyok, aren't you?" Cha Gwang Su said, jokingly, pushing back his spectacles. "There's no reason why I shouldn't. The revolution seems to require a knowledge of literature, doesn't it, Kim Hyok?"

"It is only now and here in Jirin that I hear what sounds sweet to my ear!" Kim Hyok exclaimed. "It is impossible to talk about a revolution apart from literature. The revolution is the object and source of literature. If the literature teacher is so popular I, too, want to see him".

"I will introduce you to him later." With this promise, I went to my class. When I went out to the gate after the lesson, the two were still there waiting for me, talking about something like variable and invariable capital. I was caught up in the enthusiasm emanating from their voices. Remembering that Cha Gwang Su had told me that Kim Hyok was a born enthusiast, I was secretly glad to have gained a fine comrade. "I told you to wait at the hostel, so why are you still standing here?"

"Why should we crawl about in a room like cockroaches on this fine day?" Kim Hyok remarked, looking up at the glorious sky, with one eye half-closed. "I would rather walk from here through the streets of Jirin all day, talking."

"There is a saying that it takes a full stomach to appreciate even the best of scenery. So let's have lunch and then go wherever you like, to Beishan or Jiangnan Park. It would be very impolite not to buy a lunch for a man who has come all the way from Shanghai to see us, wouldn't it?" "Seeing you, Comrade Sung Ju, in Jirin, I think I wouldn't feel hungry even if I missed several meals."

Kim Hyok was a man of passion, a liberal in action and words. As luck would have it, I had no money in my pocket at the time. So I took them to the Sanfeng Hotel where I would be welcomed free of charge. The people there were not only kind-hearted, but also good at cooking noodles. I explained to the hostess that I was in financial difficulties, and she served us six bowls of noodles, two for each of us. Kim Hyok stayed with me in my room for three days, and we talked every night. On the fourth day he left for Xinantun, where Cha Gwang Su was working, in order to acquaint himself with the situation in the rest of Jirin.

At my first meeting with him I realized that he was a man of great passion. While Cha Gwang Su was boisterous, Kim Hyok was fiery. Usually he was calm and quiet but, once excited, he boiled like a blast furnace, and was extremely vehement. He had traveled the three Far Eastern countries living through weal and woe just as Cha Gwang Su had done. Though an adventurer, he was upright. Through the conversations we had I found him to be widely informed and a great theoretician. In particular, he had a profound knowledge of literature and the arts.

We talked a great deal about the mission of literature and the arts. He emphasized that literature and the arts must deal with man. After a period gaining experience of affairs in Jirin, his views developed; he said that literature and the arts must sing the praises of the revolution. His outlook on literature was revolutionary. In consideration of his abilities, we gave him the assignment of dealing with mass cultural enlightenment for a while. Thus he gave frequent guidance to the activities of the art propaganda squad. Because he was good at poetry, we nicknamed him Eugene Pottier<sup>9</sup>. Some of us called him Heine. He himself spoke more highly of Heine and Eugene Pottier than any other poets. He liked Li Sang Hwaio best of all the Korean poets.

On the whole he liked impassioned revolutionary poems. Strangely enough, however, he liked the lyrically descriptive novels of Ra Do Hyang' better than the strongly assertive works of Choe So Hae. His conflicting literary tastes led us to reflect on how strange the laws of nature were. Around us there were many instances of the harmonious combination of contrasting things. Cha Gwang Su likened them to the "harmony of positive and negative." He said that Kim Hyok was a literary individual produced from such a harmony.

In spite of the pressure of the difficult and complex work for the revolution, Kim Hyok found time to write excellent poems. The girl students who belonged to our revolutionary organization used to jot down his poems in their pocketbooks and recite them fondly. Kim Hyok did not struggle with his poetic expression on paper, writing and re-writing them, but polished them from the first line to the last in his head until he decided that they were perfect. Then he would bang on the desk with his fist and write the poem down on paper. Our comrades, who knew that when he banged his fist on the desk he would produce a poem, were delighted at this, exclaiming that he had laid another "egg" We all rejoiced over each of his new poems.

Kim Hyok had a beautiful girl friend named Sung So Ok, who belonged to the Young Communist League. She was of slender build, but daring and ready to stand on the gallows if it was in the cause of justice. She was faithful to the Young Communist League. During the mass struggle in autumn that year against the construction of the Jirin-Hoeryong railway, I heard a speech she made in the street and found her to be extremely articulate. She loved to chant Kim Hyok's poems, carrying them in her pocketbook. She was good at chanting poems, singing and making speeches, and she always went about in a white jacket and dark skirt, whatever the season, so almost every young man in the town of Jirin knew of her.

Kim Hyok, who always approached life with warm feelings and fused it into his poetry, was also ardent in his love for his girl friend. Young communists loved the other sex while they worked for the revolution. Some people say that communists are devoid of human feelings and know neither life nor love that is worthy of human beings. But such people are totally ignorant of what communists are like. Many of us loved while fighting for the revolution and made our homes in the rain of fire. In holiday seasons we used to send Kim Hyok and Sung So Ok together to Guyushu, giving them a few assignments to work among the masses. Guyushu was the girl's home town.

In their leisure hours after working among the masses, they would go for walks in the thick willow woods on the River Yitonghe, or they would go fishing. When Kim Hyok went fishing, his girl friend would bait his hook or pick the fish off the hook. In Beishan Park and on the River Songhuajiang where the scenery was beautiful and on the River Yitonghe, their love deepened as the revolution advanced.

For some unknown reason, however, the girl's father Sung Chun Hak did not seem to be pleased with the affair. He was the founder and headmaster of Changsin School, the predecessor of Samgwang School. Having traveled and studied in the Maritime Province of Siberia, he had had some taste of modern civilization, and as such he was a particularly enlightened man. He had been the first to express his understanding of and active support for our work when, in Guyushu, we were reforming Changsin School into Samgwang School and the nationalist mass organizations into communist, revolutionary organizations. Because such a man was against their love, Kim Hyok, though normally bold, could not help feeling embarrassed.

The girl's mother, who regarded Kim Hyok as an ideal match for her daughter, connived at their association and often spoke to her husband in favor of their love. After a long period of close observation of the personality of Kim Hyok, the girl's father, too, recognized him as a stalwart revolutionary and approved their engagement. On the day of their engagement, Kim Hyok and Sung So Ok had a photograph taken together; the girl's family had a camera.

At the news of Kim Hyok's death, the desperate girl tried to drown herself in the River Yitonghe. Some of our comrades dragged her out of the river and managed to calm her. Later the girl continued to work faithfully for the revolution. She married Choe Il Chon, the author of A Short History of the Korean Revolutionary Movement Overseas, after the death of his wife. She considered it ideal to be the life companion of a man who was as revolutionary as Kim Hyok, even though it meant raising stepchildren.

Kim Hyok's fiery character was expressed in practice in his loyalty to the revolution. As a revolutionary, he had a high sense of responsibility and loyalty. He was older than me by five years and had studied in Japan, but he never revealed any sign of such things. He always accepted sincerely the assignments we gave him. That was why I treasured him and loved him particularly.

From the summer of 1928 Kim Hyok, together with Cha Gwang Su, worked in Liuhe County. Around this time, under their guidance the social science institute (special class) was set up at Tongsong School in Gaoshanzi and a branch of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League was formed. Kim Hyok taught the history of human evolution, the political geography of the world, literature and music. He was very popular among the students and young people of Gaoshanzi.

Around the time when I was in east Manchuria after my release, Kim Hyok was traveling between Guyushu and Jirin to carry out the assignments given him by the organization. When I went to Dunhua, I gave him the written assignment of preparing to issue a new publication, while guiding the revolutionary organizations in Jiangdong, Jirin and Xinantun. A while later, on my way to Kalun from Dunhua where I had been working, I dropped in on Kim Hyok and found that he was carrying out the assignment well. When I told him about the plan I had conceived while in prison and about the work that should be done at Kalun, he became excited and said that he would go at once with me to Kalun. I told him to follow me later after carrying out his assignment. He was very sorry to hear that, but he remained in Xinantun and accelerated the preparation of a new publication; then he came to Kalun.

After the meeting at Kalun we stepped up the preparation of a new publication in real earnest. Now that establishing a new revolutionary line had become the order of the day, and now that the first Party organization with a mission to mobilize the masses for its implementation had been formed, the issuing of a publication to play the role of the Party organization's ideological mouthpiece had become a most pressing task.

With a clear understanding of this need, Kim Hyok, even after his arrival in Kalun, worked day and night preparing the manuscripts for the publication. The publication was called Bolshevik at his suggestion. We planned to publish Bolshevik in bulletin form for the purpose of equipping the masses with the revolutionary idea and then, after making full material preparations, to enlarge it into a newspaper and increase its circulation. On July 10, 1930 the inaugural issue of Bolshevik was finally published.

It was circulated to the branch organizations of the Young Communist League and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League, many other anti-Japanese revolutionary organizations and to groups of the Korean Revolutionary Army, as well as to schools under our control to be used as teaching material. An explanation of my report at Kalun was also carried in the bulletin. Bolshevik played an extremely important role in giving publicity to the policy adopted at the Kalun Meeting. After a while the monthly bulletin became a weekly newspaper to meet the requirements of the readers and the developing revolutionary situation.

As the first editor of Bolshevik, Kim Hyok, before he left Kalun, stayed up almost every night, writing articles for publication. He was fired with enthusiasm and had hardly any rest. He went to Harbin at the head of a group of the Korean Revolutionary Army early in August 1930. Having worked mainly in Jirin, Changchun, Liuhe, Xingjing, Huaide and Yitong, he was nearly a stranger to Harbin. I myself hardly knew about the situation in this city, either.

While we were in Jirin, we realized the importance of Harbin. The city had a large industrial population. In order to go among the working class, it was necessary to venture into large cities like Changchun and Harbin and develop our strength there. As was demonstrated by the struggle against the construction of the JilinHoeryong railway and the struggle against the treacherous anti-Soviet acts of the warlords in attacking the Zhongdong railway, the workers, students and other young people of that city had a strong revolutionary spirit. If proper organizational lines were laid in such a city, many people could be organized.

We considered Harbin important also because the liaison office of the Communist International was in the city. The Young Communist League organization under the Communist International was also in that city, and it maintained relations with the Young Communist League which I had formed at Yuwen Middle School in Jirin. In order to contact the Communist International, it was imperative to establish a channel in this city for free access to it.

The main purpose of sending Kim Hyok to Harbin was to enlarge our revolutionary organization in that city and establish a liaison with the Communist International. I still remember Kim Hyok who, unable to hide his excitement, cheerfully accepted the task we gave him. It was Kim Gwang Ryol (Kim Ryol) who wrote a letter of introduction for him to the Communist International.

When bidding me farewell, Kim Hyok held my hand in his for a long time. Though he used to accept and carry out instantly any task we gave him, regardless of its importance, he was always reluctant to part with us when going on a mission on his own. He liked to work with many comrades. He hated loneliness more than anything else.

Once I said to him that it was a good idea for a poet to experience solitude frequently as a part of his literary endeavors, and asked him why he was afraid of being alone. He answered frankly that, when he had wandered in indignation, solitude had been a good companion, but now that he no longer did so, he did not like it. He said that after a few months of solitude in Jiangdong he found it interesting to work among his friends in Kalun, sitting up all night, and he was sorry to be parting from us.

I gripped his hand and said, as if coaxing a child, "Kim Hyok, we have to part with each other because we are working for the revolution. When you are back from Harbin, let us go to east Manchuria and work there together." Kim Hyok smiled a lonely smile. "Sung Ju, don't worry about matters in Harbin. I will carry out the task given me by the organization at all costs and come back to you comrades. When you go to east Manchuria, please make sure that I am the first you call."

That was the last time I bid him farewell. After parting with him, I myself felt lonely. It was towards the end of 1927 that our line began to stretch into Harbin. At that time several students who had been working their way through Jirin Middle School No. 1 had a battle with the teacher of history, a reactionary, who had insulted the Korean nation. They left the school and ran away to Harbin. Among them were some members of the Ryugil Association of Korean Students which was under our guidance.

We gave them the assignment of forming an organization in Harbin. They organized the Korean Students Friendship Society and a reading circle, centered on the Korean students at the Harbin Academy, Harbin Higher Technical School and Harbin Medical College. With the hardcore elements of these organizations the Harbin branch of the Anti-Imperialist Youth League was formed in the autumn of 1928, and then the Harbin branch of the Young Communist League of Korea early in 1930. In every holiday season we sent Han Yong Ae on a mission to guide the organizations in Harbin. It was thanks to these organizations that the students and young people of Harbin waged a massive struggle in response to the campaign against the construction of the Jirin-Hoeryong railway.

There were many stalwart young people in the revolutionary organizations in Harbin. Comrade So Chol, now a member of the Political Bureau of the Party Central Committee, was working in the Harbin branch of the Young Communist League at the time.

When the group of the Korean Revolutionary Army under the command of Kim Hyok arrived in Harbin, the atmosphere in the city was dreadful. Even such legitimate organizations as the students friendship society and the reading circle had been forced underground. The Young Communist League and other underground organizations had to remain very secretive. Kim Hyok discussed with the comrades in the city how to protect the organizations and their members. At his suggestion all the revolutionary organizations in the city were divided into small groups and sent deep underground.

Together with the members of the armed group, Kim Hyok went deep among the dock workers, students and other people of different strata and worked hard to explain to them the policy that had been adopted at the Kalun Meeting. On the strength of his organizational skill and audacity, he educated the young people, enlarged the organizations, made preparations for the formation at grassroots level of party organizations and pressed on with the procurement of weapons. He also established contact with the liaison office of the Communist International, despite the enemy's strict surveillance.

Kim Hyok rendered distinguished service in improving work in Harbin. In charge of one district, he worked hard, moving in all directions. But at a secret rendezvous in Daoli in the city he encountered the enemy who surprised him and fell upon him. Having exchanged fire with the enemy, he jumped from the third floor of the building he was in, resolved to die. But his iron-like physique betrayed his resolve. Having failed in his suicide attempt, he was captured by the enemy and taken to Lushun prison. After suffering cruel torture and persecution he died in prison.

Kim Hyok, along with Paek Sin Han, was a prominent young man from the first revolutionary generation who gave his life and youth for the sake of the country and nation. The death of the talented Kim Hyok at a time when a comrade in the revolution was worth his weight in gold was a heart-rending loss to our revolution. At the news of his capture I spent many sleepless nights. Later, when I went to Harbin, grief-stricken, I walked the streets and the dock where Kim Hyok had trodden, and quietly I sang a song he had composed.

Kim Hyok, like Cha Gwang Su and Park Hun, had joined hands with us after wandering foreign lands far away from his homeland in pursuit of the path Korea should follow. Cha Gwang Su had written to him about us when he was wasting his life sighing, eating another's salt at a lodging house in the French concession in Shanghai. "Don't waste your valuable life in Shanghai. Come to Jirin and here you will find the leader, the theory and the movement you are seeking. Jirin is an ideal place for you!..." Cha Gwang Su had written to him not once, but three or four times. That was how he had come to us.

Having inspected the city of Jirin over several days after making our acquaintance, Kim Hyok had said, as he gripped my hand, "Sung Ju, I will drop my anchor here. My life starts from now." It was when they were studying in Tokyo, Japan, that Cha Gwang Su and Kim Hyok had become bosom friends. I still remember Kim Hyok leading the song International and shedding tears when we were forming the Young Communist League".

That day Kim Hyok took me by the hand and said in the following vein: Once I took part in a demonstration with some Chinese students in Shanghai. When I saw them marching the streets, shouting anti-Japanese slogans, I became excited and jumped into the ranks of the demonstrators. When the demonstration was frustrated, I returned to my lodging, wondering what was to be done next, what was to be done the following day.

As I belonged to no political party or organization, there was nobody to tell me where to gather or what to do the next day, or to tell me how to fight. While demonstrating I thought how good it would be if there was somebody who would shout "Forward!" to me when I was discouraged during the demonstration, how encouraging it would be if I had an organization and a leader to tell me what I should do the following day as I was going home after the demonstration, how happy I would be if I had comrades who, if I was shot and fell, would call "Kim Hyok!" "Kim Hyok!" as they wept over me, and how good it would be if they were Koreans in a Korean organization.

I was haunted by these thoughts even when I was marching towards the enemy's guns, but here in Jirin, how fortunate I am to meet such fine comrades! I can hardly express my feeling of pride now that I have become a member of the Young Communist League!

He spoke his mind without affectation. He always said that it was the greatest happiness in his life that he had found good comrades. Because of the life he had led, he composed the Star of Korea and disseminated it among the revolutionary organizations. At first I knew nothing about it. On my visit to Xinantun I found some young people there singing the song.

Kim Hyok had discussed the matter with Cha Gwang Su and Choe Chang Gol without my knowledge and spread the song in Jirin and in the surrounding area. At first I rebuked them severely for singing a song which compared me to a star.

Around the time the song Star of Korea was being spread, my comrades changed my name and began to call me Han Byol. They changed my name despite my protests and called me Han Byol, meaning "One Star." It was Pyon Dae U and other public-minded people in Wujiazi and such young communists as Choe Il Chon who proposed to change my name into Kim Il Sung. Thus I was called by three names, Sung Ju, Han Byol and Il Sung. Kim Sung Ju is the name my father gave me. When I was a child I was called Jung Son. My great-grandmother called me Jung Son, and the rest of my family followed suit.

As I was very fond of the name my father gave me, I did not like to be called by another name. Still less did I tolerate the people extolling me by comparing me to a star or the sun; it did not befit me, young man. But my comrades would not listen to me, no matter how sternly I rebuked them for it or argued against it. They were fond of calling me Kim Il Sung, although they knew that I did not like it.

It was in the spring of 1931 when I spent some three weeks in prison, having been arrested by the warlords in Guyushu, that the name Kim Il Sung appeared in the press for the first time. Until that time most of my acquaintances had called me by my real name, Sung Ju. It was in later years when I started the armed struggle in east Manchuria that I was called by one name, Kim Il Sung, by my comrades. These comrades upheld me as their leader, even giving me a new name and singing a song about me. Thus they expressed their innermost feelings.

They upheld me with such enthusiasm in spite of the fact that I was much younger than they were and my record of struggle was short, because they had learned a serious lesson from the movement of the previous generation in which various parties and factions, behaving as if they alone were heroes, and without a center of unity and solidarity, ruined the revolutionary movement through factional strife, and because they had felt to the marrow of their bones that in order to win back the country the twenty million Korean people must unite, and that in order to unite in mind and purpose they must have a center of leadership, a center of unity.

So it is with a strong feeling of affection that I remember Kim Hyok, Cha Gwang Su and Choe Chang Gol, not because they composed a song about me and upheld me as their leader, but because they were forerunners who ushered in an era of true unity, the pride and glory of our people and the genuine source of their unfathomable strength, the unity which our nation had been unable to achieve in spite of their burning desire for it, and also because these forerunners, at the cost of their blood, created a new history of unity and cohesion in which the leader and the masses were fused into a harmonious whole in the communist movement of our country.

The communists of the new generation, my comrades in the revolution, had never feuded because they knew no lust for position, and they never broke our unity, our lifeblood, on account of any difference in opinion. In our ranks unity and cohesion were the touchstone by which we judged genuine revolutionaries. Therefore, they safeguarded unity even when they were in prison or on the gallows. They handed it down as a treasure to the communists of the next generation. That was their first historic achievement. The noble and beautiful spirit of the communists of that generation who upheld their leader and united behind him has become a great tradition of unity which is now called single-hearted unity by our Party.

From the days when the young communists, upholding their leader and united behind him in mind and purpose, developed the revolutionary struggle, the national liberation struggle in Korea put an end to factional strife and confusion, and began a new chapter. More than half a century has passed since Kim Hyok left us. But the image of Kim Hyok who worked through many a night and made his way through the biting wind in Manchuria, enduring hunger and frostbite, is still vivid in my memory.

If he were alive by our side, he could do a lot of work. Whenever I find myself facing a trial or a crisis on the path of our revolution, I think of Kim Hyok, our close comrade who made his youth glorious through his struggle, fired with love for the country, and I grieve over him, who left us so early.

We have set up a statue of Kim Hyok in the front row of the Revolutionary Martyrs Cemetery on Mt. Taesong in order to convey his image to posterity for ever. Because he left no photograph and because all his contemporaries passed away, no one knew what he looked like. The sculptors had difficulty in making a bust of him, so I described him to them so that they could complete the bust.

4.7. The Summer of 1930

Before and after August 1, 1930, international peace day, the factionalists of the M-L group again caused a reckless revolt in the areas along the Jirin-Dunhua railway, having failed to learn a lesson from the failure of the May 30 Uprising.

The revolt placed a serious difficulty in the path of our revolution. A few organizations which had gone deep underground after the May 30 Uprising were exposed to the enemy. The organizations which we had gone to such pains to restore by touring different places after our release from prison were again dealt a blow and destroyed. Fine leading-core elements in different parts of Manchuria were arrested en masse and executed. The enemy also got another good excuse for slandering communism and suppressing the communist movement. No particular explanation is necessary as to what a great help the revolt was to the racial alienation policy of the Japanese imperialists. Because of the two revolts the Koreans completely lost credit with the Chinese people. It was only later, through the guerrilla war, that we were able to restore our credit.

The Koreans in east Manchuria gradually began to be awakened to the danger of Left adventurism through the August 1 Uprising and to look on the factionalists and flunkies who had driven the masses into such a reckless uprising with disfavor and alarm. We immediately dispatched political workers to the areas swept by the revolt in order to prevent the revolutionary masses from again being duped by the factionalists' propaganda. I decided to go to Dunhua via Jirin and spend a short time restoring the organizations there.

In Jirin I found the atmosphere to be as terrible as it had been immediately after the May 30 Uprising. Several times a day I went in disguise to visit those who had been involved in the organization. Jirin station, the city gates and the crossroads were all enemy checkpoints. The secret agents of the Japanese consulate wandered the streets searching for Korean revolutionaries. Because the nationalist movement was on a decline the enemy placed cordons in various places to arrest the young people engaged in the communist movement rather than chasing the heads of the Independence Army as they had done at the time of the Ahn Chang Ho incident.

I was angry at the thought that it was difficult to see familiar faces in the streets of Jirin which had previously been astir with the struggle against the Jirin-Hoeryong railway projects.

When parting from me, my comrades had advised me not to stay for long in Jirin and to hurry to Hailong, Qingyuan or somewhere else. Nevertheless, it was not easy for me to leave Jirin. When I thought that I had worked hard day and night to clear a new way for the revolution there for three years, it was not easy for me to turn towards another place. If I had not taken such pains to make the revolution, even being imprisoned, I might not have felt so much affection for the city. A man naturally likes a place where he has worked heart and soul.

Fortunately I met a comrade who had been engaged in the work of the Young Communist League and he told me the whereabouts of several organization members. I gathered them together and told them not to expose any more organization members and, for the time being, bring underground such legitimate organizations as the Association of Korean Children in Jirin and the Ryugil Association of Korean Students in Jirin.

I discussed with them measures for implementing the line of the Kalun Meeting. I gave the most reliable comrades the assignment of restoring the revolutionary organizations, and I sent them to the areas assigned to them.

I decided to leave Jirin. I had too much work to do. While I was handling affairs in Jirin, I ardently desired to go to east Manchuria and restore the wrecked organizations there. I decided to go to Qingyuan or Hailong and take refuge at the houses of some Chinese comrades for the time being and then eliminate the aftereffects of the revolt by touring the areas that had been seriously ravaged by the enemy. If I were to go to Hailong and Qingyuan I would be able to establish contact with Choe Chang Gol whom I had not met since the Kalun Meeting and, together with him, explore the route to south Manchuria. The area around Liuhe was where Choe Chang Gol was conducting his activities.

Choe Chang Gol had formed some basic party organizations and was extending the YCLK, AIYL and other mass organizations, touring the Liuhe, Hailong and Qingyuan areas. The revolutionary movement in these areas was suffering greatly from the antagonism between the pro-Kukmin-bu group and the anti-Kukmin-bu group. With the influence of the August 1 Uprising reaching these areas at this time, revolutionary organizations were being destroyed en masse.

Between Hailong and Qingyuan lived a schoolmate of mine from my Jirin days. He was a Chinese comrade who served in our unit in the early years of the guerrilla war and returned home after the expedition to south Manchuria. I thought that if I stayed at his house for a while the white terrorist outrages would lessen and I would survive the most dangerous period.

The day I left Jirin, several female comrades saw me off at the station. They were finely dressed, like the daughters of a rich family, so I boarded the train without causing suspicion. The warlords did not think that gentlemen could possibly be involved in the communist movement.

I caught my train at a station in the suburbs which was loosely guarded by the enemy instead of at Jirin station. On the train I unexpectedly met Zhang Wei-hua. He said, "I am going to Shenyang to study. I went to Jirin to see you and talk with you about a path for the revolution, but the city was empty. My Korean friends had all hidden themselves and only soldiers, police and cat's paws of the Japanese could be seen. I went there to see you but I could not. Having no friends, I am going to Shenyang." In spite of my protests, he took me to a first-class carriage. He seemed to have guessed that I was concealing my identity to avoid the terrorist outrages.

That day the police examined the passengers particularly closely. Shutting all the carriage doors, they checked the identity of each passenger as he boarded the train and even examined the belongings of some passengers. The ticket inspectors, too, were unusually careful in checking the tickets of the passengers. The aftermath of the August 1 Uprising had reached not only the cities and rural communities but also the trains. The police rudely examined the passengers but did not dare to approach Zhang Wei-hua who was wearing a good-quality Chinese robe. Because I was sitting beside him, I was not examined by the police either. The ticket inspector passed us by, without asking us to show our tickets. It was because of Zhang Wei-hua, and thanks to him I arrived safely at Hailong station. I had papers and secret documents about me. If the police had searched me, I would have been in danger.

When I arrived at Hailong station, I saw an imposing array of policemen from the Japanese consulate standing on the platform and by the ticket gate. I sensed danger. I became nervous when I saw that the police at the station were Japanese. Chinese police and Japanese police were all alike, but if one was caught by the Japanese police, one could expect no mercy. When they arrested Korean revolutionaries in Manchuria, they escorted them to Korea or tried them at the court of the Guandong government-general and sent them to prison in Lushun, Dalian or Jirin.

As I gazed steadily out of the window, at a loss what to do, Zhang Wei-hua invited me to go with him if I had no particularly urgent matter to attend to. He suggested that I meet his father and talk with him about his future.

According to my initial plan I was to leave the train at Caoshi station and continue to my destination. I should have gone through five or six stations more to reach Caoshi station. If Zhang Wei-hua alighted from the train at Hailong station, there would be no one to protect me and I might be in danger.

So I decided to accept his invitation. Zhang Wei-hua's father was waiting for him at the station. On hearing that his son was coming to Hailong, he had come to meet him on his way back from Yingkou where he had been selling ginseng, he said. A group of privately employed soldiers with Mausers in wooden cases stuck through their belts brought a luxury carriage for us to ride in. Their appearance was imposing. Awe-struck, the police from the consulate did not dare to approach us. We rode proudly in the luxury carriage along the street in front of the station, escorted by the personal bodyguard. That day Zhang Weihua and I stayed at a luxury hotel where we rested well. They threw a two and three-deep cordon around the hotel.

His father said that he was glad to meet me again after such a long interval. He conducted me to a luxury room and treated me to a good meal. Whenever he had met me since the Fusong days he had treated me kindly. When his guests asked who I was he, by way of a joke, introduced me as his adopted son.

At first he called me his adopted son as a joke, but later came to call me so in earnest. I had been on good terms with Zhang Wei-hua since we lived in Fusong, in the full knowledge that he was a rich man's son. As a child I had the conception that landlords were exploiters, but this was no hindrance to my relations with Zhang Wei-hua. I was on close terms with him, since he was honest, conscientious and had a strong anti-Japanese feeling. He had helped me at a critical moment, at which I was greatly moved. If, as I would normally have done, I had given him a wide berth on the plea that he was a landlord's son, he would not have protected me in the critical situation. Zhang Wei-hua, who could have lived in luxury all his life without taking part in the revolution or supporting it, helped me out of danger together with his father. He did so because he valued our friendship.

Ever since I attended primary school in Fusong, Zhang Wei-hua had been on close terms with me, ignoring the fact that he was rich and I poor and that he was Chinese and I Korean. He showed a deep understanding for the sorrow of our people who were deprived of their country, sympathized with us and wholeheartedly supported our determination to liberate our country. He did so because he was a patriot who ardently loved his country and his nation. He saw the misfortune of the Chinese people in the misfortune of the Korean people.

Though he was a rich man, Zhang Wei-hua's father was a firm patriot who advocated national sovereignty and driving out the foreign forces. His patriotic spirit is reflected in the names of his sons. When his eldest son was born, he named him Wei-zhong. The second character of his name was derived from the first character of "Zhong Hua Min Guo" (Republic of China). He named his second son Weihua, his third son Wei-min and would have named a fourth son Weiguo, if one had been born. If these characters were added together, they made up the name of the Republic of China.

Then Zhang Wei-hua asked, "In spring or autumn next year the Japanese are likely to invade. What are you going to do then?" "If the Japanese invade, I am going to fight to repulse them. My idea is to wage an armed struggle," I said. Zhang Wei-hua said that he, too, would fight, and wondered whether his parents would allow him to do so.

So I said, "What is a home without a country? If you want to fight against the old society, you should make a revolution. There is no other way. Otherwise, what is there to do except merely talk about communism as a public-spirited man and read books? There are the only two ways. So, you should carry out the revolution without asking your parents. This is the way to serve China and save the Chinese people. There is no other way for you. You should make the revolution with the Chinese people. If the Japanese invade, both the Chinese and the Korean people will rise in the struggle."

Thus I implanted the anti-Japanese idea in his mind while I stayed at the hotel for two or three days. Having heard my advice he said that he, too, would make the revolution after leaving school.

I said to him, "When I am in trouble, I might need your help again. Please give me your address in Shenyang." After he had given me his address I asked him whether he could help me to reach my destination safely.

He said he would do anything to help and protect me. With this he took me in his carriage to the house of a Chinese comrade on the border between Hailong County and Qingyuan County. The family of the man I called on was rich like Zhang Wei-hua's. Among the pioneers of the Chinese revolution there were many such people. That is why I always consider the Chinese revolution to be a special one.

Many intellectuals and rich people, together with the workers and peasants, took part in the revolutionary movement, the communist movement. When people from rich families discover contradictions that suppress a man's independence and check social development, they may be ready to take part in the revolutionary movement to do away with those contradictions. That is why fighters and pioneers defending the interests of the working people are also produced from the propertied classes, I think. What is important is not one's class origin but one's world outlook.

If a man regards life as enjoyment he cannot make the revolution and merely tries to live in clover. If a man prefers a life worthy of a man, he, even if he is rich, takes part in the revolution. If such far-sighted people are given a wide berth in the class revolution, the revolution suffers a great loss.

I stayed at the house of the Chinese comrade for several days. He treated me well as Zhang Wei-hua had done. I am not sure now whether his surname was Wang or Wei. I had him search for Choe Chang Gol for a few days, but of no avail. Choe Chang Gol was said to have gone deep underground after the August 1 Uprising.

I met a member of the Young Communist League in the neighborhood of Caoshi and requested him to convey to Choe Chang Gol a letter asking him to restore the ruined organizations in the Hailong and Qingyuan areas as soon as possible and to push ahead with the preparations for an armed struggle.

The few days I stayed at the house of the Chinese comrade, though I was treated as guest, were boring and painful for me. I was eager to throw myself into free and brisk activities, treading the earth as I liked even if my life was endangered. I had to disguise myself and start my political activities, but rash action was likely to bring trouble. It was difficult for me to return to Jirin again and it was not easy to take a train because the south Manchurian railways were managed by the Japanese. I wanted to go to Jiandao but I did not think that I would survive the wave of arrests of communists there. Nevertheless I thought I should go. I decided to go to east Manchuria by all means and there to prepare for the armed struggle.

At Hailong I, together with a Chinese comrade, boarded a train bound for Jirin where I changed trains and headed for Jiaohe. In Jiaohe there were many organizations under our influence. Han Yong Ae, who had been on close terms with me since our Jirin days, and her uncle Han Gwang lived there.

I intended to prepare a hiding place with their help to avoid the pursuit of the warlords and restore the organizations. I had decided to establish contact with Harbin's upper organizations under the International Young Communist League, if I meet Han Yong Ae. Han Yong Ae had returned to Jiaohe after leaving school in Jirin early owing to the family's circumstances towards the beginning of 1929, but continued to maintain contact with us. After thinking over whom I should visit, I called first on Chang Chol Ho who had been a company commander in the Independence Army.

Having broken a way from the upper echelons of the Independence Army after the formation of Kukmin-bu and left the service, he came to Jiaohe and became engrossed in running a rice mill. I called on him because he loved me dearly as my father's friend and was a reliable patriot. I needed a temporary hiding place until I could meet the organization members. He was delighted to see me but did not invite me to hide at his home. As he seemed to be overcome with fear, I did not tell him why I had called on him. I headed towards the house of Li Jae Sun. When my father was alive, he had aided the independence champions well, while running an inn. He, too, welcomed me, but suggested that we part after treating me to a Chinese meal at a Chinese restaurant.

I needed a hiding place more than a meal or two. He must have known why I had visited him but simply bade me goodbye without even inviting me to stay overnight at his home. He seemed to have considered the trouble that might befall him and abandoned his sense of duty and friendship as an old acquaintance.

From this I learned a serious lesson. Father's friends, too, counted for nothing without ideological cohesion. I drew the bitter lesson that the revolutionary struggle cannot be shared only by relying on friendship or sympathy.

If an ideological mood and faith change, the sense of friendship and of humanity changes. If one of two people who had been on intimate terms with each other in the past, sharing joy and hardship, changes his mind, their friendship is impaired and they part. Friendship which was supposed to be invariable and eternal is impaired if one side degenerates ideologically. Later in the course of the protracted revolutionary struggle I learned the lesson that without holding fast to an idea it is impossible to maintain a sense of duty as a friend and friendly relations.

After parting from Li Jae Sun, I headed for Han Gwang's house. I thought that Han Gwang might have hidden himself somewhere but that Han Yong Ae might be at home, being a woman, and I entertained the hope that if she understood my situation she would help me, even at the risk of her life.

But neither Han Gwang nor Han Yong Ae was at home. When I asked their next-door neighbor where they were, she told me that she did not know. As all the young Koreans who were supposed to be engaged in the movement had hidden, I had no one to call on.

In the meantime someone must have informed on me to the police. There were policemen on my heels. I thought I was caught and despaired of my situation, but the woman living next door to Han Gwang saved me from the danger. She said to me, "You seem to be in danger, though I don't know who you are. Be quick and go into the kitchen."

Quickly she put on my back the baby she was carrying on hers. She said, "I will answer the door. Sit quietly and tend the fire." It seemed that I looked old enough to be disguised as the baby's father. With the baby on my back, I tended the kitchen fire with a poker as she had told me to. While engaged in the revolution, I faced critical moments and danger many times, but I had never been in such a situation before.

The police opened the kitchen door and asked her, "A young man just came this way. Where has he gone?"

The woman replied with composure, "What kind of young man? No one has come to my house." Then she said in Chinese in a casual manner, "There is no one inside. Please come in and have a meal if you like." The baby on my back cried incessantly, as it was shy of me. I wanted to soothe the baby but could do nothing, fearing that an awkward act on my part might reveal my identity, so I merely stocked the fire with the poker. The police talked among themselves, wondering where I had gone and whether they had missed me, before heading for another house.

After they had gone the woman said with a smile, "Please act as if you are my husband until the police leave the village. My husband is out in the field. I will call him home. Stay here and don't worry. When he comes back, let's discuss what we should do." After inviting me to a meal, she went to the field and later returned.

After a while the police came back and shouted at me to come out as they wanted to send me on an errand. She said calmly, "How can this sick man run an errand? If you have some urgent errand, I will do it in his place." Then she went on the errand in my place. Thus, with her help I escaped from the critical situation. Though she was a simple country woman, she was possessed of both wit and wisdom. She also had a fairly high degree of revolutionary awareness.

I received an unforgettable impression from this woman whom I did not know. Instead of my father's friends whom I had visited, counting on our friendly relations of the past, it was this strange woman who had helped me at the risk of her life. Out of a pure desire to aid a revolutionary she had helped me out of danger with a self-sacrificing spirit. A person reveals his true worth in adversity.

An unstained and sound sense of duty as a comrade to which revolutionaries could entrust their lives without hesitation was found among the working people. So, I always told my comrades-in-arms to go to the people when difficulties arose while making the revolution. I told them to call on the people when they were hungry or thirsty and when misfortune befell them.

She was a good woman. If she is alive, even now I would like to bow before her. That winter in Wujiazi the commanding officers of the Korean Revolutionary Army and the leaders of underground organizations active in Manchuria held a meeting at which I spoke about the woman.

Having heard my story, the comrades there said, "Comrade Sung Ju, you're lucky. You were born under a lucky star, so heaven helped you."

It was not because I had good luck that the warlords failed to catch me but because the people were good. I think that the people are precisely Heaven and the people's will is Heaven's will, I said. From then on the words "Madam Jiaohe" were used as words symbolizing our resourceful, self-sacrificing people, words symbolizing the women who make it a rule to help revolutionaries out of their difficulties, even at the risk of their lives. Even now when I recall the bloody summer of 1930 under the scorching sun, I think of Jiaohe and picture "Madam Jiaohe." When I recall the woman whose whereabouts I failed to discover although I inquired after her for decades, I am seized with remorse for having left Jiaohe 60 years ago without asking her name.

If I had learnt her name I could have placed an advertisement in the newspapers. Since liberation many of my benefactors have called on me. Some of them appeared before me as grey-haired men and women half a century after parting from me in a foreign country. Many of my benefactors who helped me in adversity met me and returned to the liberated homeland where they received words of gratitude from me.

But "Madam Jiaohe" did not appear. She might have forgotten the dramatic event in the summer of 1930, regarding it as an ordinary matter. My benefactor of 60 years ago still remains unknown, leaving no news or trace. The better the jade, the deeper it lies underground. Only when her husband returned from the field, did she take her baby from me. What happened that day is like a detective story.

I could not give them my real name, so I gave her a pseudonym. Introducing myself as a revolutionary, I exchanged greetings with the husband. He had been engaged in the revolution but was unsure what to do, having lost contact with the organization, he said. He warned me against the secret agent living in the house opposite his. According to him, Han Gwang had fled to north Manchuria and Han Yong Ae always concealed her identity because of the harsh suppression, and it would be difficult for me to meet her.

When I heard his story, gloomy thoughts came to my mind. With a secret agent living opposite, I could not stay at his house. It would have been better for me to observe the situation, while hiding in his house, and then go to Dunhua again, but Dunhua was searched closely because it served as a base for the Japanese, and the headquarters of the Tuesday group of the communist party was situated there. Most of the Koreans there, except the women, had been arrested immediately after the May 30 Uprising. The question was whether it was possible to gain a foothold in that place.

After it grew dark the husband conducted me to a secluded straw-thatched cottage some six kilometers from Jiaohe. The elderly master and mistress of the house were very kind to me. That night I was once again clearly aware that we revolutionaries always could believe in and depend on the people alone. I lay down but could not sleep; various thoughts came to my mind. I had met none of those I wanted to meet and wasted several days; what a shame! At such a time one should not be on the defensive but brave adversity: If we remain on the defensive, we shall be finished: We must act: It will not do to go about by stealth. I decided that I should escape the critical situation and go to east Manchuria to activate the revolution.

At early dawn Han Yong Ae unexpectedly came to the cottage. On hearing that I was coming to east Manchuria, Han Yong Ae had asked her mother, when she was leaving home to go into hiding, to send word to her if a man with a dimple on his right cheek should come. We were meeting after a year's separation. We were so glad to see each other after all our difficulties that we gazed at each other without a word for a while. Her face had become terribly thin beyond recognition in only a year, and she was not so cheerful; previously once she burst out laughing she split her sides.

According to her, the atmosphere in Jiandao, too, was terrible. I said to her, "It will not do to remain in hiding like this. We should by all means conduct the movement. The Japanese will soon invade. We should not stand by with folded arms but rise and prepare to fight them, shouldn't we? We should restore the organizations as soon as possible and awaken the people ideologically. We should not remain in hiding out of fear, should we?"

She was of the same opinion and, on hearing what I said, was encouraged. I said, "We can do nothing by sitting here where there is no one. Let's go to Harbin. I will contact the organization for you." Han Yong Ae was delighted at this, for she had been unsure what to do, having lost contact with the organization.

I had sent Kim Hyok to Harbin to establish contact with the Comintern, but I decided that I should go there immediately and meet the people from the Comintern before he returned to report to me the results of his work. The utter wreckage of the organizations because of the revolt and the cities and rural communities where there was a terrible atmosphere, as if they were under martial law, made me realize once again the great harm done by the Left adventurers to the revolution. I became clearly aware that, if the aftereffects were not removed, our revolution would inevitably suffer a great loss from the beginning of the 1930s.

A theoretical argument alone could not prevent the factionalists and flunkeys and the Left adventurers from acting rashly. They would not willingly accept our arguments which were reasonable and beneficial to the revolution. They did not want to understand our view. The outbreak of the August 1 Uprising which caused us a great deal of concern in the wake of the May 30 Uprising meant that they entirely ignored the view we offered at the meeting of party organizations in the area east of Jirin.

It was necessary to get help from the Comintern in order to check the Left adventurism which was being committed without restraint in Manchuria. I wanted to learn the Comintern's view on the revolt and confirm whether it had been launched on the orders of the Comintern or whether it was a rash act undertaken by some people arbitrarily. Even if the Comintern had given the orders, I wanted to prevent the spread of adventurism, although it would mean controversy.

We decided to go by train, but disguised as Chinese, for the enemy's control was strict. Han Yong Ae spent the whole day going about the Jiaohe area to get good clothes and shoes for us to wear, as well as our traveling expenses. We also put some cosmetics in the trunk to allay the suspicions of the army and police. With her help I got safely to Harbin. At the liaison office of the Comintern at the approach to Xiangfu Street near Harbin pier, I met a man and introduced Han Yong Ae to him. I informed him of the situation created by the May 30 Uprising and August 1 Uprising in Manchuria and of the Kalun Meeting.

The liaison office of the Comintern, too, called the two revolts adventurous. The man I met in the liaison office told me that in his view the resolutions we had adopted at the Kalun Meeting were appropriate for the situation in Korea and agreed with the principle of the revolution, saying that our creative attitude towards Marxism-Leninism was encouraging.

He went on to say that in putting forward the new policy of founding a party at the Kalun Meeting and forming the Society for Rallying Comrades, the parent body, as the basic party organization we had not been in conflict with the principle of one party in one country. Thus I received the Comintern's unreserved support for the principle of independence and the creative principle which were the lifeblood of our revolution, and for all the lines we had advanced. Then the people from the Comintern asked me whether I would like to study at its communist college in Moscow.

I knew about the college in Moscow and that our young people who aspired after communism studied there on the recommendation of the Communist Party of Korea. Cho Bong Am, Park Hon Yong, Kim Yong Bom and others were attending the college. In those days the young people of Manchuria had so strong a yearning to study in Moscow that they even sang the Song of Study in Moscow. I did not want to be alienated from revolutionary practice, so I replied, "I want to go and study, but at the moment I am in no position to do so." When I met the Rev. Moon Ik Hwan in 1989 and mentioned the story about Harbin, he said that around that time his father had been engaged in sending students selected by the Comintern to the Soviet Union.

The Comintern appointed me to the post of chief secretary of the Young Communist League in the eastern region of Jirin Province. Through the liaison office of the Comintern I learned that Kim Hyok had thrown himself from the third story of a house and had been taken to prison.

Han Yong Ae and I were gloomy during our stay in Harbin because of Kim Hyok's arrest. Pained by the shackling of Kim Hyok we once even went to stand in front of the house in Daoli from which he was said to have thrown himself. There was a lot of tasty food in the shops and restaurants in Daoli, but they were beyond our means.

The Comintern gave us 15 fen a day as expenses, but 15 fen was far from enough for living in Harbin. Revolutionaries could not stay at ordinary hotels because rigid control was enforced over lodgers. All the hotels were frequented by the police and requested identity papers from lodgers, except the hotel run by white Russians. This hotel's charges for board and lodging were very high. It was a luxury hotel which was accessible only to rich men and not to people like us. After careful consideration I decided to stay at the safe luxury hotel even if it meant eating only one meal a day. I persuaded Han Yong Ae to stay at an ordinary hotel where control over female guests was lax. I discovered the interior of the luxury hotel to be splendid. The hotel was furnished with a shop, a dining hall, an amusement hall, a dance hall and a cinema.

While I stayed at the luxury hotel I experienced many difficulties because I had no money. The first day I entered the hotel a Russian female attendant accompanied me to my room and offered to attend to my nails. I said I had already done it, for I had no money to pay her. Another attendant came in after her and asked what I wanted to order for my meal. I was obliged to say that I had already eaten at my friend's house. Although I was harassed every day like this, I only slept at the hotel without taking meals there, having no money. As for my meals, Han Yong Ae and I went out to the street after finishing our day's business and bought a cheap maize pancake or two.

I related this story to Liu Shao-qi when he visited our country. He said, "I, too, was in Harbin that year. Among the party members there was no Chinese, but there were several Korean communists." He asked whether I had contacted the Comintern at that time. In view of the dates, it seems that I went to Harbin and met the people of the Comintern immediately after he had left, having completed his activities there.

I gave Han Yong Ae the assignment of searching for the dispersed organization members. Han Yong Ae established contact with a certain Han who had served in a branch of the Young Communist League in Harbin and with whom she had been in contact since the Jirin days. Through him she discovered the organization members in hiding one by one and explained to them the line of the Kalun Meeting.

I went to the railways and harbor where Kim Hyok had been active and met the workers who were under the influence of the revolutionary organizations. Thus I restored the underground organizations in Harbin and established contact with some comrades before departing alone for Dunhua, leaving Han Yong Ae behind. I was very pressed for time and parted from her without expressing my gratitude properly.

When I left, Han Yong Ae asked me to take her with me. But as the comrades in Harbin had entreated me to leave her there, I could not agree to her request. After going to east Manchuria, the matter always weighed on my mind. Since the rules of underground activity did not allow correspondence we did not hear from each other. A long time later I learned what had happened to Han Yong Ae, from material gathered by people from the Party History Institute.

When I left for Dunhua, I left behind me a letter addressed to the revolutionary organizations in Harbin. Han Yong Ae was arrested by the police in the autumn of 1930, while carrying out the assignments I had given the comrades in Harbin in the letter. An ordinary woman would have returned to Jiaohe, simply because of homesickness, but she remained in Harbin and carried out the assignments I had given her, forgetting even to sleep. Though quiet and gentle, she acted tenaciously and boldly once she was engaged in revolutionary work.

Immediately after her arrest she was sent to Sinuiju prison where she served her term of imprisonment. At the time Li Jong Rak, Park Cha Sok and others involved in the DIU were also thrown into prison. She and Li Jong Rak were in the same prison. When Li Jong Rak met Han Yong Ae, he said to her, "I was on good terms with Kim Sung Ju and you were led by him. Why don't you join me in persuading him to return to an allegiance? If you want, you can join our 'submission work team'."

Han Yong Ae reproached him to his face. She said, "That will not do. How can we commit such a filthy betrayal, even though we cannot help Kim Sung Ju? If I am in no position to make the revolution after my release from prison, I may not take part in it. But I will not betray him." Li Jong Rak admitted this in the winter of 1938 when he appeared at the meeting we held in Nanpaizi, where he tried to persuade me to give my "submission."

That was how I learned about Han Yong Ae, from whom I had not heard, and how she had remained faithful to the revolutionary principle despite being put to harsh torture in prison. On being thrown into prison Li Jong Rak, Park Cha Sok and other men signed a written declaration of their conversion, but Han Yong Ae, a woman, endured the hardship bravely. After the "Hyesan incident", revolutionaries were arrested en masse everywhere and some of those who had taken the path of struggle became traitors, causing great damage to the revolution. So the news of her greatly moved and encouraged me.

Photo: Han Yong Ae. Kim Il Sung's close comrade, who survived WWII only to be killed in a US bomb raid in 1951 while waiting to be reunited with Kim Il Sung.

Han Yong Ae worked as a shoemaker at the rubber factory in Dandong, China. At the factory she disseminated among the Korean workers the revolutionary songs of the Jirin days and put forward different demands in defense of the workers' rights and interests. She worked energetically to rouse them to the struggle to implement them. Later she went to Seoul, where she passed several more years at the house of Mr. Hong Myong Hui's son.

She married belatedly, having tried to go to Manchuria again to seek an organization. She buried herself in her family life, but did not abandon her conscience and the principle she had adhered to in the years when she had worked to make the revolution with us. When we, arms in hand, beat the enemy in the Mt. Paekdu area she, hearing the news in Seoul, prayed inwardly for our victory, calling her comrades of the Jirin days by their name one by one, so I am told.

Her husband was engaged in underground work, being a member of the Workers' Party of South Korea after liberation, and was murdered by the enemy during the retreat in the Korean war. During the war Han Yong Ae was a great help at the front, taking charge of a women's organization in the Seoul area. After her husband's death she came to Pyongyang with her children to see me. But she could not meet me and, on the night of the 14th of August 1951, she and her two children were tragically killed in an enemy bombing raid.

Han Yong Ae led an honorable life to her dying day. She lived her whole life with the spirit of the Jirin days. When singing, she sang the songs of the Jirin days. Revolutionaries, even on a solitary island, should, like Han Yong Ae, not lose faith or abandon their conscience. Han Yong Ae, too, was a benefactor I have never forgotten. She was a kind woman who called on me in adversity and helped me, at great personal risk. I inquired after Han Yong Ae's whereabouts in the homeland after liberation, but she was not in the northern half of the country.

I had not met her again before liberation as I was engaged in the anti-Japanese war. But still vivid in my memory is the way she went about in the sweltering heat to obtain Chinese clothes for my disguise, the way she protected me, deftly overcoming crises when the police examined the passengers on the train, and the way she divided a piece of a pancake into two and quietly placed one half before me. All the services she did me were the result of a pure, unselfish comradeship transcending feelings of love. I deeply regret that she was killed in Pyongyang in the bombing without seeing me.

Fortunately a photograph of her in her younger days which survived miraculously came into my hands. When I think of my late benefactors, I admire her noble spirit which left a deep impression on me in my youth and express my heartfelt gratitude to her, as I gaze at her photograph.

4.8. Crossing the River Tuman

My father said on many occasions that the people of Jiandao had great fighting spirit. Having experienced the May 30 Uprising and then the August 1 Uprising, I realized that the Koreans in Jiandao had an extraordinary revolutionary spirit.

Jiandao and the northernmost areas of Korea had for a long time been the stage of the activities of the volunteers and the soldiers of the Independence Army. Under the influence of the October Socialist Revolution in Russia, Marxism-Leninism was disseminated in these areas before anywhere else. Although the communist movement in Jiandao was going through many twists and turns owing to the petty-bourgeois impetuosity that appeared among its leaders, the revolutionary advance of the popular masses was continuing. Therefore, as early as the time I was in prison I was resolved to make the northern border area of Korea with Mt. Paekdu as the center and Jiandao, an important strategic position once I started the armed struggle.

The Japanese imperialists had also been viewing this area for a long time. While we intended to make the northern border area of Korea with Mt. Paekdu as the center and Jiandao, an important strong point for the anti-Japanese armed struggle, they wanted to make the area a strategic point for invading Manchuria and Mongolia. It was with the aim of creating an occasion for realizing this ambition that the Japanese imperialists provoked various incidents in east Manchuria from the beginning of the 20th century.

Under the pretext of "protecting the Koreans" the Japanese imperialists sent their troops into Longjing, Yanji County, in August 1907, and there they set up the "police sub-station under the residency-general in Korea." In 1909 they induced the reactionary Chinese government to conclude the Jiandao Treaty and, further, they even obtained the concessions for the Jilinjn-Hoeryong railway project. Afterwards the "police sub-station under the residency-general in Korea" in Longjing was raised to the status of a Japanese consulate general. It was not with the aim of ensuring that the Koreans in Jiandao could live in luxury that the Japanese imperialists set up a consulate general in Longjing and five branch consulates under it.

In addition to these consular machines, they established police stations in various places and set up numerous organizations of their lackeys, such as the Association of Korean Residents and made them watch with sharp eyes every movement of the Koreans living in Jiandao. The branch office of the Oriental Development Company and the financial circles also exerted their influence on the area. East Manchuria was under the complete control of Japanese imperialism both politically and economically. Thus, east Manchuria was turning into a place of acute confrontation between revolution and counterrevolution.

Therefore, I never ceased to think that the thick forest areas of Mt. Paekdu and east Manchuria should be made the base of the armed struggle. After experiencing the August 1 Uprising I felt many omens of the imminent invasion of Manchuria by the Japanese imperialists. So I became more firmly resolved to unite the people in east Manchuria who had strong revolutionary spirit and launch an armed struggle as soon as possible. So, I went to east Manchuria.

When I told my comrades about my intention to go to east Manchuria they tried to dissuade me from doing so. They said that going to a place where the Japanese imperialists had established a strict repressive apparatus and intelligence network was like jumping from the frying pan into the fire. However, I left for east Manchuria without fear, fully determined to make the revolution among the workers and peasants there.

It can be said that until then I had worked mainly among young people and students in urban communities. If we were to take our struggle onto a new, higher stage to meet the demands of the revolutionary line adopted at the Kalun Meeting, it was essential for us to mix more closely with the masses from all social sections, such as the workers and peasants, and prepare them as soon as possible for the war of resistance against the Japanese imperialists. The Comintern supported my idea of going to east Manchuria.

First I headed for Dunhua. This was because this area had suffered most in the August 1 Uprising. Dunhua was the source of the uprising, and its central stage. Here were stationed the headquarters of a garrison of the Japanese army, a branch consulate under the Jirin consulate general and the headquarters of the 677th regiment of the former Northeast Army. That such a reckless revolt as the August 1 Uprising had broken out there where the enemy's forces of repression were so concentrated had something to do with the fact that many Left adventurers worked there. Along with Panshi, Dunhua was the base of the M-L group and also the center of the movement to rebuild the Korean Communist Party. Such prime movers of the August 1 Uprising as Park Yun Se and Ma Gon were also based there.

In Dunhua there were various revolutionary organizations, such as the party, the YCLK and the AIYL, which we had established, as well as such reliable comrades as Chen Han-zhang, Ko Jae Bong and Ko Il Bong. When I arrived in Dunhua I made my home at Chen Han-zhang's house. Wearing the Chinese clothes of Shandong Province, I worked to remove the evil consequences of the uprising. Chen Han-zhang, who had attended middle school when I was forming groups of the Young Communist League in Jirin, was also conducting organizational activity in Dunhua.

After the occupation of Manchuria by the Japanese imperialists he worked as chief secretary at the general headquarters of the unit under Wu Yi-cheng. In the Anti-Japanese Allied Army in Northeast China he worked as divisional chief of staff, division commander, commander of a route army, and secretary of the south Manchurian party committee. But at that time he was a simple and quiet YCLK member.

Chen Han-zhang was the son of a rich man, like Zhang Wei-hua. However, he led a perfectly sincere life in the YCLK organization, displaying extraordinary passion for the revolution. Being a very rich farmer, his father had hundreds of horses and many rifles. His house was surrounded by an earthen wall and looked awe-inspiring. He told me jokingly that his family was one which should have been overthrown and that they did not encroach on other people's land because all the land around his house belonged to them. Although I do not know exactly how much land his family owned, they were very rich.

Chen Han-zhang treated me hospitably, saying that it was I who had taught him communism. Because they were leading a comfortable life, his family did not grudge me taking my meals without paying for them.

I started to search for the dispersed organizations through Chen Han-zhang and Ko Jae Bong. In the daytime I dressed in Chinese clothes and spoke Chinese when calling on my comrades, and at night I restored the organizations clad in Korean dress and speaking Korean. After dealing with the evil consequences of the uprising like this, I formed in Dunhua the YCLK committee of the eastern region of Jirin Province as I had been authorized by the Comintern.

Afterwards Ko Jae Bong and some other YCLK members left for the areas along the River Tuman with the task, entrusted to them by me, of going to the towns and rural communities in the area, making the masses revolutionary and establishing party organizations there. After giving Chen Han-zhang the task of conducting YCLK activities at Dunhua Middle School, I also left Dunhua.

Helong was the first place I visited when I went to east Manchuria. In Helong there was a Chinese man named Gao Ya-fan who had worked in our YCLK organization when he was attending Jirin Normal School. There was also a Korean whose name was Chae Su Hang. I believed that, by relying on them, I would be able to deal with the aftermath of the uprising and also expand the organizations.

I went first to a place called Dalazi where I met Cao Ya-fan. Pointing out that the consequences of the August 1 Uprising were very serious, Cao Ya-fan told me that, after the uprising, Koreans were nowhere to be seen and that there was no knowing where they were hiding. He said that the people in prison were likely to be released soon and asked me to meet them.

Several days later Chae Su Hang came to see me after having been informed of my arrival. Formerly he had attended Tonghung Middle School in Longjing. When I was attending Yuwen Middle School he came to Jirin and enrolled at the normal school. At that time he started to work for the revolution under our influence. Chae Su Hang was a popular football player among the young people and students of Jirin. In those days many young people from Helong were studying in Jirin.

Kim Jun conducted propaganda about us in the areas of Longjing and Onsong, whereas Chae Su Hang gave publicity to our revolutionary idea going around Helong and Chongsong. Afterwards, together with Comrade Kim Il Hwan who, while working as secretary of a county party committee, was later killed on a false charge of being involved in the "Minsaengdan," he formed the Young Communist League and such revolutionary organizations as the Anti-Imperialist Youth League, the Peasants' Association and the Anti-Japanese Women's Association, rallying many people to them. Comrade Park Yong Sun who was famous as a master at making the Yanji bomb, was working as a member of the AIYL in the Badaogou Mine in Yanji County.

However, the organizations which had been built up with such trouble had been scattered in all directions because of the two uprisings. Many hardcore elements had either been arrested or gone into hiding, and the few remaining members of the organizations were at a loss what to do and trembling with apprehension, not being fully seasoned.

This made me think a great deal about the faith of a revolutionary. On my way to Helong via Jirin, Hailong, Qingyuan, Jiaohe, Harbin and Dunhua after leaving Kalun, I saw many people who were wavering either frightened by the counterrevolutionary attack or having lost conviction in the victory of the revolution. A firm belief in the victory of the revolution comes into being when one realizes in theory that one has a correct revolutionary line and strategy and tactics that are capable of winning the sympathy of all the people and rousing them, as well as one's own revolutionary force. This belief becomes firmer through the struggle.

However, those who had instigated the uprising failed to put forward any program or strategy and tactics which could serve as a banner for the masses. The revolutionary line we adopted in Kalun was not being propagated widely among the people. I held a conference with Chae Su Hang and some other cadres of the YCLK and AJYL and gave them a detailed explanation of the revolutionary line adopted at the Kalun Meeting.

Furthermore, I emphasized the need to build up leading hardcore elements with those who had been tested through the struggle and were popular with the masses, restore the destroyed mass organizations as soon as possible and build up their ranks. It was also at that time that I gave the task of forming a district revolutionary organization in each county along the River Tuman.

Although all the organizers of the uprising had fled, leaving the masses to the mercy of the bayonet and afraid of the prisons and gallows, we emphasized the need to contain the consequences of the uprising as soon as possible. Because I was wearing Shandong clothes, my comrades in Helong called me the "Shandong youth."

The second place I visited was Wangqing. I went there in order to meet Oh Jung Hwa. It was Kim Jun and Chae Su Hang who had told me about Oh Jung Hwa. Whenever they met me in those days on a visit to Jirin, they told me about many people. They told me that a certain man was in a certain place, that if I went to a certain place there was a certain man there who was doing a certain job, what a certain man was like and how clever a certain man was. Therefore, even when I was in Jirin I was comparatively well aware of the situation in Jiandao.

I listened to them attentively and bore in mind all those whom they regarded as clever. When he was told about a good man, my father covered any distance, however long, no matter where he might be, joined hands with him at any cost and won him over as a like-minded man. He taught me that talented people decided everything and that the victory of revolutionary work depended on how many genuine comrades were won over.

In those days I did not mind going hungry for three days, or even ten days, if only I could win over a like-minded man. It was with this feeling that I went to Wangqing. Chae Su Hang accompanied me from Helong to Shixian in Wangqing.

In Shixian I met Oh Jung Hwa, Oh Jung Hup and also old man O Tae Hui. Old man O Tae Hui's family was a very large one. The four brothers of the old man had lived in Kojak village, Onsong County, North Hamgyong Province before moving to Wangqing around 1914. They had dozens of children and grandchildren. They were conducting revolutionary work in wide areas of Wangqing and Onsong with the River Tuman separating them.

In those days Oh Jung Hwa was working as the party secretary of the fifth Wangqing district and Oh Jung Hup was doing YCLK work in Wenjiadian in chunhuaxiang, Wangqing County. Oh Jung Song, Oh Jung Hwa's younger brother, had conducted YCLK activities in Shixian, Wangqing County, before moving to Pungri-dong, Onsong County, at the beginning of 1929 and was now conducting revolutionary activities while working as a teacher at Pomun School.

After leaving secondary school Oh Jung Hwa taught at the private Whasung School in Helong. When I met him in Shixian I told Oh Jung Hwa repeatedly that, in order to make the masses revolutionary, he must first become a revolutionary, then make his family revolutionary and then the villagers.

Later Oh Jung Hwa made his family revolutionary. More than ten of his brothers and near relatives were killed while working as faithful revolutionaries. It was not by chance that such fine communists as Oh Jung Hwa, Oh Jung Song and Oh Jung Hup were produced from among them. When I finished my work in Shixian I made up my mind to cross to the Onsong area at once. Having been born in a western province and lived in a foreign land at a young age, I had no good understanding of the six towns<sup>14</sup> south of the River Tuman.

The area covering the six towns was where, during the Li dynasty, noblemen who had been dismissed from their official posts were exiled. In this area there was a shortage of grain and the climate was harsh. Moreover, because of the unbearable maltreatment and cruelty of their leaders, those soldiers who had been mobilized to defend the frontier here used to flee very quickly. Even those who were in government service regarded it as terrible to be appointed as a public official in this area. Even after receiving notice of their appointment, they idled away their time in the streets of Seoul under various pretexts because they were reluctant to go there. It is said that the feudal rulers worried about this for 500 years.

Whenever Kim Jun told me about the six towns I said to him, "Although our ancestors did not take good care of this land, regarding it as barren, let us turn this area into a revolutionary fortress by making strenuous efforts." According to this far-reaching plan I started dispatching people there.

Onsong was a place where such people as Kim Jun, Chae Su Hang and Oh Jung Song began to work on a wide scale under our influence from the end of the 1920s. We had already grasped the importance of the area of Mt. Paekdu and that of the six towns along the River Tuman, including Onsong, in the development of the Korean revolution and intended to make this area a strategic base for the anti-Japanese revolutionary war. We also planned to open the way for a fresh upsurge in the revolution in the homeland there. In those days some 100 to 150 young people from Onsong were studying in Longjing.

When they came back home during their holidays they exerted the influence coming from Jirin in this area under the guidance of such far-sighted people as Kim Jun and Oh Jung Song who were in close contact with us. Branches of the Young Communist League of Korea and the Anti-Imperialist Youth League were formed in Onsong. It was a promising foothold for us to extend our influence into the homeland. Thanks to this foothold our idea spread to the area of Onsong.

I went to the area of Onsong with the aim of expanding and developing the Korean revolution as a whole by forming a party organization in the homeland and adopting the measures needed for implementing the policy set at the Kalun Meeting.

Oh Jung Hwa's cousin who had accompanied us from Shixian, crossed first to Pungri-dong where Oh Jung Song was in order to inform him that we were coming. At the approach to a valley of Huimudong, on the far bank from Namyang, Onsong County, we met Oh Jung Song and other members of the organizations who had come there on receiving the summons. That was my first meeting with Oh Jung Song. He was taller than his elder brother Oh Jung Hwa and had a magnanimous disposition. Oh Jung Hwa had said that his younger brother was a good dancer and singer as well as a fine poetry reader.

We quietly crossed the River Tuman by boat at night. Oh Jung Song rowed the boat quickly and well. As I looked at the fields and mountains veiled in darkness, I could not repress my beating heart at my deep emotions at returning to my homeland after five years. Having left the boat at Namyang Sangtan, I told Oh Jung Hwa how good it would be if we were crossing the river after winning the independence of the country.

In a positive response to what I had said, Oh Jung Hwa said that he felt the same each time he crossed the River Tuman.

Having passed Namyang Sangtan village we took the uphill path leading to Mt. Namyang. There we went into a straw-thatched cottage prepared by Oh Jung Song and examined the work of the revolutionary organizations in the Onsong area as well as the trend of the masses. The people of Onsong had achieved many successes in establishing mass organizations. I spent a week guiding the work of the underground revolutionary organizations at home. In the course of this I discovered that although the revolutionaries in the Onsong area had formed many organizations throughout the country, they were lapsing into extreme passivism in expanding and developing them.

In this area it was a universal practice to form an organization with a few reliable core elements and then shut the door and neglect the expansion of its ranks. For this reason the organizations had failed to take deep root among the broad sections of the masses. The Onsong Young Communist League which was formed in the spring of 1929 as an organization under the YCLK, also built a high fence around a few members and did not go among the masses.

In those days various organizations and factions such as the Local Association, the Promotion Association, the Singan Association and the Group for Rebuilding the Party were competing to win young people over to their side. Under these circumstances the mass organizations were merely maintaining the status quo while trembling with fear, in an effort to prevent the slightest bad influence from being exerted on them.

official said that he had no idea of how to deal with those young people who were associated with the youth league or the Singan Association. Chon Jang Won, who was working as the head of the peasants' association in Pungin-dong, would not speak his mind even to those of his close relations who were working in the enemy's government organs. This was because he was nervous, fearing that the enemy's tentacles might extend to the revolutionary ranks through the many of his relatives who were working as village heads, sub-county heads and policemen.

All this was an expression of distrust in the masses. Without putting an end to these wrong practices it would be impossible to develop the revolution in the Onsong area in depth to meet the requirements of the new situation. The life of a revolutionary can be said to begin with his going among the masses and the failure of the revolution with a failure to believe in the strength of the popular masses and a neglect of mixing with them. I said earnestly to Oh Jung Song:

"It is impossible to make the revolution with only a few people from a good class origin. You should boldly believe in the masses and keep the door to the organization wide open for them. Now that youth organizations with every kind of name are each trying to win the young people over, the organization of the YCLK should not become passive but win over many young people through a positive campaign. You must politically awaken and lead the young people who were once involved in the organizations of the youth league or the Singan Association, as well as those who are either following people from the Group for Rebuilding the Party or are being unconsciously used by them, so as to win them over to our side."

I also told Chon Jang Won about the tactics that must be employed in the work with those who were serving in the enemy's establishments. I said:

"A man who is making the revolution must not be frightened or discredit himself because his family contains a village head, sub-county head or policeman. On the contrary, you must resolve to paralyze the lowest government machinery of the Japanese by going into the enemy establishments, taking advantage of family relations and working on a big scale. If you are to make the area of the six towns a strategic base for the armed struggle, you must be bold and win over those who are serving within the enemy's government organs at the same time as making the masses revolutionary. Try it and acquire experience in this work."

The most unforgettable event from my stay in Onsong was howl, together with Kim Jun, Oh Jung Hwa and Oh Jung Song, met men working on the railway project in Wolpa-dong, Mipo sub-county. From the beginning of 1929 the Japanese imperialists had been pressing ahead with the project to lay a railway along the River Tuman. Over 1,000 labourers from all parts of the country, including the three southern provinces, as well as from Jiandao gathered there and formed in the Wolpa village a congested residential district called Kaepung Street. Those laborers who had been working on the Jirin Hoeryong railway project also crowded into this street where they had a hard time of it making a living.

On hearing of this when I was in Jirin I met Kim Jun and told him to go among the workers and try to form an organization when the railway project got under way in Wolpa-dong. Kim Jun could not conceal his eagerness, saying that it was something worth trying. He went to Onsong as he had promised and formed in Wolpa-dong a working youth association and an Anti-Imperialist Youth League organization.

When I expressed my intention to visit the railway project my comrades in Onsong asked me to abandon the idea because the enemy was keeping a strict watch. In those days they went to extremes to protect me, telling their comrades, "A representative of the Comintern has come." They organized a guard for me, even giving me the official title of "representative of the Comintern" because, in the homeland, the Japanese police maintained close surveillance against revolutionaries.

Needless to say, I also knew that, if I went to Korea, I must be careful in everything I did and sharpen my vigilance. However, I felt an urge to grasp the hands of the workers and tell them something that might be of some help to them, although I might not achieve much among them immediately. All the work I had conducted with the young people and students until then was aimed at building a bridge for going among the working class. Our ultimate goal was to carve out and complete the Korean revolution by giving prominence to the working class. How ardently had we been yearning for the working class of Korea from the day when we set out its liberation as our program and pledged to devote even our lives to this end!

I joined the workers at the construction site unloading gravel, carrying sand and taking the meals they offered me at their quarters for a day and a half. Kim Jun introduced me as a man who had been studying in Yanji and had come there to earn money to pay his school fees.

Even now I think that it was very good for me to go among the workers at that time. At their quarters and at the construction site I witnessed not only the sad plight of the workers who were toiling with might and main for a few pennies, but also workers who were eager for a struggle, workers who were seeking the correct way for them to shape their future.

This had a strong impact on me. My heart was burning with an eager desire to devote my whole life for the happiness of the working class. At the railway project I got acquainted for the first time with Choe Chun Guk and Choe Bong Song, anti-Japanese fighters from Onsong.

While guiding me to his quarters, Choe Chun Guk told me that he had secretly stored up some powder while he had been working as a dynamiter and that he intended to blow up a tunnel with it when the project was completed.

I told him that under the prevailing circumstances building up the organization and politically awakening and organizing the workers was more urgent than running such a risk as blowing up a tunnel and advised him to keep the powder and use it when it would be needed during our future armed struggle.

At that time I talked a great deal with the workers. I told them about the matters of launching an armed struggle, founding a party and forming an anti-Japanese national united front. It would be a great gain if we could clearly implant at least the spirit of the Kalun Meeting in the minds of the workers in the homeland. Then, if we told something to one man it would be conveyed immediately to ten people, and would reach the ears of 10,000 people through the mouths of 100 and 1,000 people. Our idea would ultimately be the faith and banner of the people at home. All this was certain.

When the workers at the railway project learned about our line, they expressed full support for it. If they gained confidence from our line, I gained confidence from their looks full of delight at being told of the line. The greatest success achieved in Onsong was the formation of a party organization on Turu Hill on October 1, 1930.

In the course of visiting the revolutionary organization in Onsong I realized that the fighting will and preparedness of the revolutionaries in this area were far stronger than I had expected, although they committed some mistakes in their understanding of the strategic problem and were timid in their work with the masses. I also reached the conclusion that the foundation existed for establishing a party organization in this area.

All those revolutionaries of the Onsong area who were to take part in the meeting gathered on Turu Hill dressed like firewood gatherers. Chon Jang Won had asked the man in charge of the organization in Wolpa-dong to bring an ox-pulled sleigh up to the meeting place. We held the meeting to set up a homeland party organization on a quiet, vacant spot on the top of Turu Hill with the River Wolpa flowing nearby.

Firstly I told those attending the meeting about the line adopted at Kalun and made clear that the primary task for implementing that line was to build a revolutionary party. Then I explained the aim of forming a new type of party organization in the Onsong area. I also set the task for the party organization in the Onsong area of continually increasing and strengthening the party ranks with fine progressive elements who had been tested through an organizational life and practical struggle, and of organizing and mobilizing the masses for the anti-Japanese struggle.

On my recommendation Oh Jung Song, Chon Jang Won, Chon Chang Ryong, Choe Chun Guk, Choe Bong Song and Choe Gun Ju were admitted to the Onsong party organization. Oh Jung Song was elected to head the party organization. Those who had the honor of being party members stood up in succession to relate their past life and briefly state their determination.

I have forgotten the determination of all the others, but that made by Chon Jang Won is still fresh in my memory. Chon Jang Won said that he would never forget the fact that we had admitted to the party even such a man as he who had a problematic family background, and pledged to saw off his bones, slice away his flesh and even offer his life if it was needed for the revolution. He said that if he was ever so silly as to break his pledge, he would not mind even if his body was cut to pieces and thrown into a river. Although his words were violent and plain, they expressed his feelings frankly.

Afterwards Chon Jang Won, true to his resolve, performed great exploits in making Onsong a semi-guerrilla zone and aiding the Korean People's Revolutionary Army. In order to keep it secret, there was no record of what was discussed at the meeting. The meeting adopted no inaugural declaration or manifesto. Those attending the meeting said to the following effect:

"We feel something is lacking because this meeting, a historic meeting held to establish a party organization, is so simple and informal. Even such an organization of the lowest class as the equity society makes public a manifesto and circulates it to the world, so we feel our meeting will fall flat if it is concluded merely by a brief pledge." I encouraged them as follows:

"The pledge you have just made is far more substantial than a statement or a manifesto amounting to hundreds of pages. What is the use of continually drawing up documents? You must not think of a party organization as something which only makes a fuss and wins a name for itself. Party members do a lot of work without making a fuss. Therefore, display your party spirit and patriotism through a practical struggle."

The formation of a party organization in the Onsong area was the start of the laying of the foundation for party building in the homeland and an important turning point in promoting the anti-Japanese struggle of the people there. Thanks to the activities of the party organization in the Onsong area, the process of the political awakening and organization of the masses was stepped up rapidly and the anti-Japanese struggle gained momentum in the area of the six towns.

As the masses started to follow us and the revolution gained momentum, Choe Chang Ik, who was hanging about in this area, his native place, in order to expand the influence of his own faction, fled to Seoul. After liberation he told us frankly what had happened at the time. He said: "I thought the M-L group had gone to Onsong because that is my native place. However, when I reached there, our force was not to be seen and instead the influence of Jirin had reached there. That influence was so powerful that everywhere I could see only your people, Comrade Kim Il Sung. I thought you must be quite old. However, people told me that it was not true and that you were a youth in your twenties and very strong. So I resolved to visit you, but gave up the idea."

The reason that Choe Chang Ik left Onsong for Seoul was that he knew that we disliked factions and did not compromise with factionalists like him. Following the formation of the party organization, I guided the meeting of the political workers and those in charge of the underground revolutionary organizations from various areas including the six towns before starting on my way back. We crossed the river by ferry from the Ojong ferry. My heart was much lighter than on my way to the homeland. I felt like soaring high up into the sky now that everything had turned out as I had wished. My visit to the homeland at the risk of my life was something worthwhile.

The week we spent in the homeland was an important period which proved that the revolutionary line we had put forward in Kalun was a correct one acceptable to all. It was as if we had had our line judged by the people at home. From that time the people of Onsong remained always faithful to us.

Having crossed the River Tuman in safety I, guided by Oh Jung Hwa, reached Chaoyangcun, Yanji County, going via Liangshuiquanzi and Changgou. Together with Longjing, Chaoyangcun was a place where we were exerting the greatest influence in the Yanji area. Ma Duk Han and Ra Il, members of the secretariat of the party and YCLK in the Jiandao area, were working in Chaoyangcun. Lim Chun Chu, who later worked as a member of the party committee of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, also conducted revolutionary work here as "Lim Chun Bong, Physician of the Pongchun Dispensary." Before coming to Yanji, he had been arrested for being involved in a student incident and was sent to prison. Working as a doctor of traditional Korean medicine, he carried out the duty of liaising between the party and YCLK secretariat in the Jiandao area and various counties.

At that time I met Lim Chun Chu for the first time, in Chaoyangcun. He, who had managed to acquire skill in traditional Korean medicine at a young age, quite impressed me. Thanks to his skill in traditional Korean medicine, our guerrillas got a lot of help throughout the anti-Japanese armed struggle.

The May 30 Uprising and the August 1 Uprising had caused a big loss to the revolutionary organizations in Yanji. Here the enemy's terror had been more overpowering than in Dunhua. Many who had been making the revolution lost heart and hesitated, and those people who were not sufficiently awakened, clamored that they were being brought to ruin because of the communist party.

I met leading cadres of the party and YCLK such as Ma Duk Han, Ra Il and Lim Chun Chu and discussed the problem of eliminating the consequence of the Left adventurist machinations as soon as possible and further expanding and strengthening the revolutionary struggle. After leaving Onsong I did not go straight to Wujiazi but went as far as Chaoyangcun via Liangshuiquanzi. This was because I foresaw that this area would be the field of our future armed struggle. I had done some preparatory work for laying the mass foundation in Onsong, Wangqing and Yanji of an armed struggle in the future.

Afterwards this area became the most reliable base of the anti-Japanese war, as we had foreseen.

4.9. An "Ideal Village" into a Revolutionary Village

---

At one time the independence fighters in our country conceived a plan to build "ideal villages," and they tried in every way possible to implement it. When one hears the word "ideal village," one visualizes a village in which everyone is free from any exploitation, oppression and inequality and leads an equally free and happy life. From time immemorial our people have dreamt of such a Utopian world.

The nationalists' endeavor to build "ideal villages" might be considered a reflection of our ancestors' aspiration to a rich, harmonious, peaceful and comfortable life for everyone. Ahn Chang Ho was a proponent and champion of the "ideal village" scheme. Immediately after the proclamation of the "annexation of Korea by Japan" Ahn Chang Ho, Li Dong Hui, Sin Chae Ho and Ryu Dong Yol held talks in Qingdao, China, where Ahn Chang Ho put forward a proposal to build "ideal villages." After serious consideration the leaders of the independence movement decided to buy the land of the Taedong Business Company (in Mishan County, China) which had been managed by Americans, bring it under cultivation and train Independence Army soldiers by establishing a military academy there. They intended to build such "ideal villages" in order to raise funds and educate cadres, and thus lay the material, personnel and financial foundations for the independence movement.

Even after this plan had failed, Ahn Chang Ho made painstaking efforts for many years to procure funds and obtain suitable sites for such villages, because he felt the necessity for an independence movement base which could render material support to his "theory of the cultivation of strength." The attempt to build such villages was a trend in the independence movement at that time. Many nationalists tried to realize their unsophisticated dream of cultivating strength by reclaiming uncultivated land and making it suitable for farming and establishing military academies.

The rural community on the Liaohe was born of this trend. This community was developed by the nationalists who had been active in south Manchuria. Some of the nationalists in south Manchuria, particularly Song Sok Dam, Pyon Dae U (alias Pyon Chang Gun), Kim Hae San, Kwak Sang Ha and Mun Sang Mok drifted west before settling on the Liaohe. Saying that they were building an ideal Korean village, they created a community of 300 Korean families there and began to develop it according to their own principles by cutting it off from the surrounding world. This community was named Wujiazi (a village of five families) after the five families that had settled there originally.

Some of my comrades attending Wenguang Middle School in my days in Jirin were from Guyushu and Wujiazi. They used to say that Wujiazi was a good village. So I became interested in Wujiazi and made up my mind to transform it into a revolutionary village. I went from east Manchuria to Wujiazi in October 1930. Originally I was planning to convene a large meeting in east Manchuria for the preparation of an armed struggle but, in view of the situation there at the time, I considered the place unsuitable for the meeting and changed the site to Wujiazi. I decided to stay there for some months while

I prepared for the meeting and make the village revolutionary. I found the people kind-hearted and their customs agreeable, as I had been told they were.

The people in this village, unable to roof their houses with tiles because of the strong wind, plastered clay on the roofs. The saline clay did not allow the rain in. They also built neat clay walls, walls of adobe which, they claimed, were even bullet-proof. The founders of the village never tolerated the infiltration of any heterogeneous ideological trends into the village. They, together with the peasants, had converted the marshy land into paddy fields and established a school in the village. They formed such mass organizations as the Association of Fellow Peasants, the Youth Association and the Association of Schoolchildren.

They also formed a village council, an autonomous organ. Every year on August 29, the day when Japan proclaimed the annexation of Korea by Japan, the village people gathered and sang the song National Humiliation Day. It is no wonder that the people of Wujiazi called their village a "heaven," it being out of the reach of the Japanese army and police and the reactionary Chinese warlords. The majority of the population of the village was from Pyongan and Kyongsang Provinces. Those from Kyongsang Province were under the influence of the M-L group in the General Federation of the Korean Youth in South Manchuria and those from Pyongan Province were mostly affiliated to Chongui-bu.

In view of the fact that I hailed from Pyongan Province I stayed in most cases at the houses of the people from Kyongsang Province, as I had done in Kalun before. If not, I might have upset them. When I was in Kalun, I had sent some members of the Korean Revolutionary Army to Wujiazi as political workers but they had proved ineffectual because they could not win over the leading figures of the village who were obstinate, yet well established.

I spent the winter there through the good offices of my comrades. I stayed in that one place for so long, more than just a week or two, because we attached such great importance to Wujiazi. We regarded this village as the last stronghold of the nationalist forces in central Manchuria. If successful here, we could turn Wujiazi into a model for making the rural areas revolutionary and, drawing on that experience, bring the rural villages in the whole of Manchuria and the northern border areas of our country under our influence. We recognized that the workers, peasants and working intellectuals were the main force of the revolution, and made particularly great efforts to transform the peasants into revolutionaries in view of the position they occupied in the class composition of our country. The peasantry accounted for more than 80 per cent of the population of our country.

The situation in Jiandao was the same. More than 80 per cent of the population of Jiandao were Koreans about 90 per cent of whom were peasants. Owing to the persecution by the warlords and the ruthless expropriation by the landlords and usurers, they were living in dire poverty, enjoying no rights, and were subjected to harsh exploitation through land rents and to such physical extortions as those imposed upon serfs and slaves. The case was similar with the peasants in the homeland. This showed that the peasantry, along with the industrial working class, was the class which had the keenest interest in the revolution and that the peasants, together with the workers, should become the main force of our revolution.

To make the rural areas revolutionary was the foremost task in laying the mass foundation for the anti-Japanese armed struggle. As the young people in Wujiazi grew more and more enthusiastic about our cause as a result of the activities of our political workers, the village elders shook their pipes and threatened that those who would introduce socialism onto the Liaohe plain would not be safe; they complained that the young people in those days were affected by an alien ideology. Some of them warned that, if the crazy communist ideology that had ruined Jiandao was tolerated in Wujiazi, the village would not be safe, either.

If we were careless and rash, we might fall before the pipes of the old people. Some of the young people wavered. They wanted to march to the communist tune, but they hesitated lest they should offend their elders. Only a few determined young men opposed the elders. On hearing a report from the political workers, I judged that the prerequisite for making Wujiazi revolutionary was to work well with the influential people. Unless we corrected their way of thinking we would be unable to awaken Wujiazi from its pipe dream of building an "ideal village" or execute our plan to transform the village on the Liaohe into a model village in central Manchuria.

Once the elders were reformed, the others would follow us. Our political workers, however, had not approached them for three months, and had only been feeling out their views. It was no simple job to deal with such people. No ordinary man dared argue with them, these learned people with theoretical views as well as records of conducting the independence movement. The group of elders had the village under its control.

One old man, Pyon Dae U, ran the village council behind the scenes and supervised all the affairs of the village. He was at the head of both the group of elders and the village itself. The villagers called him Pyon Trotsky because he frequently mentioned Trotsky. Pyon had traveled through the homeland and various parts of Manchuria in his early years in the interests of the independence movement. At first he had established schools in Hanchon (South Pyongan Province), his home town, and Chasong, and Daoqinggou (in Linjiang County, China), working as a teacher. He had been involved in armed activities from 1918, the year when he joined the Independence Army unit which had its headquarters at Maoershan, Linjiang County. In those days he had frequented our house to contact my father.

When he was unable to come, my uncle, Kang Jin Sok, would maintain contact between them. Having held the posts of propaganda chief of the Korean Independence Association, deputy-commander of the National Independence Army, chief of the military law section and commander of the 1st battalion of the Liberation Corps and then head of the business section of Tongui-bu, he had devoted himself to building up the movement of the Independence Army. He retired from his military posts in 1926, and applied himself to building an "ideal village." Once he had been to the far eastern region of the Soviet Union, allegedly to launch a communist movement. He had the blue-covered membership card of the Communist Party of Koryo.

It was impossible to reform the bigoted village elders and make the village revolutionary unless old man Pyon was won over. Learning that I had arrived in Wujiazi, the old man's son, Pyon Dal Hwan, came to see me. He was in charge of the Association of Fellow Peasants. He said that he had intended to transform the "ideal village" into a revolutionary village by prevailing on the nationalists, but had been unable to do anything because of his father and the other village elders. He suggested that, now that I was there, we should do away with those good-for-nothings.

Dumbfounded, I asked him, "Do away with them? What do you mean by that?" "I mean we must form our own organizations, ignoring what the old men say, and make Wujiazi a socialist village on our own," was his absurd answer. "No, we cannot do that. It will split the village into two. And it is not in accordance with our policy, either." "Then, what shall we do? We can't leave Wujiazi in the hands of these backward old men, can we?" "The point is that we should win their support. I am going to work with your father. What do you think of that?"

"It will be useless. Many people have been here from Kukmin-bu, from the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai and from the committee for rebuilding the communist party affiliated to the M-L group, to establish footholds in this village, but they have all been given the cold shoulder by my father. Ordinary people have not even been granted an interview with him, and even high-ranking nationalist leaders have been thrown out after being taught a good lesson."

"Your father and mine were on friendly terms and you and I are old friends. So I think I stand a better chance than a total stranger." Pyon Dal Hwan said with embarrassment that an old friendship would not influence his father. He had been to my house in Linjiang 10 years before with a letter from his father to mine.

I talked with Pyon Trotsky for days at his house, where the village elders used to gather. On the first day Pyon talked more than I did. He sat haughtily, his legs crossed, and as he spoke he now and then tapped his pipe on the floor. He said he was glad to see Mr. Kim's son but he treated me as just a boy. He merely gave me condescending advice, every time addressing me as "you youngster." He was a man with good features and a gallant spirit and he had a high theoretical level, so I found him awesome from the start.

When he asked me how old I was, I answered that I was 23, five years older than I actually was. If I had said I was 18, he would have treated me as a mere boy. I looked older than I was, so no one doubted me if I said I was 23 years old. In those days, I always claimed to be 23 or 24. That was favorable for me in my work with both the village elders and the young people.

I behaved politely, listening to old Pyon with patience, not retorting or interrupting him even though what he said did not stand to reason. He said that young people would find fault with him, labeling him as feudalistic and so on, while not understanding even one out of the ten words he said. He said it was interesting to talk to me. One day he invited me to dinner. He said that he had frequently been accorded warm hospitality by my father in Linjiang and that, therefore, he had prepared a dinner, though humble, for me.

After chatting with me for a while, he asked me suddenly: "Is it true that you youngsters have come here to do away with our 'ideal village'?" Pyon Dal Hwan had been right when he said that his father was guarding against the communists with the highest vigilance.

"Do away with your 'ideal village'? Why should we destroy the results of you old people's hard work, if we are unable to help you? We do not have the strength to destroy it." "Hm, is that so? But the youngsters in Wujiazi who follow my son Dal Hwan are always finding fault with the 'ideal village'; they think only of knocking down the old people and hoisting the red flag in this village. Rumor has it that you, Sung Ju, are manipulating the youngsters in Wujiazi. Do the young people from Jirin hate the 'ideal village'? Tell me frankly what you think."

"We don't think it bad. Why should we hate the 'ideal village'? You have built it to get the wandering Korean exiles in this foreign land to settle down in one place and live in comfort. It is marvelous that you have built a Korean settlement of this size on the swampy land on the Liaohe. You old people must have worked very hard to build it." Satisfied at my complimentary remarks, he stroked his moustache. He no longer called us "you youngster."

"Yes, that's it! As you will learn, there is neither a policeman nor a prison nor a government office here. All the village's affairs are dealt with in a democratic way by the Koreans themselves through an autonomous organ called the village council. Where else in the world is there such an ideal village?"

I thought that now was the time to state our opinion of the "ideal village" clearly. "Sir, I think it is patriotic of you to have built a village where the Koreans lead a fair life by democratic methods through an autonomous body. But do you think we can achieve the independence of the country by building villages like this?"

The old man who was speaking in a dignified manner with his legs crossed, waving his pipe, shut his mouth and raised his eyebrows. Then, he heaved a sigh. "No, we can't. You have touched me on the raw. We have built an 'ideal village,' but it is of no help to the independence movement. That is why I am in anguish. How good it would be if we could win the independence of the country by building 'ideal villages'!"

I did not lose the opportunity to prove the absurdity of the building of such villages. I said: "It is impossible for a ruined nation to build 'ideal villages' in a foreign land. It is true that Wujiazi, thanks to your efforts, has become a more comfortable village to live in than other Korean settlements, but we cannot say that the ideal of the Korean people has been realized. The ideal of the Korean nation is to live in their motherland which is independent of the Japanese and free from exploitation and oppression by landlords and capitalists. How can you say you are living an ideal life when you are in debt to landlords? When the Japanese invade Manchuria Wujiazi will not be safe. And sooner or later Japan will invade Manchuria. They do not want the Korean people to lead an ideal life." "Then, you mean we should give up the idea of building an ideal village?" he asked with irritation.

"We wish to transform this village into a revolutionary village that fights for the liberation of the country, rather than seeing it so quiet." "That means you are going to spread socialism in Wujiazi? No, you can't. I detest socialism. When your father said in Kuandian in 1919 that we should switch over to the communist movement we all supported him. But, while following the Koryo Communist Party, I discovered the communists all to be crazy. They were all involved in factional strife. Since then I've been disgusted by the mere mention of communism."

Then he showed me his membership card of the Koryo Communist Party. "However hard you may be working for the revolution, you don't have such a membership card, do you?" the old man said in a casual manner, looking at me craftily. I opened the card and examined it before putting it in my coat pocket. He found this so unexpected that he looked at me in blank dismay.

"Allow me to keep as a souvenir your membership card of the Koryo Communist Party that has gone bankrupt on account of factional strife." I thought he would want it back, but he didn't. He asked me if we had any special policy for making the village revolutionary. I spent a good while explaining to him how we had made such villages as Jiangdong, Xinantun, Naidaoshan, Kalun and Guyushu revolutionary. He listened to me attentively. Then he said, "What you say smacks of Stalinism, but I am not against you. Nevertheless, you should not pay tribute only to Stalin. There is some sense in what Trotsky said."

He then expounded Trotsky's theory. Yet he did not seem to be opposed to Marxism-Leninism. I learned that he had an extremely good impression of Trotsky. I had talked to many people who were known to be well-versed in communist theory, but none had spoken so highly of Trotsky as he did. Out of curiosity I asked, "Why do you worship Trotsky?"

"Frankly, I don't worship him. I just don't like the young people nowadays worshipping people from major powers indiscriminately. Trotsky is Trotsky and Stalin is Stalin. Young people nowadays are in the habit of quoting from them, but I don't see what is so great about their propositions. It is for the Russian people to consider their propositions. The Korean people should speak in the spirit of Korea in order to promote the revolution in their own country, don't you think?"

The old man was right in a sense. In the course of my conversations with him over several days I found him to be no ordinary man. At first I wondered if he was a Trotskyite, but I learned that, tired of factional strife, he was just warning us young people, warning us against the blind worship of everything, against talking only about other countries, about Russia and Stalin, and against copying everything from Russia. In short, he was telling us to live in the Korean spirit.

He continued: "I don't care what the young people do, nor do I interfere in my son's work. Whatever he does, it is up to him. But I will fight to the end against those who put on airs, chanting foreign propositions without having their own principles."

What he said convinced me that our consistent stand against factionalism, flunkeyism and dogmatism was correct and that our policy of carrying out the revolution through the efforts of our own people and by believing in our own strength was correct. The following day I talked a lot more than the old man. I explained to him in detail the line we had adopted at the Kalun Meeting. He seemed to be strongly impressed by my explanation that we should form a party and an army of a new type, organize an anti-Japanese national united front by enlisting all social strata irrespective of ideology, religious belief, status of property, age and sex and liberate the country through the resistance of our 20 million people. In particular, he hailed our intention to organize an anti-Japanese national united front.

Pyon Dae U was a widower and his son was a bachelor. The old man's daughter kept the house, but she could not sweep away the lonely, dull air prevailing in the family. After repeated discussions with Pyon Dal Hwan and other comrades about choosing a suitable match for him, I singled out a girl with the surname Sim who lived in a rural village near Wujiazi and got my comrades to prepare for a wedding ceremony for them. I felt it presumptuous and awkward for a bachelor to arrange the marriage of his elders, but after their wedding the villagers were happy, and gave me unstinted praise.

The event won us the trust of the village elders. One day Pyon Dal Hwan came to see me and inform me of his father's attitude. He quoted his father as saying to the village elders, "Some new masters who will take over the 'ideal village' from us have now appeared. They are Sung Ju and his friends. If socialism is what they adhere to, we can accept it without a worry. We must not take Sung Ju for a mere youngster. We are old and lagging behind the times, so let us hand over the whole of Wujiazi to Sung Ju and his friends, and help them in all sincerity." The other elders were said to have expressed their admiration for what we had said.

Hearing this, I went to old man Pyon. I said, "I have come to return you your membership card of the Koryo Communist Party." But he replied, without so much as glancing at it, that he did not need it. I was at a loss what to do with it. Later the card was passed around my comrades.

In 1946, the year following the liberation of the country, the old man came to Pyongyang to see me. When I reminded him of the happenings in Wujiazi, he looked back upon the old days with emotion and then grinned. He said that now that he had witnessed the northern half of the country having become a great and ideal land, a land of perfect happiness, he would not regret it even if he were to die there and then. He was 67 years old at that time. That year he passed away in Yitong County, Jirin Province, China, so I learned much later.

His son Pyon Dal Hwan worked in Wujiazi as the head of the Peasants Union organization. On the charge of having been involved in the anti-Japanese struggle under our guidance, the Japanese put him in Sinuiju prison in 1931, and there he served a term of several years. Thus the breakthrough in making Wujiazi revolutionary was achieved. After that, the village elders' attitude towards the political workers from the Korean Revolutionary Army changed. They vied with each other to invite them to dinner.

During the revolutionary transformation of Wujiazi I made great efforts to win over the Chinese people. Without winning over influential Chinese people, it would have been impossible for us to establish a foothold for conducting free activities in central Manchuria. Therefore, I did not hesitate to bring even landlords around to our side and make use of them, if it was possible.

At that time a landlord named Zhao Jia-feng was living near Wujiazi. Once he quarreled with another landlord in the neighboring village over some farm land and resolved to bring a law suit against him. But he did not know how to write the indictment. He had a son who had received secondary education in a nearby town, but the son did not know how to draft it, either. It seems he had idled away his time at school.

Zhao Jia-feng asked Kim Hae San, a doctor of Korean medicine in Wujiazi, to recommend someone capable of writing the indictment for him. Kim Hae San came to see me one day and asked me if I knew how to write it. When we were engaged in underground activity, books on the composition of letters, funeral orations and indictments had been available in China for students and the public in general to use as reference.

Kim Hae San and I were invited to a dinner at the landlord's house. The host explained at length that he was seeking judgment over a land dispute. I wrote an indictment in Chinese for him and went with him to the county town where I helped him behind the scenes to win the case. Had it not been for my assistance, he would have lost dozens of hectares of land. The landlord told me that I was a very good man, not a communist. Regarding me as his benefactor, he gave me unqualified support in everything I did. On holidays he never failed to invite me to dinner. There I met many influential people in China and gave them anti-imperialist education. Thus my revolutionary activities, including the work of the Korean school at Wujiazi, became legitimate, and the foothold for our revolutionary struggle began to be consolidated.

After winning over the village elders and other influential people, we set about reforming the mass organizations into revolutionary ones. First we restructured the Youth Association, making it the Anti-Imperialist Youth League. It had previously been under the nationalist influence. Thanks to the activities of the detachment of the Korean Revolutionary Army, the core members of the association had been educated. But the association itself was not yet completely free from the remnants of nationalism. First of all, its fighting objective and tasks were not clear.

In addition, its membership was small and it had no proper working method. It was an organization that existed in name only, doing almost nothing to rally the young people. The Wujiazi area consisted of hamlets sprawling over distances of 4, 8 and even 24 kilometers away from one another, but the association had no branches in those hamlets. This being the situation, the youth organization could neither strike root among the young people nor motivate them.

Some people insisted that we should reform the Youth Association into the AIYL right away. But it was premature to reform the existing organization into a new one without taking into account the political and ideological preparedness of the young people, they being still under nationalist influence and still believing in the association.

The men of the KRA visited the nearby hamlets with cadres from the association and conducted ideological work for forming the AIYL. In the course of this our revolutionary line was propagated among the young people. I also had conversations with them every day. After making such preparations we formed the Anti-Imperialist Youth League of Wujiazi in a classroom of Samsong School. The league established branches in the hamlets. Choe Il Chon was elected chairman of the league committee, and Mun Jo Yang chief of the organizational section.

Later the Association of Fellow Peasants was reformed into the Peasants Union, the Association of Schoolchildren into the Children's Expeditionary Corps and the Wujiazi branch of the Educational Federation of Korean Women in South Manchuria into the Women's Association, and thus a fresh upsurge was brought about in the activities of the mass organizations in Wujiazi. After their restructuring the organizations admitted many new members. Almost all the people living in Wujiazi became affiliated to an appropriate organization and led a political life.

We also restructured the village council, an autonomous administrative organ, into a self-governing committee, a revolutionary one. The pioneers of Wujiazi had formed the village council in the first half of the 1920s. The council paid primary attention to economic and educational affairs and improving the peasants' life by maintaining normal relations with the Chinese government authorities and operating a rice sales agency at Gongzhuling and similar agencies under it.

But the people of Wujiazi openly accused the councilors of having no popular spirit and of being dishonest. In the course of talking to the peasants I learned that the councilors were not distributing some foodstuffs and daily necessities that had been purchased by the sales agency at Gongzhuling to the peasants equitably and were disposing of them as they pleased out of their own selfish desires. I sent a man to Gongzhuling to ascertain whether this was true. On his return he told me that the village council was corrupt. He confirmed that the councilors were misappropriating money collected from the peasants and were feathering their own nests.

Because the village head was dealing with most of the affairs of the council by himself in a subjective and arbitrary manner, the opinions of the masses were ignored. As they had no right to participate in the work of the council, the masses did not know about the mistakes made by it. Since the people, their life and the way they worked were all in the process of being transformed, the village council could not work as the masses required with the existing organizational structure and conservative work method.

We called a consultative meeting attended by the cadres of the council, the chiefs of all the hamlets and the chairmen of the organizations of the Peasants Union, and reviewed the work of the village council. At the meeting we restructured the council to form a self-governing committee. The committee eradicated subjectivism and arbitrariness as we had intended and gave full play to democracy in its work.

We paid particular attention to the rice sales agency at Gongzhuling which was under the control of the self-governing committee. The peasants of Wujiazi had previously had to take their rice as far as Gongzhuling 25 miles away on oxcarts or horse carts to sell it. Normally it was good business to store it somewhere when the price of rice was low and sell it when the price had risen. But there was no one for them at Gongzhuling to entrust with their rice. This being the case, they had sold it to anybody without waiting for a better price. Then, in the autumn of 1927, in order to remedy the situation they installed a rice sales agency at Gongzhuling.

We appointed to the agency the most popular people from among the members of the mass organizations. We also sent Kye Yong Chun, Park Gun Won and Kim Won U, men of the KRA, to help the agency in its work. After we had taken over the agency it performed the secret mission of establishing contact with revolutionary organizations and providing the KRA with the information it needed in its activities while still fulfilling the function of a legal commercial organ serving the peasants.

Our restructuring of the village council to form a self-governing committee and our conversion of such a legal commercial organ as the rice sales agency at Gongzhuling into a servant of the revolution were a great experience in our revolutionary struggle in the early 1930s.

In Wujiazi we sent political workers to many parts of Manchuria to expand our organizations and widen the scope of our activities. In those days we also sent several political workers to the Kailu area. Park Gun Won, one of the first members of the DLU and a former pupil of Whasung Uisuk School worked for some time in that area.

Many Mongolian people lived in the Kailu area. Cut off from the civilized world, they did not know how to treat illnesses and, when they were sick, they only prayed to God. So our comrades took medicines with them whenever they visited that area and administered them to the sick, which were very effective. From that time the people of Kailu treated Korean visitors with hospitality.

In order to improve the political and professional qualifications of those in charge of organizations, we gave a short training course to the heads and core members of every organization. Cha Gwang Su, Kye Yong Chun and I gave lectures for two or three hours every night on the Juche line of revolution and the strategic and tactical policies adopted at the Kalun Meeting, as well as on how to conduct political work among the masses, how to expand organizations and consolidate them, and how to educate the organization members and guide their life in their organizations.

After the short course we took the people into the field and taught them working methods; how they should form organizations, train core elements, give assignments and review their fulfillment, conduct meetings, talk to individuals and so on. Then the leading personnel of Wujiazi went boldly among the masses. We put great efforts into enlightening and educating the people of Wujiazi.

We paid primary attention to education. We appointed men of the KRA and able young men from among the members of the underground organizations as teachers at Samsong School and ensured that they played the leading role in improving the education provided by the school in a revolutionary manner. It was after we began to run the school that the subjects which inculcated nationalist and feudal-Confucian ideas were discontinued and political subjects were included in the curriculum. And it was around this time that tuition fees were abolished at Samsong School. The upkeep of the school was financed by the self-governing committee. All the children of school age in Wujiazi were given free education from that winter.

We later included an article on free and compulsory education in the 10-point program of the Association for the Restoration of the Fatherland, but in fact the communists of Korea first tried and implemented free education in Guyushu, Kalun and Wujiazi. Samsong School in Wujiazi, along with Chinmyong School in Kalun and Samgwang School in Guyushu, was an important educational establishment, the first to introduce free education in our country. We also ran night schools for the education of the grown-ups, particularly housewives, who could not go to school. I saw to it that night schools were organized not only in the village but also in the surrounding hamlets, and that all these people were enrolled in them.

Drawing on the experience we had gained in launching Bolshevik in Kalun, we published a magazine Non g-u in Wujiazi. The magazine played the role of the organ of the Peasants Union. While Bolshevik was a little hard to understand, the articles in Non g-u were written in a concise and plain fashion so that the peasants could understand them. This magazine, along with Bolshevik, was circulated as far as Jiandao.

In those days we propagated many revolutionary songs to the villagers through the pupils. If the Red Flag and Revolutionary Song were taught at the school, they would spread throughout the village on the same day.

In Wujiazi we had formed an art troupe. This troupe was based at Samsong School and worked successfully under the guidance of Kye Yong Chun. I worked hard to complete the libretto of The Flower Girl which I had begun to write in my days in Jirin and then staged rehearsals for it. Once the libretto was finished, Kye started the production of the opera with the members of the drama group that had been formed at the school. We staged this opera in the hall of the Samsong School on the 13th anniversary of the October Revolution. This opera was not seen on stage for many years after liberation, and then was improved and adapted for the screen, re-written as a novel by our writers and artistes under the guidance of Organizing Secretary Kim Jong Il and presented to the public in the early 1970s. At that time the Organizing Secretary did a lot of work.

With the strong support of the people of Wujiazi, we transformed the village on the Liaohe into a reliable operational base for the KRA in a short span of time. We had worked among the peasants in the outskirts of Jirin and in the vicinity of Changchun, but we had never so thoroughly transformed a rural village into a revolutionary one as we did with Wujiazi. Kim Gwang Ryol, a liaison officer of the Comintern, expressed his admiration for all the success we had achieved in Wujiazi.

Because we had put forward an original revolutionary line and were paving the road of revolution in an independent way, the Comintern showed great interest in us. It seems that the Oriental Department of the Comintern discussed us a lot at that time. They seemed to have been curious about the emergence in Korea of revolutionaries of a new generation who were quite different from those of the previous generation and who, while not affiliated with any faction, were working independently and without fuss on a sound mass foundation. It must have been out of curiosity that the Comintern sent a liaison officer.

Kim Gwang Ryol, who had been at the liaison office in Harbin, came to Wujiazi and talked to my comrades, the heads of the revolutionary organizations and the village elders. After talking to many people, he met me and made many encouraging remarks concerning our work. He said that the young communists of Korea had been paving an original road for the communist movement and for the struggle for national liberation from colonial domination, and that in the course of this we had accumulated rich experience. He gave his full support to our revolutionary lines and policies.

He expressed great surprise at our line of the anti-Japanese national united front. He said that a serious discussion about the definition of the supporters of, and sympathizers with the revolution was being conducted in the international communist movement, and asked me how he should understand our alliance with the bigoted nationalist forces, religious believers and even the propertied class.

I said: "A revolution cannot be carried out by a small number of communists or by workers and poor peasants alone. In order to defeat Japanese imperialism we have to enlist even middle-of-the-road forces. I don't know about the situation in other countries, but in Korea most of the national capitalists and religious believers are all opposed to foreign forces. Only a handful of landlords, comprador capitalists, pro-Japanese elements and traitors to the nation are against the revolution. We intend to mobilize all the rest of the people in a nationwide resistance.

The key to liberating Korea through the efforts of the Korean people is to win all the anti-Japanese forces over to our side." After hearing my explanation he said, "I am most gratified with the original way you are dealing with everything, without being restrained by the classics." Then he advised me to study in Moscow, saying, "The practical struggle is important but since you are a promising young man, you should study."

Then he produced a suitcase containing a suit, a shirt, a tie and a pair of shoes, and told me that it would be a good idea for me to comply with his request because the Comintern was expecting a great deal from me. He had probably been to the Comintern and come to me with instructions to persuade me to go to Moscow.

I answered, "I am very grateful to you for your interest in me, but I intend to go to east Manchuria, to the masses. If I go to the Soviet Union and eat Russian bread, I may become a pro-Russian which I do not want. "There are many factions in Korea such as the M-L group, the Tuesday group, the Seoul group<sup>15</sup> and others which I find distasteful. I cannot be the same. I shall learn Marxism-Leninism from my books."

Cha Gwang Su, Park So Sim and other comrades, too, had once advised me in Toroju to go to Moscow, after preparing daily necessities needed in my studying abroad. Late in December that year I called a meeting of the leading personnel of the KRA and heads of the revolutionary organizations in Wujiazi. The meeting was to review the experiences and lessons gained in the struggle to implement the tasks put forward at the Kalun Meeting and to expand and develop the revolutionary movement as required by the prevailing situation.

Militarist Japan, resorting to the force of arms, had spurred up her preparations for war to seize new colonies and expand her territory by mobilizing all her strength. She ruthlessly destroyed anything she found standing in her way. We were planning to go to east Manchuria, anticipating Japan's invasion of Manchuria, and to entrench ourselves there to fight against the invasion. In order to go to east Manchuria we had to review our activities in the central part of Manchuria and take the necessary measures for preparing for an armed struggle, and the Wujiazi Meeting was convened for this purpose.

All the core members of the KRA and heads of the revolutionary organizations attended the meeting. Chae Su Hang and many other heads of revolutionary organizations came to Wujiazi from the Jiandao, Onsong and Chongsong areas, braving the severe cold of 30 degrees below zero. Many young revolutionaries, who had not known one another, became acquainted, exchanged opinions and conducted a serious discussion on the future of the Korean revolution.

The focus of the debate at the meeting was the matter of radically strengthening our activities in east Manchuria. We were firmly resolved to move the main theatre of our activities to east Manchuria. This was a pressing need in view of the prevailing revolutionary situation. That was why I, though staying in Wujiazi, did not forget east Manchuria and was waiting impatiently for the day when I could move there.

At the meeting I also proposed that the preparations for the anti-Japanese armed struggle be speeded up and solidarity with the international revolutionary forces be strengthened. The meeting fully displayed our determination to switch over from the youth and student movement and from the underground movement in the rural areas to an armed struggle and a decisive offensive against the enemy. While the Kalun Meeting had crystallized the will of the Korean nation to defeat Japanese imperialism by force of arms and liberate the country, the Wujiazi Meeting reaffirmed that will and indicated a shortcut to the theatre of the great war against the Japanese.

This meeting served as a bridge between the meeting held in Kalun and the meetings held in Mingyuegou in the spring and winter of 1931 and the meeting held in Songijang in the same year, meetings which led us young communists to the field of the decisive battle against the Japanese imperialists.

Our youth and student movement finally developed to the stage of the armed struggle in the 1930s. Wujiazi played the role of a springboard, so to speak. When I was leaving Wujiazi, Mun Jo Yang followed me for 4 kilometers to see me off, with tears in his eyes.

4.10. Unforgettable Men and Women

Once I met Comrade Fidel Castro in Pyongyang, and I talked to him for a long time about my experience in the anti-Japanese revolutionary struggle. He asked me many questions, one of which was how we had obtained food while conducting the armed struggle. I said that we had taken food from the enemy sometimes, but that the people always supplied us with it. During our youth and student movement and underground work, too, people offered us food and bedding.

The Shanghai Provisional Government, Chongui-bu, Sinmin-bu, Chamui-bu and other Independence Army organizations each made laws and raised subscriptions and war funds from their compatriots, but we did not do so. Of course, we needed money for our revolutionary activities, but we could not enact laws to collect taxes. Restricting the people by laws and rules and raising funds by traveling about villages with a book in which was noted down which family should contribute how much money, did not accord with our ideals. Our attitude was that we would take what the people offered us, but if they did not offer us anything, we would not mind.

However, the people helped us in any circumstances even risking their lives. They were awakened to political awareness and always ready to help revolutionaries as they would their own children. Therefore we always trusted them. Where the people lived we never had to skip a meal. We could emerge victorious, even though we had started the struggle empty-handed, solely because the people trusted and supported us. Hyon Ha Juk, Kim Bo An and Sung Chun Hak in Guyushu, Ryu Yong Son, Ryu Chun Gyong, Hwang Sun Sin and Chong Haeng Jong in Kalun, Pyon Dae U, Kwak Sang Ha, Pyon Dal Hwan, Mun Si Jun, Mun Jo Yang, Kim Hae San, Li Mong Rin and Choe Il Chon in Wujiazi, they were all unforgettable men and women who helped us in south and central Manchuria.

Though they lived on gruel, the people treated us kindly, offering us boiled rice. Sometimes we slept in the night-duty room of a school on the excuse that we had an urgent task to perform that night, because we were sorry to bother the family. We used classrooms at Chinmyong School as a lodging in Kalun and those at Samgwang and Samsong Schools were our bedrooms in Guyushu and Wujiazi.

Whenever I tried to sleep with my head on a wooden pillow in a classroom at Samgwang School, Hyon Gyun would come and seize me by the hand in a fit of anger. He was a member of the DIU and a soldier of the Korean Revolutionary Army. He was clever, upright and kind-hearted. His elder brother Hyon Hwa Gyun worked in the Peasants Union in Guyushu and helped us a lot in our work. Two brothers were involved in our organizations and, what is more, their father, too, was an independence fighter, as a result of which their family was exceptionally kind and warm towards us.

As a man of some social standing Hyon Gyun's father Hyon Ha Juk enjoyed high prestige among the independence fighters. Ha Juk was an alias, his real name was Hyon Jong Gyong. Instead of addressing him by his real name, the people of Guyushu called him Mr. Ha Juk. In those days all the Koreans resident in Manchuria knew of him.

In his lifetime my father, too, was on intimate terms with him and spoke a lot about him. Not only as mere friends but also as comrades who shared one idea and purpose for the independence movement, they had frequent contact and discussed matters until they came to a mutual understanding. They devoted themselves to the independence movement, respecting each other as close friends.

Mr. Hyon Ha Juk was the chairman of the central legal commission in the days of Tongui-bu'6, a member of the central committee in the days of Chongui-bu and, in the days of Kukmin-bu, the head of the political department of the Korean Revolutionary Party which was known by the nationalists as the one and only party of the nation. He had a deep understanding of communism and always sympathized with the young men who aspired to communism, mixing freely with them.

When Comrades Kim Hyok, Cha Gwang Su and Park So Sim were establishing the Anti-Imperialist Youth League organizations following the formation of the social science institute in Liuhe, he would often appear as a lecturer to enlighten the young people. Those who had attended his lectures in their school days in Wangqingmen and at Hwahung Middle School days frequently recalled him.

Whenever I went to Guyushu, Hyon Ha Juk invited me to spend the night at his house. "Make yourself comfortable. Treat this as if it were your uncle's house," he would say. He was over ten years older than my father. I stayed at his house for ten days, twenty days and even a month to work with the masses. One year I celebrated the Tano festival with his family in Guyushu. In those days, the family's circumstances were so difficult that offering a guest food and bedding for a day or two, let alone several weeks, was no easy matter. Because the farmers offered food to the revolutionaries from the small amount of grain which remained after paying their farm rent to the landlord, they did not have even enough gruel to eat. Hyon's family did all they could to feed me well. Sometimes they served chicken, bean curd, ground beans and chard soup.

Whenever the women of his family were turning a hand mill to make bean curd, I rolled up my sleeves to help them. I still remember Hyon Hwa Gyun's wife Kim Sun Ok, who was twenty two or twenty three years old and who, out of shyness, would not show her face when I helped her to turn the hand mill. Mr. Hyon Ha Juk belonged to Kukmin-bu, a nationalist organization, but he did not conceal his involvement in the progressive group within Kukmm-bu and said openly that he would follow communism in the future.

I was told that he went to Xian to avoid a quarrel within Kukminbu after I left Guyushu. Apparently he went there seeking something from Zhang Xue-liang when his army moved to Xian. Because Zhang's anti-Japanese feelings were strong, many people wanted to conduct the anti-Japanese movement under his umbrella. Before and after the Manchuria incident many Korean independence fighters who had been active in the three eastern provinces of China moved the theatre of their activities to such places as Shanghai, Xian and Changsha.

Whenever I passed the northeastern area of China by air or by train on a foreign tour after liberation, I recalled Guyushu, Mr. Hyon and his family, as I saw the familiar mountains and rivers. He may have passed away, but one or two of his children must still be alive. However, there was no news from them. I have been able to do nothing because I do not know their address, but they could have written to me. I thought that it was easy for a man to receive kindness but it was difficult to repay it.

Unexpectedly, in the spring of 1990, I had an emotional meeting with members of his family. Kim Sun Ok, the eldest daughter-in-law of Mr. Hyon, sent to our revolutionary museum the brass bowl which I had used when I had eaten at their house, as well as the hand mill which had been used to make bean curd for me. She had preserved them for 60 years as souvenirs. This story was carried in Toraji, a Korean magazine published in Jirin, and our Rodong Sinmun copied the article.

When I heard that my benefactors, from whom I had heard nothing for sixty years, were still alive, I could not control my feelings. I had intended to repay the debt I owed in Guyushu someday when the country was independent, so I was anxious to meet Kim Sun Ok to share our past experiences with each other, offering her simple dishes of my own. Kim Sun Ok, too, said that she could wish for nothing more than to meet me again before she died.

So I invited her to Pyongyang in March 1990. When I met her I found her in her 80s, hardly able to walk because of a serious illness. When she came to our country, she was accompanied by six of Mr. Hyon's children and grandchildren who were all strangers to me. Hyon Gyun's son was there. His lips closely resembled his father's. As I looked at the familiar lips I felt as if Hyon Gyun had come to life again and was calling on me. I made sure that her party stayed in a guest house for foreign VIPs for about a month while they traveled about the homeland. What troubled me was that she could not catch what others were saying because she was hard of hearing. Her pronunciation was not clear and she had a poor memory.

Though I had met her, one of my benefactors, whom I had been anxious to meet for sixty years, we could not make ourselves understood to each other. I had hoped that we could spend a long time looking back on the days in Guyushu, she reminding me of what I had forgotten and I reminding her of what she had forgotten. I was very sorry that my wish had not been granted. Mr. Hyon Ha Juk's family knew little about his life and activities. So I told them how he had fought for the independence of Korea and how he had helped us in our revolutionary activities. I regarded this to be my duty as a man who knew well about his personal history.

The cause of the previous generation is not inherited naturally by the children of the same stock. Only when the younger generations know all about the distinguished service rendered by their forerunners and its value, can they inherit the revolutionary cause begun by their grandfathers and fathers' generations.

When I met Kim Sun Ok, we sat together with Kong Guk Ok, Mun Jo Yang and Mun Suk Gon who had helped us in our revolutionary activities in Wujiazi. Kong Guk Ok was the daughter of Kong Yong who, when my father passed away, had remained in mourning for three years in my place. One year when I was studying at Jirin Yuwen Middle School I went home to Fusong for the holiday. At that time Kong Yong's wife, whom he had treated badly because of a scar on her face, came to our house with a baby on her back. That baby was none other than Kong Guk Ok.

While directing a meeting of the peasants union in Pyongyang immediately after liberation, I met a man from Pyokdong, a delegate to the meeting, and asked him if he knew where the bereaved family of Kong Yong lived. Because Kong Yong came from Pyokdong I guessed that his widow and daughter might be living there. The delegate said that many people in Pyokdong had the family name Kong, but he had never heard of Kong Yong's family. I was disappointed at what he said. My mind was troubled because I did not know the whereabouts of Kong Yong's family, while other bereaved families had been found.

In those days we were preparing to establish a school for the bereaved families of revolutionaries at Mangyongdae. When I returned, after 20 years, to my old house where my grandparents were waiting for me after I had given my address on my triumphal return to the citizens in the Pyongyang public playground, my classmates from my primary school days called on me and suggested that a middle school named after me be established on the old site of Sunhwa School at which my father had taught. They said, "Mangyongdae is the famous place where General Kim was born. How wonderful it would be if we were to build a large school and name it 'Kim Il Sung Middle School.'"

At that time there was no middle school in my home village. I said to them, "In the past innumerable patriots sacrificed themselves in the armed struggle while fighting at my side in the mountains. With their dying breath they asked me to educate their children and train them into fine revolutionaries after the independence of Korea. Since then, I have believed that, true to their last words, I should provide education for the bereaved children of my comrades and ensure that they inherit their parents' will, after the country became independent. Now that we have won back our country, my determination has become firmer. A school for bereaved children of revolutionaries should be established at Mangyongdae, rather than a middle school."

When I said this, the villagers asked me how many bereaved children of revolutionaries there were and if they were so many that a school should be established exclusively for them. Even some cadres who were working at important posts of the Party and administration said the same. They could not even guess how many martyrs had sacrificed themselves in the fight for the country. Whenever I met such people I was dumbfounded because I had buried innumerable comrades in the mountains of a foreign country.

We established the school for the bereaved families of revolutionaries at Mangyongdae, using as capital rice donated by the peasants to the country as a token of their patriotic devotion out of their first harvest after the land reform. I dispatched many officials to various places at home and in northeast China to find the bereaved children of revolutionaries. At that time hundreds of such children came home from China. Some of those children whom Comrade Lim Chun Chu brought back have now become members of the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of our Party.

Some children who had been living by selling dyestuffs or cigarettes returned home on foot of their own accord after hearing that a revolutionary school would be established at Mangyongdae. Among them were descendants of Independence Army men and the children of the patriots who had died while fighting against the Japanese in labor unions or peasants unions.

However, only Kong Guk Ok was nowhere to be found. Whenever I went to North Pyongan Province I searched for Kong Yong's family by following up rumors, and I requested the officials of the province to find them. Whenever I visited the revolutionary school to enjoy the holidays with the children and saw them singing and dancing merrily, I felt a heartache at the thought of Kong's wife who would come to my house in Xiaonanmen Street wearing straw sandals and with a wild herb package on her head, and Kong Guk Ok who was licking her hand on her mother's back.

I discovered Kong Guk Ok at last in 1967. It was after her mother had died. If her mother had known that Kim Il Sung was Kim Sung Ju, she would have called on me. Apparently she said nothing about her husband's activities to her daughter because she did not know who Kim Il Sung was and, moreover, she was afraid that the communist party which had seized power was prejudiced against her husband who belonged to the Independence Army.

I sent Kong Guk Ok to the Higher Party School. After her graduation she worked for the Pyongyang City Party Committee and in the museum of the Ministry of Railways. Because she is now too old to work, she is spending the rest of her life at home on an old-age pension. Kim Bo An from Guyushu was a friend of my father's, as Hyon Ha Juk was. Once he was a company commander of the Independence Army. He said with regret that I had never visited his house, and only went to Mr. Hyon's, I was told. When friends of mine called on him, he said that he had been on intimate terms with Kim Hyong Jik and was friendly with Sung Ju, too, but that I had not visited him.

From then on I dropped in at his house whenever I went to Guyushu. He had established a pharmacy and offered some of the money coming from it to support our Samgwang School. As a man of great enthusiasm for education, he was deeply concerned in enlightening the young people and children. Whenever we requested him to give a lecture at Samgwang School he readily complied. He said that the people of Guyushu did not know even how to count money, so he worried about how we would gain the independence of Korea with such ignorant people. Nowadays people may not believe that adults could not count money, but in those days many of the Chinese and Koreans living in Jirin were not able to calculate prices.

The money issued in the province was different from that being circulated in the counties and, in addition, there were various kinds of money of different values, such as the Jirin government cheque, the Fengtian rayang, the Jirin syotayang and the silver coin. So many people could not calculate prices in the markets.

We got the peasants together at the night school and taught them how to calculate prices. Seeing that those who had been regarded so ignorant were now mastering the four rules of arithmetic, Kim Bo An said with satisfaction, "Of course, Koreans are naturally clever." He observed the lessons at the night school and at Samgwang School, saying that seeing their development from ignorance to intelligence was very interesting.

Every student of the advanced course at Samgwang School was clever and resourceful. Among them Ryu Chun Gyong and Hwang Sun Sin still remain in my memory as unforgettable figures. Both of them came to the school on the recommendation of the revolutionary organization in Kalun. Ryu Chun Gyong's father Ryu Yong Son helped us in our revolutionary activities, teaching the pupils at Chinmyong School.

At that time Comrades Ryu and Hwang were only 14 or 15 years old. When we were returning to Kalun or Jirin after finishing our work in Guyushu, we would ask them to carry our weapons. The warlords were not so careful in searching women. The two girls always complied with our request. They would follow about 50 meters behind us with our weapons under their skirts. The warlord authorities searched us carefully, but they allowed the two girls to pass without taking any serious notice of them.

Hwang Sun Sin returned home after liberation and worked as a farmer in her home village. She worked well, worthy of a member of the children's expeditionary corps in her Samgwang School days and became famous for her good harvests. She enjoyed respect and love among the people throughout her life and, in the postwar period, worked as a deputy to the Supreme People's Assembly.

Ryu Chun Gyong lived in various parts of Manchuria before returning home in 1979, saying that she would spend the last years of her life in the homeland as Lee Gwan Rin was doing. If she had returned home at a young age as Hwang had done, she would have become a famous career woman and enjoyed a more worthwhile life in her old age for the society and people. Of the girl pupils at Samgwang School she was the best at writing and speaking. She was clear-headed and very promising.

5.1. The Earth in Agony

With the advent of 1931 the whirlwind of white terrorism that had started in the wake of the May 30 and August 1 Uprisings swept across the whole territory of Manchuria with increasing force. In an attempt to root out the revolutionary forces that had been painstakingly fostered over many years by the Korean communists and patriots, the enemy resorted to bloody repression everywhere. When I arrived in east Manchuria, I found the atmosphere there more strained than in south or central Manchuria; the consequences of the uprisings were even more horrible and devastating there.

When I saw the heads of the rebels on spikes at the South Gate of Dunhua, I realized how far the offensive of the enemy against the revolutionary forces had gone. Even after the May 30 and August 1 Uprisings the factionalists and flunkies who were steeped in dogmatism and petty-bourgeois vainglory staged riots in the name of anniversary revolts, harvest revolts and terror revolts on such occasions as the anniversary of National Humiliation Day, the anniversary of the October Revolution and the anniversary of the Guangzhou Uprising. The number of such riots reached several hundreds. This was why the storm of terrorism by the enemy was continuing into the following year.

In the course of this nearly all the revolutionary organizations in Jiandao broke up. Even the people who had followed the insurgents with food for them, to say nothing of the hardcore men who had fought in the front line, were all captured or killed. The organizations we had rebuilt a year before when we were on our way to the River Tuman also suffered a considerable loss. Some of those taking part in the uprisings either surrendered to the enemy or fell away from the revolutionary organizations.

When I visited villages in search of the organizations that had gone underground, some people would not speak to me and would only look at my face fearfully. Others would say, "The communist party has ruined Jiandao," "The whole area of Jiandao has become a sea of blood, a sea of flames due to the senseless moves of the communist party," and "Because they dance to the tune of the communist party, all your family will be exterminated," and would turn away from or give a wide berth to people known to be communists, regardless of their affiliation.

When I went to Mingyuegou, Li Chong San who was a member of the Weng district party committee told me of the afflictions he had gone through following the uprisings. He said: "Those higher up tell me incessantly to go among the masses and restore and expand the organizations, but to be frank with you, I find meeting people now uninteresting and discouraging. Those people who used to treat me with respect as a revolutionary, and even those who were admitted to the organization on my recommendation, have been keeping out of my way for months now.

I feel so sad I can hardly carry on my revolutionary work. The wind of revolt blew a few times and public feelings have turned nasty in Jiandao, I tell you. Sometimes I have the sudden thought that, if I have to live on like this with people giving me the cold shoulder, I would rather give up the revolution and go away somewhere just to earn a living, and then I shall find peace of mind. But it's easier said than done. how can a revolutionary abandon his original aim that he was determined to attain, come what may? In any event there must be some measures taken to find a way out, but I'm quite at a loss what to do, and I only resent the confused situation."

This was the anguish of Li Chong San and, at the same time, my anguish. All the revolutionaries in Jiandao experienced such mental agony in the years 1930-31. The situation was so grim and dark that even such a faithful and reticent old revolutionary as Li Chong San had unburdened himself to me in that way. Of course, he did not abandon the revolution. Later I met him again in Antu. While I was away touring many counties on the banks of the River Tuman, he was transferred to the Antu district party committee. His face was much brighter than when he had been in Wengshenglazi.

He said with great pleasure that things were going well at his new post. "Gone are the days of my nightmare," he remarked. This expressed the change in his life. I could not find a trace of the bitter and dismal look he had worn on his face when he complained that people kept aloof from him. But until I met Li Chong San at Wengshenglazi the revolutionaries in Manchuria had suffered terribly under the white terrorism and had had to suffer anguish due to the cold and wary attitude of the people.

I was also distressed with the same affliction. It was at that time that I had to eat watery maize gruel and pickled mustard leaves and stems for my meals and sleep in the cold, drafty front rooms of people's houses at night, resting my head on a wooden pillow and fighting with my hunger pangs. The greatest pain molesting me in those days was that of hunger. Moving about Jiandao, I suffered much from the cold and hunger. I had to pass the winter in my Western clothes without a quilted coat, and so I always suffered more from the cold than other people did. In houses where no bedclothes were available, I would lie down in my clothes at night and try to fall asleep.

When I stopped at the house of Li Chong San, they had no bedding or pillow to offer me. So I lay down in my Western clothes at night, but I felt so cold that I could not fall asleep. It was such a tormenting experience that later when I went to my home in Antu I told my mother of what I had gone through that night. On nearing this, in a few days my mother made me a large quilted coat that looked like that of a cart driver. Whenever I happened to stop for the night at a house with no bedclothes I would cover myself with the quilted coat and sleep cuddled up with my head on a wooden pillow wrapped in a handkerchief.

But such hardships were nothing to me. During my tour of Jiandao in the spring of that year I never once had a good night's sleep. When I lay down to sleep at night, I remained awake because of cold and hunger and, to add to that, I could not calm my mind at the thought of my murdered comrades and of the ruined organizations. I was also tormented by feelings of despair and loneliness caused by the people's unkind attitude. When I lay down in a cold room resting my head on my arm after meeting people who were cold and aloof, I could not get to sleep because of visions of trusting people floating before my eyes.

To tell the truth, we had pinned great hope on the Jiandao area. Although factionalism had been rife in Yanili, the other parts of Jiandao had been relatively free from the filth of factionalism. This had provided favorable conditions for the rapid growth of a new generation of communists in the area to develop the revolution in a new fashion. For many years our comrades had, through tireless efforts and painstaking work, pushed steadily ahead with preparations for taking the anti-Japanese revolution onto a higher stage in the area. Nevertheless, the two uprisings had severely impaired the results of their hard work. The Left tendency had bewitched the masses for a time with its ultra revolutionary phrases and slogans, but the harm it did was as serious and destructive as this.

I believed it was not absurd to say that the Left tendency was an inverted manifestation of the Right tendency. So we hastened to Jiandao, setting aside everything else, out of our desire to make good the damage caused by the Left excesses and speed up the preparations for switching over to the armed struggle as soon as possible. Our expectations had been great when we came to Jiandao, but the damage suffered there was more disastrous than anticipated and, moreover, the people regarded the revolutionaries with distrust and remained aloof from them, witnessing such a state of affairs was terribly distressing. What could be sadder for the fighters who were devoted to the people than to be forsaken by the people, who had given birth to them?

If a revolutionary should forfeit the people's confidence and support even for a single day, he can scarcely be regarded as a living man. When the masses were cold and unkind towards the revolutionaries, regardless of their affiliation, we were deeply grieved because to our great regret the uprisings had discredited the communists, the masses had lost faith in their leaders and were falling away from the organizations and barriers of distrust and misunderstanding had appeared between the Korean people and the Chinese people. This was our greatest anguish at the time.

But we did not just remain in a state of distress, anguish and agony. If a revolutionary did not face problems in his struggle, he was not conducting a revolution. Faced with an ordeal, he should strengthen his resolve and pull through it without flinching and full of confidence. In 1931 we worked tirelessly to sweep away the evil consequences of the May 30 Uprising in Jiandao. The first obstacle in the way of implementing the line adopted at the Kalun Meeting was the aftermath of this uprising. Without removing this obstacle quickly and regrouping the revolutionary forces, it would be impossible to save the revolution from the crisis and to develop it.

When departing for east Manchuria after winding up the Wujiazi Meeting, I set myself and my comrades two tasks.

One was to conduct a general review of the aftereffects of the May 30 Uprising. Although we had not planned or directed it, we felt it necessary to analyze and review the uprising in a scientific manner from various angles. Despite the fact that the revolt had gone from setback to setback, there were still fanatical believers in terrorism and adherents to Li Li-san's line in east Manchuria and they were instigating the masses to conduct a reckless, violent struggle. Li Li-san's line of "victory first in one or a few provinces" was a dogmatic application of Lenin's proposition on the possibility of victory in the socialist revolution in one country.

This line had been a powerful stimulant in urging the masses to riot. It was a line laid down by someone who held power in the Chinese party and passed down through organizational channels. Therefore, people followed it for a long time until the man responsible, that is Li Li-san, resigned from his post in the party and his view was labeled as Left adventurism. In spite of their bitter experience of failure and setback, the people could not shake themselves free from the sweet illusion they had been given by Li Li-san.

A review of the May 30 Uprising would free them from this illusion. We decided to warn people against the careerism, fame-seeking and petty-bourgeois vainglory of the factionalists and flunkeys through a review of the May 30 Uprising. I thought that the review would also mark a historic turning-point in awakening the revolutionaries in Manchuria to the importance of a scientific strategy and tactics and a method of leading the masses.

The other task was to put forward a correct line for organizing the broad masses into a single political force and to equip the new generation of communists with this line. The communists in the Jiandao area had no clear organizational line to serve them as a guide in restoring and consolidating the ruined organizations and expanding and strengthening them. The factionalists and flunkeys active in east Manchuria were committing a glaring Left error also in organizing the masses.

While advocating a "theory of class revolution," they admitted only poor peasants, hired farmhands and workers to the organization. They regarded all the other sections of society as having nothing to do with the revolution. In consequence, the people left out of the organization would say in anger: "So this is what communism is like!

The small fry are closeted together, leaving all the other people out in the cold. That's communism, then." In order to remove this exclusivist tendency and unite the patriotic forces of all social quarters, it was imperative to lay down and implement as soon as possible a correct organizational line which would make it possible to overcome the flunkeys and dogmatic tendency of clinging to the propositions of the classics and the experience of other countries and unite and take in all the patriotic forces.

I set this as the object of the first stage of my work in Jiandao as I hurried on my way to east Manchuria. But while on my way towards Changchun in company with Ryu Bong Hwa and Choe Duk Yong after giving guidance in the work of the mass organizations at Guyushu, I was arrested by the reactionary warlord authorities because of a report made by a spy. The warlord authorities had been keeping a sharp watch on our activities. They were as eagle-eyed as the Japanese police.

They were even aware that we were going to east Manchuria to prepare for an armed struggle. Having realized that Guyushu was a major operational center of the Korean communists in central Manchuria, the warlord authorities had instructed the administration office of Yitong County to send an inspector there and had all our movements closely watched.

It had been spying on our movements. It was this Li who informed the inspector when we left Guyu and set off in the direction of Changchun. We were arrested at Duonandun by guard corps members who had rushed to the spot on the instructions of the inspector. After a few days' interrogation in the detention room of the county office, we were escorted to Changchun, where we spent some 20 days behind bars.

That was my third time in prison. Headmaster Li Guanghan and teacher He from Yuwen Middle School in Jirin happened to be in Changchun at the time. On hearing of my arrest, they went to the warlord authorities and protested strongly, saying, "Kim Sung Ju was found innocent and acquitted at Jirin prison, so why have you arrested him again? We stand guarantee for Kim Sung Ju." I was set free thanks to the help of the two teachers.

They were both communist sympathizers who had an understanding of communism, and that was why, I presume they did not hesitate to come to my rescue when I was in trouble. When I saw how they sympathized with me, protected me and understood our cause with their whole hearts as ever, I was deeply touched and filled with great emotion, an event which I could not forget all my life.

The first thing we did after arriving in east Manchuria was to conduct a short training course in Dunhua for the men of the Korean Revolutionary Army and hardcore members of the revolutionary organizations. In this short course lectures were given on the tasks for stepping up the preparations for an armed struggle in real earnest and the ways to implement them, on the cardinal problems arising in providing unified leadership to the basic party organizations and on the question of uniting the dispersed revolutionary masses in organizations. This class, it could be said, was preparatory to the Winter Mingyuegou Meeting held in December that year.

After that short course, I toured Antu, Yanji, Helong, Wangqing, Chongsong and Onsong giving guidance to the work of the revolutionary organizations in those areas. On the basis of a full understanding of the actual situation in Jiandao and in the six towns on the Korean side of the River Tuman, we called a meeting of cadres of the party and the Young Communist League at the house of Li Chong San in Wengshenglazi in mid-May, 1931. Historically this meeting is called the Spring Mingyuegou Meeting. Wengshenglazi means a rock giving out the sound of a ceramic jar.

Before the Japanese occupation of Manchuria, Mingyuegou used to be called Wengshenglazi. After they had usurped Manchuria, the Japanese established a railway station at Wengshenglazi and called it Mingyuegou. The name became accepted and people came to call the place Mingyuegou. At present Mingyuegou is the Antu county town, but when we held the meeting, it belonged to Yanji County.

The Spring Mingyuegou Meeting was attended by the cadres of the party and Young Communist League organizations, members of the Korean Revolutionary Army and underground workers, numbering dozens of people in all. Of the communists of the new generation in the Jiandao area, Paek Chang Hon and nearly all the other renowned revolutionaries were present at the meeting, I suppose.

My speech at the meeting was edited and published under the title Let Us Repudiate the "Left"

Adventurism Line and Follow the Revolutionary Organizational Line. In this speech I mentioned the two tasks I set on leaving for east Manchuria. As I had planned, at the meeting we analyzed and reviewed the true nature of the May 30 Uprising and put forward the revolutionary organizational line of Uniting the whole nation into a political force by firmly rallying the masses of workers, peasants and intellectuals and banding together the anti-Japanese forces of all other social sections around them.

The meeting discussed the tasks for the implementation of this organizational line, the tasks of building up a hard core of leadership and enhancing its independent role, of restoring and consolidating the ruined mass organizations and enlisting people from all walks of life in them, of tempering the masses in the practical struggle, and of strengthening the joint struggle of the Korean and Chinese peoples and promoting their friendship and solidarity.

At the same time, the tactical principles were laid down of advancing from small-scale struggles to large-scale ones and from economic struggles gradually to political struggles, and of skillfully combining legitimate struggles with underground ones, with special stress being laid on the matter of thoroughly overcoming the Left adventurism tendency.

It can be said in short that the Spring Mingyuegou Meeting in May 1931 was a gathering aimed at winning over the masses. The largest barrier to this was the Left adventurism line. This was why we resolutely criticized that line.

When we criticized Leftist and advanced the comprehensive organizational line, those attending the meeting voiced their whole hearted approval of it. Many people took the floor, and all their speeches were revolutionary. The speakers were unanimous in their opinion that Japan's invasion of Manchuria was imminent and that therefore they should make full preparations and fight a decisive battle when the time came. Since the meeting was attended by many revolutionary veterans, there were many things to listen to and learn from.

I learnt many lessons from the meeting. Following it, political workers left for all parts of Jiandao and the homeland. I stayed in Mingyuegou for some time directing the work of the party and mass organizations in the area before proceeding to Antu. My plan was to help the revolutionary work in Jiandao and in the homeland while staying in Antu. Antu was situated in a mountain recess a long way from the railways, main roads and cities, well beyond the reach of Japanese imperialism's evil power.

Surrounded by steep mountains and thick forests, the place was a favorable location for establishing contact with the organizations in the six towns and other areas in the homeland, to say nothing of the regions of Yanji, Helong, Wangqing, Hunchun, Fusong, Dunhua and Huadian, and was very convenient for founding and training a guerrilla army and promoting the work of building party organizations. The composition of the population was also very good.

In addition, Mt. Paekdu, our ancestral mountain, was nearby, and we, the people who had not forgotten our motherland even for a moment, could draw great mental comfort and inspiration from its solemn and majestic appearance. On a serene, bright day, the silvery grey peaks of Mt. Paekdu were visible under the distant southwestern sky. At the sight of it in the distance, I felt my heart beating violently with a desire to take up arms and win back my country as soon as possible. Although we were going to launch an armed struggle in a foreign land, we desired to raise the sound of gunshots against Japan within sight of Mt. Paekdu. This was a feeling common to us all.

In April, after the short training course in Dunhua, I happened to go to Antu and guided the work of the mass organizations there. My mother was weak with illness. Medical science was still backward and no correct diagnosis could be made of what was wrong with her. She would only say that she felt as if a "lump" were kicking about inside her and take some kind of decoction. She did not care how serious her illness was but she worried about my moving about strange places all the time without a penny and gave herself body and soul to the work of the Women's Association.

As I went back to Antu after two months' absence, I was anxious in my mind about my mother. But when I arrived, I was relieved to see an unexpected glow in her cheeks. She used to tell me not to care about my home but devote myself heart and soul to the work of winning back our homeland, and yet when I turned up, she could not repress her joy and would try to conceal her sickly appearance.

On hearing of my arrival, my grandmother who had come from Mangyongdae rushed out in her stocking feet and gathered me into her arms. Since coming to Manchuria in the year of my father's death, she had stayed on in Fusong without returning home, eking out a scant existence with my mother. When my mother had moved to Antu from Fusong, she had gone, also. In Antu she had taken up residence at the house of Yong Sil's maternal grandparents, and stayed there and at my home in turns. Yong Sil was the only daughter of uncle Hyong Gwon. After my uncle's imprisonment, my aunt (Chae Yon Ok) had had a severe nervous breakdown. She had just had her first baby and was looking forward to a happy life when her husband was sadly taken away to prison. So she had good reason for falling ill.

After uncle Hyong Gwon had been condemned to 15 years penal servitude and started to serve his time in prison, I wrote to my aunt advising her to give her child to someone else and remarry. But she did not marry again. She wrote: Even my elder sister-in-law who has no husband has not remarried and is raising her three children in spite of all the hardships, so how can I marry for a second time when my husband is alive and well? If I take a second husband, how grieved the father of my Yong Sil will be when he hears of it in prison! If I give away Yong Sil to someone else and start a new home with another man, shall I be able to sleep in peace and shall I be able to eat? Never suggest such a thing again.

My aunt was a prudent, graceful and strong-willed woman. My mother had been living with her, but after coming to Antu, she had sent her sister-in-law to her parents' home for a change. My grandmother, who was then staying with my aunt at her parents' home, would look after her and keep her company. Then, when her thoughts ran to her sick eldest daughter-in-law, she would go hurriedly to my home and decoct some herb medicine and cook meals for my mother. While she looked after her two weak daughters-in-law, my grandmother silently worried a great deal. So she spent years in an unfamiliar land unable to return home readily.

This I think was due to her kind and sympathetic affection as a mother-in-law for her two pitiable, lonely daughters-in-law. The night I arrived in Antu, she slept at my side. I awoke in the dead of night to find my head resting on my grandmother's arm. It seemed to me that after I had fallen asleep, she had quietly pushed my pillow aside and taken my head in her arm. My grandmother's kindness touched my heart and I could not bring myself to shift my head back onto the pillow. But she was not asleep. She asked me quietly: "You've forgotten your home, haven't you?"

"How can I, grandma? Never for a moment have I forgotten Mangyongdae. I am longing to see my family and relatives at home."

"To be honest, I came to Manchuria to take all my family here back home. If I could not take you along with me, I thought I would still take back home your mother, your younger brothers and all the others. But your mother won't listen to me. She says that you have all come here pledging not to cross back over the River Yalu before winning back the country. How then can she turn back on the spur of the moment and retrace her steps just because your father has passed away?"

So stubborn is she that she would not even look back just once when we were leaving Fusong. So I cannot ask her any more to go back home. If your living here is helpful to the winning of Korea's independence, I won't try to take you away but go back to Mangyongdae alone. When you feel homesick and yearn for your grandfather and grandmother, please write us a letter. Then we'll think we've seen you. You know I can't come here often."

Later I could not comply with my grandmother's request even once. I did not write her a letter because I thought that she would hear of my name and the reports about the military achievements of the anti-Japanese guerrilla army carried often in the newspapers of my homeland. My grandmother sighed quietly as she said that if I was to do something great my mother should be in good health, and that it was embarrassing that she was working so hard while her illness was going from bad to worse. On hearing this, I could not sleep because of my anxiety about my mother. I had many things to worry about as her eldest son and the heir to the Mangyongdae family who should look to family affairs.

In those days it was much in vogue among the young people who were my revolutionary companions to think that a man who had stepped out on the road of struggle should naturally forget his family. The young revolutionaries were generally of the opinion that he who cared about his home was not equal to a great cause. Criticizing such a tendency, I would say that he who did not love his home could not truly love his country and the revolution. Yet, how much did I love and care for my home? It was my view of filial piety in those days that earnest devotion to the revolution represented the supreme love for one's family. I never thought of pure filial duty detached from the revolution. This was because I believed that the fate of a family and that of the country were inseparably interrelated with each other.

It is common knowledge that the peace of the country is a prerequisite to peace at home. It is a rule that national tragedy will inevitably affect the millions of families that make up the nation. Therefore, to safeguard the peace and happiness of families it is necessary to safeguard the country; and to safeguard the country, everyone must faithfully discharge his duties as a citizen. But a man should not lose sight of his family on the ground that he is engaged in the revolution. Love for his family constitutes a motive force which prompts a revolutionary to the struggle. When his love for his family cools, his enthusiasm for the struggle will cool also.

I knew in principle about the interrelation between a family and the revolution, but I had no clear, established view of how a revolutionary devoted to the revolution should love his family. As I looked around the house, inside and out, after getting up in the next morning, I found many things that needed a male hand to put them right. There was not enough firewood, for one thing. I decided that I would find time to lend my mother a hand in looking after the housekeeping. Putting aside everything else, that day I went up the mountain with my brother Chul Ju.

Photo: Kim Chul Ju, standing, and Zhang Wai-hua. Chul Ju, Kim Il Sung's younger brother, served with a Chiang Kai Sek guerrilla unit and was killed in action.

I had decided to gather some firewood. But my mother came after us with a head-pad and a sickle in her hands. I wondered how she had discovered where we were, after she had gone out to the well. I implored her to go home but to no avail. "I haven't come just to help you. I want to have a talk with you here. Last night grandmother talked with you all night, didn't she?"

Mother smiled brightly as she said this. Only then did I understand As a matter of fact, grandmother would have me to herself. When she let go of me, my younger brothers would hang on to me and give me no peace. While collecting firewood, mother kept close at my side, speaking to me all the time.

"Did he? But why did he say he wanted to discuss with me?"

"He said he wanted to tell you he was displeased with you for going around telling the people that the May 30 Uprising was a mistake. He shook his head and said he could not see why a sensible young man like Sung Ju should be so critical of the uprising when it had been supported and countenanced by people higher up. I'm afraid you're out of favor with the people."

"That may be possible. It seems there are some people who don't take kindly to my views. But mother, what do you think?"

"I can't claim to know anything of the world. I only think it a serious matter when crowds of people are being killed and arrested. When all the hard core is gone, who will carry out the revolution?"

My mother's simple yet clear thought delighted me. The people always had an unerring eye. There could never be a social phenomenon which defied the people's judgment. "You're right, mother. You have passed fairer judgment on the matter than that man Choe Dong Hwa. Even now, the revolution is suffering because of the uprising, isn't it? I have come to Antu to repair the damage."

"So I suppose you must dash around busily as you did last spring. Don't worry about household affairs again but devote yourself to your duties."

This was the point of what she wanted to say to me. She must have begun talking about Choe Dong Hwa so as to tell me this.

After that I dedicated myself heart and soul to the work of building up organizations, as my mother wished. Antu also had been greatly victimized because of the May 30 Uprising. To add to that, the work of organizing the masses was unsatisfactory in this area. To make Antu revolutionary it was essential above all else to expand the party organizations and party ranks and firmly establish the organizational leadership system of the party in the area. So in mid-June 1931 we formed the area party committee of Xiaoshahe, Antu County, with Kim Jong Ryong, Kim Il Ryong and other core elements, and gave the party committee the assignment of sending out political workers to the areas of Erdaobaihe, Sandaobaihe, Sidaobaihe, Dadianzi, Fuerhe and Chechangzi to set up basic party organizations.

Following the formation of the district party committee, Young Communist League organizations were extended to Liushuhe, Xiaoshahe, Dashuhe and Antu, and anti-Japanese organizations such as the Peasants' Association, Anti-Imperialist Union, Revolutionary Mutual-Relief Association and Children's Expeditionary Corps were founded in these areas.

As a result, the groundwork for organizing the masses was completed in the Antu area in the summer of that year. There was no village without an organization. The greatest problem in making Antu revolutionary was that the revolutionary ranks were divided among themselves. Antu was divided in two halves - north and south - with a river in between. Different youth organizations had these villages under their influence.

The young people's organization in the northern village was under the control of the followers of the Chongui-bu machinery and that in the southern village was under the thumb of such Chamui-bu people as Sim Ryong Jun. These two organizations were at daggers drawn, and even the young people's organization of the M-L group led by Choe Dong Hwa was reaching out its hand to them, thus greatly complicating the situation within the youth movement. This being the situation we did not limit ourselves to restoring the youth organizations to their original state but educated and led the young people to unite them into one organization. We guarded against and ruthlessly criticized the slightest attempt to split the youth movement.

This compelled people steeped in factional strife such as Choe Dong Hwa to adopt a prudent attitude to our opinion that a unified youth organization should be set up in the Antu area. In the process of making Antu revolutionary we ran up against the vehement obstructive moves of the hostile elements.

In places like Kalun and Wujiazi the village heads were all under our influence, but in Xinglongcun the village head cringed to the wicked landlord Wu Han-chang and acted as his spy. He always spied on the movements of the villagers and mass organizations and sent reports to the town. So we called a meeting of all the village inhabitants, men and women, young and old, to denounce the fellow, and threw him out of the village. A few days later Wu Han-chang came to bargain with me. He said:

"I am aware that you, Mr. Kim, are a communist. I am really worried because I am always away in old Antu and only my bodyguard remain here. If those reckless men in my bodyguard should find out who you are and do harm to you, I shall be an enemy of all the communists, shan't I? I am worried that I have to get along as I am doing now. Should the Japanese find out that I know about you, they will behead me right away before anyone else. So let's settle the matter amicably between ourselves. I pray you, Mr. Kim, to leave this place for all time. If you need money for your travel expenses, I'll give you as much as you like."

After hearing him out, I replied:

"There is nothing for you to worry about. I believe that, although you are a landlord, you must have a conscience as a Chinese man and hate the Japanese imperialists who are out to swallow up China.

"I think you have no cause to turn against us or hurt us. I take no exception to you and the Chinese young people who are members of your bodyguard.

"If you were a worthless man, I would not talk to you in this manner. Rather than worrying about me, you ought to take care that you are not called a 'running dog' of the Japanese ruffians."

At this, Wu Han-chang had nothing more to say and left Xinglongcun village. After that, the man and his bodyguard behaved discreetly towards us, maintaining a more or less neutral position. The newly-appointed village head always considered our position and carefully performed only those of his administrative duties that he was obliged to.

If we had failed to carry through the line of organizing the masses in Antu, we would have been unable to subdue such an important landlord as Wu Han-chang and neutralize him in the vast, wild land of Jiandao that was swept by white terrorism. The power of the organized masses was truly unlimited and there could be no such word as impossible for this power. The revolutionary organizations in Xinglongcun and the surrounding area moved forward in high spirits, expanding their forces.

5.2. The September 18 Incident

When the revolutionary organizations in Antu became active, I went out to the local organizations in the Helong, Yanji and Wangqing areas in the summer and early autumn of 1931 and rallied the masses who had dispersed following the May 30 Uprising. The September 18 incident occurred when I was conducting brisk activities based in Dunhua, establishing contact with the comrades in Antu, Longjing, Helong, Liushuhe, Dadianzi and Mingyuegou. At the time I was working with activists from the Young Communist League in a rural village near Dunhua.

Early on the morning of the 19th of September Chen Han-zhang arrived suddenly in the village where I was staying and told me that the Kwangtung Army had attacked Fengtian. "It's war! The Japanese have at last started the war. Groaning, he plumped down on the earthen verandah like a man with a heavy burden. The word war that came from his lips sounded pathetic.

The incident had been foreseen long before and its date virtually coincided with our guess, but I was shocked when I thought of the calamity it would bring to hundreds of millions of Chinese people, as well as to the Korean people, and of the great change that would affect my fate.

Later we learned what had happened from various sources. On the night of the 18th of September 1931 the railways of Japan's Manchurian Railway Company were blown up in Liutiaogou west of Beidaying in Shenyang. The Japanese imperialists then launched a surprise attack on the absurd excuse that Zhang Xue-liang's army had blown up the railways and attacked the Japanese garrison, and they occupied Beidaying and seized the airport in Fengtian on the morning of the 19th.

After Shenyang, Dandong, Yingkou, Changchun, Fengcheng, Jirin, Dunhua and other big cities in the northeast of China were occupied in succession by the Kwangtung Army and the army stationed in Korea which had crossed the River Yalu. The Japanese aggressor army occupied almost all of Liaoning and Jirin Provinces in less than five days and surged towards Jinzhou, extending the front. They were advancing at lightning speed.

The Japanese imperialists shifted the responsibility to China, distorting the truth of the incident, but no one in the world believed their version, for people knew only too well the nature of the crafty Japanese. As those who concocted the incident later admitted, it was the secret service of the Kwangtung Army that blew up the railways of the Manchurian Railway Company and touched off the incident. In an article published in those days we disclosed that the Liutiaogou incident was caused by the Japanese imperialists as part of this scheme to swallow up Manchuria.

On the morning of the 18th of September 1931 when the Kwangtung Army was on standby prior to the Manchurian incident one of the plotters, Colonel Tohihara Kenji (chief of the secret service in Shenyang), unexpectedly appeared in Seoul. During a call on Kanda Masadane, senior officer of the staff of the Japanese army stationed in Korea, he gave a roundabout account of the aim of his Visit to Korea, saying that he was visiting him because of his annoyance at the press. What he meant was that he had come to Korea to avoid the harassment to which he would be subjected by the press when the Manchurian incident broke out.

At the same time General Watanabe Jotaro, commander of the Japanese air force, is said to have visited General Hayashi Senjuro, commander of the Japanese army in Korea in Seoul to take a rest, hosting a banquet at the Paekunjang restaurant. Their trip was very peaceful and leisurely.

When I read this historical account, I was reminded of the fact that Truman had stayed at his villa without any particular reason at the time of the outbreak of the Korean war. We find common features in the September 18 incident and the Korean war not only in the fact that these two wars began without any declaration of war, but also in that those who provoked the two wars displayed the craftiness and impudence that are incidental to imperialists and their disposition to invade and dominate other countries.

Some say that history is a sequence of non-repetitive events, but we cannot entirely ignore the similarity and common trends existing in different events.

We had always known that Japan was going to swallow up Manchuria by provoking the like of the September 18 incident. We foresaw it when the Japanese imperialists had Zhang Zuo-lin assassinated by a bomb, when the Wanbaoshan incident took place with the result that the Korean and Chinese peoples were pitted against each other and when they created the incident in which Captain Nakamura, who was serving with the staff of the Kwangtung Army and was spying in the guise of an agronomist, "disappeared."

I was particularly shocked by the Wanbaoshan incident. Wanbaoshan is a small rural village about 20 miles northwest of Changchun. The Wanbaoshan incident was a dispute over the irrigation canal in the village between the Korean immigrants and the Chinese natives. The Korean immigrants had dug the canal to draw water from the River Yitonghe with a view to turning the dry fields into paddies, but the canal encroached upon the fields of the Chinese natives. Also the damming of the river might cause floods in the rainy season. So the natives were against the project.

The Japanese egged the Korean peasants on to complete the project, and thus extended the dispute into Korea, causing casualties and damage to property. Thus they deftly used a local dispute, common in the rural villages, to cause discord between nations. If the Japanese had not sown discord, and if farsighted men from among the Korean and Chinese peoples had followed the dictates of reason, the dispute would have been a brief quarrel and would not have developed into a fight.

The incident sowed great misunderstanding, mistrust and antagonism between the Korean and Chinese peoples. I considered the matter all night without sleeping. Why should the people of two countries who were suffering similar misfortune because of the Japanese imperialists fight a bloody battle with their fists? What a shame it was to be feuding with each other because of a canal when the two nations should fight the common anti-Japanese war! Why did the misfortune arise and who caused it? Whom did it benefit and whom did it harm?

It suddenly struck me that the incident was a prearranged farce, a prelude to something terrible. Above all it roused my suspicion that the Japanese consul in Changchun was out to "protect" the interests and rights of the Koreans, while meddling in a casual conflict between peasants. It was in fact a political farce that should have been exposed to public ridicule that those who had taken away the farmland of Korea through the predatory "Land Survey Act" and pursued a murderous agricultural policy were suddenly out to "defend" the Korean peasants in the guise of protectors.

I was suspicious of the fact that the branch office of the newspaper Kyongsong Ilbo had hastily reported the dispute in Wanbaoshan to its head office and that an extra issue was hastily put out and distributed in the homeland. Did this not mean that the best brains of Japanese imperialism had thought up a terrible trick, deftly using a small local dispute, and that it had worked? What was the purpose of it?

The Japanese imperialists were evidently making hasty preparations for something while we were putting in order the revolutionary organizations in the mountain recess of Jiandao. The "disappearance" of Captain Nakamura in the summer of that year when the aftermath of the Wanbaoshan incident was still evident brought Sino-Japanese relations to the brink of war.

Simultaneously with this incident alarming events were taking place in Japan proper. Some young officers in Tokyo got together and held a memorial service for Nakamura at the Yasukuni Shrine, drew a Japanese flag with their blood and put it up on top of the shrine to fan the war fever of the nation. Various organizations with interests in Manchuria held a joint meeting to discuss the problems of Manchuria and Mongolia and told people that the use of force was the only way to settle the problems there.

At that time I judged that the invasion of Manchuria was only a matter of time. I had ample grounds for this.

As was mentioned in Tanak's Memorial to the Throne, it was basic Japanese policy to swallow up Korea, Manchuria, Mongolia and then China so as to dominate Asia. Militarist Japan, ambitious to become the leader of Asia, was advancing steadily in accordance with her national policy.

The Japanese imperialists massed the Kwangtung Army in Shenyang and completed their arrangements for an attack, using as an excuse the "disappearance" of Captain Nakamura. Chen Han-zhang was very worried at this. He said, "The Japanese army is going to invade Manchuria, yet we are as good as empty-handed. What should we do?" He had put some hope in the Zhang Xue-liang-led warlords of the Kuomintang.

They have been irresolute so far, but once the sovereignty of the nation was violated, they would have to resist in the face of the pressure of hundreds of millions of Chinese people, even if only to save their face, he thought. I said to Chen Han-zhang, "It is absurd to expect that the warlords of the Kuomintang will resist.

Remember Zhang Zuo-lin's assassination in a bombing'. Clearly it was the work of the Kwangtung Army and they obtained convincing proof of the fact, but the warlords of the Northeast Army made no inquiries into the matter and did not call the Kwangtung Army to account. They even received the Japanese who went to offer their condolences and pay their respects to-the departed. How can this be attributed only to their prudence, weakness and irresolution?

The Kuomintang is throwing an army of hundreds of thousands of men into the central Soviet region in Jiangxi Province in an attempt to destroy the communist party and launch 'punitive operations' against the Worker-Peasant Red Army. The ulterior motive of the Kuomintang is to annihilate the communist party and the Worker-Peasant Red Army even if it means yielding part of the territory to the Japanese imperialists.

It is the line of the Kuomintang to eliminate the communist forces and control the political situation in the country before beating back the foreign enemy. Zhang Xue-liang, who began leaning towards the Kuomintang after his father's death, is blindly following its cursed line. Therefore, he will not resist the Japanese and it is absurd to pin your hopes on him."

He listened to me attentively but did not express any support for my view. Nor did he relinquish his hope in the warlords, and he said, "Even if Zhang Xue-liang follows the line of the Kuomintang, surely he will resist the aggressors, since he is likely to lose northeast China, the political, military and economic base of his army."

Then the September 18 incident broke out and the hundreds of thousands of men of Zhang Xue-liang army surrendered Shenyang without offering any resistance. That was why Chen Han-zhang had come running to me, his face pale and shaking his fist.

"Comrade Sung Ju, I was naive and an idle dreamer."

His whole body was shaking. He reproached himself in excitement, saying, "I was foolish enough to think that Zhang Xue-liang would defend northeast China. He is a coward and a beaten general who did not resist Japan, thus breaking faith with the Chinese nation. When I went to Shenyang before, the whole city was swarming with his troops. Every street was alive with troops shouldering new rifles. To think that an army of such strength retreated without firing a shot! How lamentable! I can't understand it."

That morning Chen Han-zhang, who was normally cool and mild, could not keep his feelings under control and was shouting. Later Zhang Xue-liang came to support resistance to Japan and contributed to collaboration between the Kuomintang party and the Chinese Communist Party, but his failure to act at the time of the Manchurian incident lost him popularity. I showed Chen Han-zhang into my room and said quietly, "Comrade Chen, don't get excited. We expected the Japanese army to invade Manchuria, didn't we? Why then are you making such a fuss? From now on we must closely watch developments in the situation and prepare ourselves to counter them."

"Of course we must. How annoying! I seem to have pinned too great a hope on Zhang Xue-liang. I could not sleep all night, and this morning came straight here.

"Comrade Sung Ju, do you know how strong is the Northeast Army under the command of Zhang Xue-liang? It is 300,000 men strong. I say, 300,000! It is a huge army. To think that a 300,000-strong army gave up Shenyang in a night without firing a shot. Is our Chinese nation so inferior and powerless? Is the homeland of Confucius, Zhuge Liang and Du Fu and Sun Yat-sen in such decline?"

Thus Chen Han-zhang lamented, beating his chest. Tears trickled from his eyes. It was natural that he should lament the tragic fate of his nation. He was lamenting out of the pure feeling of someone who loves his country. His lamenting was his inalienable right. I once wept secretly in a pine grove in the homeland, thinking of the homeland that had been trodden underfoot by the Japanese. It was on Mangyong Hill on the evening of one Sunday when I had been in a gloomy mood all day, unable to calm my anger on returning from the walled city of Pyongyang where I had seen an old man, his body covered in bruises, writhing in agony as he was kicked by the Japanese police.

That day I was in a rage like Chen Han-zhang, thinking: How was it that our country with its proud history of 5,000 years should suffer the disgrace of being ruined in a day? How could we wipe away the disgrace?

In this light Chen Han-zhang and I suffered the same disgrace. Formerly common ideas had brought us closer. From then on the same status promoted our friendship. In adversity people become more intimate with one another and their friendship and affection deepen. In the past the Korean and Chinese peoples and communists had fraternized easily with each other because they shared a similar status, goal and cause. Imperialists form temporary alliances for profit, whereas communists forge firm internationalist unity for the liberation and welfare of humanity, the goal of their common struggle.

I regarded Chen Han-zhang's sorrow as mine and the sufferings of the Chinese people as ours.

If Chiang Kaisek, Zhang Xue-liang and other heads of the political and military circles who had command of several million men had had such patriotism and insight as this youth from Dunhua had, the situation would have developed otherwise. If they had put the fate of the nation ahead of their interests and the interests of their groups and collaborated with the communists instead of opposing them, and roused the whole nation and the entire army to a war of resistance, they would have frustrated the invasion of the Japanese imperialists at the start and defended the country and people with credit.

But they gave no thought to the homeland and nation. Prior to Japan's invasion of Manchuria, Chiang Kaisek restricted the army's potential resistance by issuing to Zhang Xue-lian's Northeast Army a written command to the effect that "In the case of a challenge by the Japanese troops prudence should be exercised to avoid conflict," which later roused the resentment of hundreds of millions of Chinese people.

Even after the outbreak of the September 18 incident Chiang Jieshi's government in Nanjing issued a capitulationism statement to the effect that the Chinese people and army should maintain their composure and exercise patience instead of resisting the Japanese troops, and this dampened the morale of the army and nation. The fate of Manchuria was as good as decided before the September 18 incident.

The government in Nanjing even sent delegates to Tokyo and held secret negotiation with the Japanese government in which the Japanese were told that Chiang Kaisek did not scruple to commit such a treacherous act as agreeing to yield to Japan the border area between the Soviet Union and China on the condition that Japan would not seize other regions of China.

Chiang Kaisek did not hesitate to commit the reckless act of sharing out to the Japanese a large piece of territory, abandoning his self-respect as the Head of State with a population of hundreds of millions and an area of several million square kilometers, because he feared the struggle of the people against the landlords, comprador capitalists and Kuomintang bureaucrats more than a Japanese attack.

The 300,000-strong Northeast Army fled, abandoning the whole of vast Manchuria with its inexhaustible natural resources, in the face of the Kwangtung Army whose strength was less than one-25th of its own.

I said to Chen Han-zhang, who was so indignant at the nation's ruin, "Now it is impossible to believe in any party, military clique or political force. We must believe only in ourselves and our strength. The situation requires that we arm the masses and come out in an anti-Japanese war. The only way out is to take up arms."

Chen Han-zhang grasped my hands firmly without saying a word.

I passed the whole of that day with him to divert him. I suffered the sorrow of a ruined nation more than Chen Han-zhang. He had lost part of his country, whereas I was deprived of the whole of mine.

He invited me to his house, so the next day I left for Dunhua with him. The September 18 incident shook not only Korea and China but also the rest of the world. The world, which had been alarmed at the annexation of Korea by Japan, raised a cry of protest at the September 18 incident. Mankind thought of the incident as a prelude to another world war.

Japan described it as an unexpected local incident which could be settled through negotiations between China and Japan, but the world's people did not believe her version. Public opinion in the world denounced Japan's attack on Manchuria as a violent act of aggression against a sovereign state and called for the withdrawal of the Japanese troops from the occupied area.

But the imperialists, headed by the US imperialists, assumed a sympathetic attitude towards the aggressive act of Japan, secretly hoping that Japan would turn her spearhead to the Soviet Union. The League of Nations sent the Lytton-led fact-finding commission to Manchuria, but it failed to discriminate clearly between right and wrong, adopting an ambiguous attitude, and did not even call Japan the aggressor.

The incident shook the continent, the large army of the Zhang Xue-liang's military clique was routed in a day by the sweeping attack of the Japanese troops, and the morale of hundreds of millions of people was destroyed. The myth of the "invincible Japanese army born of its victory in the Sino-Japanese War and Russo-Japanese War" became the reality. Waves of rage and horror swept not only Korea and Manchuria but also the rest of Asia. In the face of this terror all the armed forces, political forces, revolutionary organizations, public-spirited men and distinguished figures of different hues began to show their true colors.

The September 18 incident drove most of the remaining, disintegrated, troops of the Independence Army into the mountains and pushed those who advocated the cultivation of strength into the embrace of the Japanese imperialists. Soldiers from the Independence Army, dejected, returned home, burying their rifles in the ground, while the national reformists advocated collaboration with Japan. The public-spirited men who had clamored for a war of resistance for the salvation of the nation and had made a declaration of independence, went into exile abroad, singing the Nostalgia. Some independence champions fled to Jinzhou, Changsha or Xian, following Zhang Xueliang's retreating army and abandoning the former base of their activities.

The complicated process of the break-up between patriotism and betrayal of the nation, resistance to Japan and collaboration with her, and self-sacrifice and self-preservation proceeded rapidly within the nation after September 18. Each person attached himself to the positive or negative pole according to his view on life. The Manchurian incident acted as a touchstone revealing the tendency and true intention of each member of the nation. I continued my discussion with Chen Han-zhang on the September 18 incident in Dunhua for a few days. At first I, too, was extremely alarmed. I judged that the time had come for us to take up arms, but I did not know what to do and how to act, with the Japanese troops surging in en masse. But I soon recovered my composure and coolly watched the situation develop.

At that time I thought a great deal about the influence Japan's invasion of Manchuria would have on the Korean revolution.

With the sending of Japanese troops to Manchuria and its occupation we had the enemy at our side. The Japanese police authorities intensified their crackdown on the Korean independence champions and communists, getting help from the Chinese reactionary warlords on the strength of the "Mitsuya agreement," but the instances were few in which the army and police from Korea entered Manchuria across the border. The agreement with China did not allow the Japanese army and police to cross the border.

It was generally the police of the Japanese consulate in Manchuria who searched for and arrested the Korean revolutionaries there.

Before the Manchurian incident the Japanese army in Korea was not allowed to enter Manchuria. When withdrawing from Siberia during the Russian civil war, two companies of the Korea occupation army were stationed in Hunchun on the agreement of the Chinese side. These were the only troops occupying Korea that were stationed in northeast China.

However, with the September 18 incident Manchuria swarmed with Japanese troops. Tens of thousands of soldiers surged into Manchuria from Korea, Shanghai and Japan. Manchuria became the front where friend fought foe. The border between Korea and Manchuria was as good as removed with the invasion of the Japanese troops.

The occupation of Manchuria by the Japanese troops caused great difficulties to us in our struggle, which we were waging with Manchuria as our base. We felt threatened by the Japanese army and police authorities in our activities, since one of the aims of Japan's invasion of Manchuria was to suppress the mounting national liberation struggle of the Korean people there and promote the maintenance of peace in Korea.

I realized that the iron club of the "new public peace maintenance act" enforced in Korea would fall on the heads of the Koreans in Manchuria.

If Japan established a puppet state in Manchuria, it would present a great obstacle to us. In fact, "Manchukuo," which was set up by Japan later, became a great hindrance to us in our activities. Japan's occupation of Manchuria would reduce the hundreds of thousands of Korean people who lived there with a fence around them, to misery.

So an end was to be put to the freedom of the Korean immigrants who lived out of the reach of the government-general administration in a place that had been free of Japanese. Leaving their home towns to seek a living in a foreign country was to become pointless for Koreans. But we did not consider only the unfavorable aspects of the September 18 incident. If we had resigned ourselves to pessimism and merely lamented, considering only the unfavorable aspects of it, we would have remained dejected and failed to rise.

I was reminded of a Korean saying "If one wants to catch a tiger, one must enter the tiger's den." The philosophy of life our ancestors had grasped and formulated over several thousand years told me the profound truth.

I thought: Manchuria is a tiger's den; in this den we must capture the tiger called Japanese imperialism; now is the time to take up arms and fight; if we do not fight to a finish at a time like this, we shall never prove our worth.

With this thought I made a firm resolve to rise, without losing the opportunity. For victory in the future war the Japanese imperialists will intensify their colonial rule in Korea and become hell-bent on economic plunder to supply their war needs. National and class conflicts will grow extremely acute and the anti-Japanese feelings of the Korean people will mount. So if we form armed ranks and begin the anti-Japanese war, the people will actively aid and support us materially and morally.

Hundreds of millions of Chinese people will also rise in a nationwide anti-Japanese war of resistance.

The invasion of Manchuria will be escalated into aggression in China proper and China will be enveloped in the flames of an all-out War. It goes without saying that the Chinese people, who have a strong Sense of independence, will not look with folded arms on the danger facing their homeland. By us stand numerous Chinese communists and patriots who are burning with the desire to frustrate the imperialists' aggression and defend their national sovereignty, and hundreds of millions of Chinese brothers who love freedom and independence. Those who sympathize with us Koreans as stateless people will become reliable allies and fight our enemy in the same trench with us. The Chinese people, a great ally with an allied army, will always stand by us.

If Japan extends the war into China proper, she will come into head-on collision with the interests of the Western powers, which will lead to another war. If the Sino-Japanese war becomes protracted and Japan becomes involved in another world war, she will suffer difficulties due to shortages of manpower and material resources.

That Japan has swallowed up Manchuria means a further extension of the area controlled by her. The extension of the area she controls will inevitably weaken her ability to rule. Japan will not be able to maintain the rigidity of her colonial rule. The whole world will denounce imperialist Japan as an aggressor and Japan will inevitably be isolated in the world.

All this will be strategically favorable for our revolution. This is what I thought. With the general retreat of Zhang Xue-liang's army and the sweeping attack of the Japanese aggressor army, a marvelous opportunity was created for us. The officials of the government and administration offices and security police stopped work and fled in all directions. The local offices of the rule of the warlords had all shut their doors within a few days.

With the flight of Zhang Xue-liang's army the ruling system of the warlords was paralyzed. The Japanese aggressor army failed to direct its efforts to the maintenance of public peace, being bent on following up its success in the war. As a result, chaos prevailed for some time in Manchuria.

We decided that the situation would persist for a while until the Japanese imperialists established their new ruling system on the continent. This void afforded us a golden opportunity to form armed ranks without anxiety. The opportunity was not to be lost. The revolution was approaching a fresh turning point.

The time had come for each person to decide what he should do to carry out the duties devolving on the Korean revolution and to devote himself to fulfilling them. The September 18 incident was aggression against the Chinese people and, at the same time, an attack against the Korean people and communists in Manchuria. So we Korean communists had to counter it.

I decided to speed up the formation of armed ranks.

5.3. To Oppose Armed Force with Armed Force

---

Owing to the September 18 incident we were confronted with the task of starting the anti-Japanese war immediately. The time was ripe for responding with the cannonade of justice to the cannonade of injustice which had heralded a new world war. On hearing of the invasion of Manchuria by the Japanese imperialists, all the revolutionaries came out of hiding. At the sound of the bombardment shaking the continent, the people in Manchuria generally came to their senses in the autumn of that year. The bombardment did not dishearten the people but rather awakened and inspired them to make renewed efforts. A new fighting spirit emerged in Manchuria, which had been reduced to ashes owing to the oppression of the enemy.

We considered that a good opportunity had arisen for us to harden the masses in the struggle. Frankly speaking, in those days all the people in Manchuria were distressed owing to their feeling of frustration caused by the failure of the uprising. If we were to take the revolution onto another stage, we had to give them confidence. However, we could not do so if we merely made appeals and talked idly.

In order to give the masses, who were used to failure, strength and confidence, we had to inspire them to a new struggle and lead the struggle to a victorious conclusion. Only a victorious struggle could save the masses from their nightmarish inactivity. An armed struggle waged by a few farsighted people alone would not bear fruit; the masses had to be tempered through a struggle.

The outbreak of the September 18 incident afforded the people in east Manchuria the opportunity to rise in a struggle once again. The mutinous advance of the people in the homeland also gave them great impetus.

Successive tenancy disputes by the peasants and anti-Japanese uprisings were taking place in the homeland. Typical examples of this were the tenancy disputes at the Kowon Farm of the Oriental Development Company, at the Ryongchon "Fuzi" Farm and at the Kimje "Oki" Farm. In the Ryongchon area the peasants' struggle continued even after 1929. At that time the organizations there fought well in connection with us. Many of our underground workers worked there.

More than 3,000 peasants in Yonghung and over 2,000 peasants in Samchok started a huge uprising against the Japanese imperialists who, after the September 18 incident, were intensifying their fascist oppression and plunder on the excuse of a "time of emergency." At that time we organized a harvest struggle in Jiandao.

The struggle committees in various areas had propaganda squads and pickets under them and made full preparations printing leaflets and appeals and formulating fighting slogans and so on. Then they started the harvest struggle with each area under the control of a revolutionary organization as a unit. At the beginning it was a legal, economic struggle aimed at cutting farm rents.

Some historians gave this struggle the name of "Harvest Uprising," but I did not think this name to be appropriate. The harvest struggle was neither a copy nor a repetition of the May 30 Uprising. It was a victorious mass struggle waged according to a new tactical principle on the basis of completely getting rid of the evil ideological aftereffects of Li Li-san's reckless Leftist action. While the factionalists had played the leading role in the May 30 Uprising, in the harvest struggle the communists of the new generation led the masses. The participants in the harvest struggle did not regard violence as their main resort.

The participants in the May 30 Uprising had no scruples about committing arson and murder, setting fire to transformer sub-stations and educational institutions and overthrowing all the landlords and wealthy people. The participants in the harvest struggle, however, put forward just demands such as the three-to-seven or four-to-six system of tenancy and acted in an orderly manner under the unified leadership of the struggle committee and in concert with the neighboring villagers.

Their demand for a cut in rent could in no way be considered unjustified in view of the circumstances of the peasants, who were on the brink of starvation. Because this demand was just, even the government of Jirin Province was obliged to proclaim that the tenancy system would be three to seven or four to six (30-40 per cent for the landlord and 60-70 per cent for the tenant).

Violence was never employed against those landlords who acceded peacefully to the demands of the peasants. Violence was employed against the evil landlords who stubbornly rejected the demands of the struggle committee, and against the soldiers and policemen who suppressed the struggle of the peasants by force of arms. In the case of the obstinate landlords who did not accede to the demands of the peasants, the participants in the struggle carried the share of the tenants - 60 or 70 per cent of the crops - from the fields or seized their granaries and divided the grain in them among themselves.

The predatory Oriental Development financial institutions, usurers and reactionary organizations which assisted the Japanese imperialists in their rule, such as the "Association of Korean Residents," were also targets of the struggle.

The following happened when I returned to Antu after leading the harvest struggle in Yanji. Choe Dong Hwa, who had been in hiding to avoid discovery by the Japanese imperialists after the May 30 Uprising, came to see me. He was worried that the harvest struggle was gradually assuming a violent character. He was the instigator of the May 30 Uprising in Antu. Furthermore, he later disagreed with us when we defined that uprising as a blind Leftist action and even tried to argue the matter with us. But he had suddenly changed and was talking about the harmfulness of violence. So, I was greatly surprised. He said:

"Comrade Sung Ju, what is the matter with you? You who once denounced the May 30 Uprising as a blind Leftist act, are now using violence in a purely economic struggle. How on earth should I understand this?"

Having asked me this, he walked round me several times, his arms folded inside his sleeves. He seemed to be inwardly pleased at the thought that he had hit home.

"Sir, you seem to misunderstand something. Do you consider the 'red violence' advocated by you during the May 30 Uprising to be similar to that which we are employing in the harvest struggle?"

I asked him this without even thinking that I was being impolite. Choe Dong Hwa said:

"Of course there may be a slight difference. However, violence is violence, isn't it?" To this I replied: "We employ violence only when there is a just reason and when it is proper to do so. For instance, if a landlord does not obey the peasants' demand, we seize his granary by force. When the soldiers and policemen arrest people, we use force to release our comrades. So, should we be benevolent towards the enemy when they are suppressing our struggle by resorting to violence?"

Choe's reply was: "I am critical of you not because I don't know the general principle of Marxism that violence must be met with violence. What I mean is that now is not the time to answer violence with violence. The May 30 Uprising is an old story. Unfortunately our revolution is at an ebb."

"At an ebb?"

"Yes, it's at an ebb. It's a period of two steps back. Even the Stolypin reactionary period was no darker than now, I believe. Didn't you see the ease with which the Kwangtung Army occupied the whole of Manchuria? Even the 300,000-strong army of Zhang Xue-liang retreated. At a time like this we must preserve the revolutionary forces instead of exposing them. If you provoke the enemy, I fear that such a tragedy as the large-scale 'punitive operation' which began in 1920 may recur in east Manchuria."

Thus Choe Dong Hwa insisted on preventing the harvest struggle from becoming a violent struggle and on stopping the participants in the struggle from taking up arms. He also opposed our idea for an armed struggle, claiming that the time was not ripe for it and that undertaking it would be like building a castle on the sand.

Arguing with him was beyond my power. He was an intellectual with a clear head as well as a high level of communist consciousness. Therefore, it was hard to persuade him of the justness of my idea. He frequently quoted propositions from the classics to prove the justness of his assertion, and all his remarks were logical. It was not easy to convince Choe Dong Hwa of the justness of my idea.

In the final analysis, his assertion proceeded from his view that the revolution was at an ebb. Although he saw such unfavorable omens as the wholesale armed offensive of the Japanese imperialists, the rout of Zhang Xue-liang's troops and the breaking up of the Independence Army, he was utterly ignorant of the violent advance of the people in the homeland and in east Manchuria. It was without doubt a purblind man who was standing before me, a man who could not see reality even when it was clear to others.

The counterrevolutionary offensive and the flight of some cowardly groups did not immediately mean that the revolution was at an ebb. Everything depended on the tendency of the popular masses, the motive power of the revolution.

As was the case with all the communists of the preceding generation, Choe Dong Hwa underestimated the strength of the popular masses. He could not regard the people as the motive force of the revolution, and he underestimated their strength and did not believe in it.

When I heard Choe Dong Hwa talking about the revolution being at an ebb, I felt the radical difference between the communists of the preceding generation and us. In the final analysis, it can be said that all the differences between them and us arose from our views of the popular masses. It was precisely because of that difference that we could not combine our efforts and were like strangers, although we shared the same ideal and aim. I said to Choe Dong Hwa:

"You may think it paradoxical, but I consider this moment, when the popular masses are advancing violently without yielding to the aggression of the Japanese imperialists, to be a period of a great upsurge in the revolution. We have decided to awaken and organize the masses immediately after the harvest struggle without missing the opportunity and thus take the anti-Japanese struggle onto a higher stage. No matter how the general trend of the times may change, my resolution will neither change nor waver."

Choe Dong Hwa could say no more and left in a bad temper.

Although people like Choe Dong Hwa were trying to stop us by talking about the disadvantages of revolutionary violence, we led the harvest struggle with confidence and without deviating in the least from the course we had chosen.

From September to the end of 1931 over 100,000 peasants in Jiandao waged a bloody struggle, refusing to yield in the face of the cruel suppression of the Japanese soldiers and policemen and the reactionary warlords.

In the course of this struggle many legendary incidents displaying the heroic mettle of the Korean nation took place. The story of the battle which the people of the Kaikou area fought against the Japanese and Manchurian soldiers and policemen on the ice of the River Tuman during the demonstration was an inspiration to the people in Manchuria.

The story of the dramatic end of Kim Sun Hui, a woman fighter, also emerged in the flames of the harvest and spring struggles. Kim Sun Hui was a member of the Red Guards in Yaksudong and a member of the harvest struggle committee there.

When some "punitive troops" appeared in Yaksudong, they asked her what she had in her stomach, poking her there with the muzzles of their rifles. It was near her time. Glaring at the Japanese soldiers from the garrison and policemen from the consulate as they surrounded her, she answered, "The best that can happen is that it will be a king, the worst that can happen is that it will be like you, who have to walk the street before the outer gate." This famous response amazed the enemy. Finally Kim Sun Hui even bit out her tongue to ensure that she would not betray the secret of the organization. She ended her precious blooming life at the age of 22 in the flames kindled by the enemy.

The harvest struggle ended in the victory of the peasants.

Through this struggle the people of east Manchuria gained confidence in victory. For the first time they realized that the victory of the struggle depended on the indomitable will of the masses themselves as well as on the method of guidance. They looked up, with their eyes full of wonder, at the young communists of the new generation who had led the harvest struggle to victory, and they rallied closely around them.

Through the victory of the harvest struggle the masses discovered why the May 30 Uprising had failed; they also discovered that the degree of violence employed could never be the main factor deciding the results of the struggle, and they came to believe this firmly. They all came to realize that, just as the cause of the failure of the May 30 Uprising did not lie in the fact that a small degree of violence was employed, so the factor determining the victory of the harvest struggle was not that a large degree of violence was employed. Violence was in no way omnipotent. It was merely a means to achieve an aim.

Only violence which is just, well-advised and timely and is used for a just purpose can promise victory for those who use it. Only such violence can make a genuine contribution to the transformation of society and the development of history. We support only such violence.

Everything depended on how the masses were mobilized, organized and led. The communists of the new generation created a model in this respect. The harvest struggle was a unique struggle. In this struggle we always held the initiative and kept the enemy on the defensive, closely linking an economic struggle with a political one and properly combining peaceful methods with violent ones. The struggle that was waged in the spring of the following year was also such a struggle.

Through the harvest struggle the solidarity between the Korean and Chinese peoples was strengthened and the revolutionary ties between the Korean and Chinese communists were consolidated.

The harvest struggle was a good occasion for awakening and hardening the popular masses. In the course of this struggle simple and ordinary people grew into fighters, into revolutionaries. The revolutionary organizations in east Manchuria were able to strengthen their ranks with many hard-core elements who had been trained in the harvest struggle. The creation of such core elements would also be of benefit in the armed struggle that would soon be launched.

The many young revolutionaries produced in the course of the harvest struggle became the backbone of the guerrilla units that were later formed in various parts of east Manchuria. While leading the harvest struggle, I continually developed my idea on the armed struggle. The mass heroism and indomitable fighting spirit of the people in east Manchuria that were displayed in the course of the struggle were a great encouragement to me as I sought the revolutionary line for a new stage. They instilled in me the confidence that the masses would always support and encourage us once we took up arms and waged a bloody battle against the Japanese imperialists.

In October 1931 when the flames of the harvest struggle were spreading to the whole of east Manchuria, I paid a brief visit to the Chongsong area in North Hamgyong Province. The aim of my visit was to meet my comrades who had been in the homeland to discuss with them the matter of an armed struggle and to recall the political workers active in the area of the six towns in order to give them some important tasks relating to the armed struggle. Chae Su Hang and O Bin accompanied me to Chongsong.

Chongsong was Chae Su Hang's home town; the home of his wife's parents was there. His deceased parents had lived there until the end of the Li dynasty. His great-grandfather had once worked as an adviser to the Chongsong County administration. It was immediately after the "annexation of Korea by Japan" that Chae Su Hang's family had left the homeland to move to Jingu, Helong County.

Chae Su Hang came of age in Jiandao, but he always longed for his home town where he had nurtured his childhood dreams. Whenever he crossed to Chongsong with me, he could not suppress his joy.

However, on that occasion he seemed very melancholy.

Thinking that the waves of the harvest struggle had reached Chae Su Hang's family, I asked him quietly:

"Comrade Chae, is it, perhaps, that your family, too, has been expropriated?" Chae Su Hang's family was rich. His father held the post of president of the Toksin Company, and for this he was disliked by the people.

"What do you mean by expropriated? Before the peasants demanded, we distributed to them 70 per cent of the grain right in the field."

"Oh, how different is the family of the county party secretary! But why do you look so sad?"

Chae said: "Some people have told me to try to persuade my father to give up his post as the company president. But my father will not agree."

Chae Su Hang did not know that his father held the post, having been entrusted by the revolutionary organization with it. His father could not tell him because of revolutionary discipline. Therefore, it was natural for Chae Su Hang to regret that his father would not comply with his request.

Having heard him out, I understood the reason for his feeling sick at heart. In those days there were some Leftists who were holding important positions in the higher party organizations. They indiscriminately imposed extreme demands upon their subordinates, demands which ran counter to the interests of the revolution, and thus put them in an awkward position. Once they went so far as to dismiss Chae Su Hang from his post of county party secretary, charging him with the "blame" for having failed to establish his class "demarcation" from that of his father; later they reinstated him.

I changed the topic of our conversation to that of the armed struggle in order to remove his melancholy.

Chae Su Hang said jokingly that if we formed an army he would be the first to join it and become a machine gunner.

"You are not fit to be a military officer. Comrade Chae, your gift is as a civil official," I said, also smiling.

Although I had spoken jokingly, I meant what I said. I considered him to be a born political worker. I am sure if he had remained alive long enough to join the revolutionary army, he would have become a political worker at regimental or divisional level.

When we were launching the armed struggle vigorously after founding the Guerrilla Army, he was killed at the hands of the Japanese "punitive troops" in the vicinity of Dalazi. O Bin was famous as a sportsman from his days at Tonghung Middle School in Longjing. He had once even won an ox as first prize in a wrestling contest at a sports meeting in Hunchun County. He was free and easy, cheerful and quick.

I regarded O Bin to be the type of a military officer who would be a brave soldier of the revolutionary army. Whenever I met people, I wondered what type of work in the revolutionary army would be suitable for each of them. I acquired this habit about then. It seems that the acute situation in those days when the anti-Japanese war was impending made me this "calculating man."

After crossing the River Tuman by boat from the Shijianping ferry we visited the beans selection ground of the Tonggwangjin Turyang Corporation. This corporation weighed the beans, which the Japanese imperialists had plundered from Manchuria, by dividing them into various grades before putting them into flax sacks and sending them to Japan by ship.

We disguised ourselves as day laborers from Jiandao and talked to the workers there, while giving them a helping hand.

On hearing that we were from Jiandao, the workers started to talk about the harvest struggle. Their view of this struggle was generally pessimistic. The worker' view was thus; "The many uprisings that broke out in Jiandao even before the Japanese imperialists' occupation of Manchuria ended in failure. Moreover, now that they have invaded Manchuria, will there be any chance of victory merely by waging such a struggle as the harvest struggle? In the final analysis, this struggle will without doubt meet the same destiny as the May 30 Uprising. It is useless to launch a struggle. Look! The Japanese army is winning victory after victory. On top of that, the international organization made up of the big powers also sides with the Japanese. There is no one on whom a small and weak nation can rely, is there?"

When I heard what the workers had to say I learned three lessons. One was that if a revolutionary were to know the public feeling well, he must always mix with the masses; another was that if he were to launch an armed struggle, he must first step up the work of awakening the masses politically and organizing them; and another was that no form of struggle could succeed unless the masses fully understood its importance and took part actively in it.

Having listened to the nihilistic and desperate views of the workers, I felt even more keenly that the Korean communists should start an armed struggle as soon as possible and give our nation the hope of rebirth and the hope of independence.

That day, in the house of Choe Song Hun, chairman of the Kwangmyong village youth association, we held a meeting of the underground political workers in the homeland and those in charge of underground organizations and discussed the task of the homeland revolutionary organizations with relation to the armed struggle.

I emphasized to those attending the meeting that the sudden change in the situation following the September 18 incident, as well as the historic lesson of the anti-Japanese national liberation movement in our country, urgently demanded that we should wage an organized armed struggle and that launching an armed struggle was a requirement of our revolutionary struggle and a qualitative advance in it. Then I set two major tasks, namely, the task of making full military preparations for the armed struggle and the task of laying a firm mass foundation for it.

Those attending the meeting could not conceal their excitement at the mention of an organized armed struggle, a very significant event; they made fiery speeches advancing creative opinions to help the formation of armed ranks.

The matter of preparing the revolutionary forces needed for organizing and waging an armed struggle had already been discussed and decided upon at the Kongsudok Meeting held in May 1931. So, on the basis of this, the Kwangmyong Village Meeting discussed the practical tasks confronting the revolutionary organizations in the homeland with something new, the armed struggles in the imminent future. This meeting tolled the bell announcing the armed struggle for the people and revolutionaries at home. The ready response which the revolutionaries at home expressed for the armed struggle in the course of the meeting gave me great strength.

After a day in Chongsong I returned to Jiandao and there parted from Chae Su Hang and O Bin. We decided to meet in Mingyuegou again in about the middle of December and there review the preparations for the armed struggle and discuss in detail ways to conduct the armed struggle and strategic and tactical matters relating to it.

Afterwards, my whole schedule was devoted to preparations for the Mingyuegou Meeting. At the mention of preparations for a meeting, what may first come to mind is such documents as a report and resolution. However, in those days the preparations for a meeting meant a process of laying down the revolutionary line and defining a strategy and tactics. Putting an idea into writing was a secondary process.

I devoted a lot of time to a consideration of the form to be chosen for the armed struggle. Marxist-Leninist theory emphasized the importance of an armed struggle. However, it provided no formal definition of the form in which the armed struggle should be waged. This is because there cannot be any ready-made solution which suits any era and can be applied in any country. In seeking a form for the armed struggle, I strove also not to be guilty of dogmatism.

Having made up my mind to deepen the consultation on the armed struggle and discuss tasks for coping with the new situation, I visited the east Manchuria Ad hoc committee in order to meet Dong Chang-rong. Since we intended to found the armed forces and start an anti-Japanese war in Manchuria, we could not ignore our cooperation with the Chinese communists. The question of an armed struggle was also coming to the fore among the Chinese communists in Manchuria. Following the September 18 incident the Communist Party of China and the Worker-Peasant Red Army of China addressed an appeal for the masses to be organized in resistance against the aggression of the Japanese imperialists so as to deal a direct blow at them by force of arms.

The Korean and Chinese communists who were aiming at the same target were confronted with the urgent task of forming an unbreakable, firm united front and cooperating closely with and supporting each other.

Dong Chang-rong, secretary of the Ad hoc committee, had narrowly escaped death in the "punitive operations" by the Japanese troops. I heard that he was staying in the city of Longjing and wanted to see me.

Because it was dangerous to go to that city where there were many secret agents, I sent word asking him to come to Mingyuegou.

However, the east Manchuria Ad hoc committee conveyed to me the news that Dong Chang-rong who was still unaware of the situation in Jiandao, had been wandering from place to place to inquire into the whereabouts of the Ad hoc committee, without knowing that it had moved, in the course of which he had been caught by secret agents and dragged off to prison. This unexpected news disappointed me. After the September 18 incident Luo Deng-xian, secretary of the Manchurian provincial party committee and Yang Lim, secretary of the military commission under the provincial party committee, left Shenyang and went into hiding, and Yang Jing-yu was still in prison. So there was no one with whom I could discuss matters.

I resolved to save Dong Chang-rong and consulted some comrades concerning a way to do so. Ko Bo Bae (Bo Bae is his nickname) volunteered to save Dong Chang-rong. Being extraordinarily quick with his hands, like a conjurer, he was good at "'stealing." He could in an instant remove the fountain-pen from the pocket of the man he was talking to. Because Ko Bo Bae was good at such tricks, everywhere he went there was trouble over something being "lost."

He went to Longjing and stole something so as to be arrested by the police. In prison he met Dong Chang-rong. There Ko Bo Bae handled the policemen so skillfully that the secretary of the Ad hoc committee was released before long. Thus he was able to attend the Mingyuegou Meeting.

Around the middle of December 1931 we convened the meeting of Party and YCL cadres in Mingyuegou. We called this meeting the "Winter Mingyuegou Meeting" for convenience. This meeting was attended by over 40 young fighters who enjoyed the love and reputation of the masses because of their devotion to the struggle. Among them were Cha Gwang Su, Lee Gwang, Chae Su Hang, Kim Il Hwan, Yang Song Ryong, O Bin, Oh Jung Hwa, Oh Jung Song, Ku Bong Un, Kim Chol, Kim Jung Gwon, Kim Ii Ryong, Li Chong San, Kim Jong Ryong, Han Il Gwang and Kim Hae San.

At Mingyuegou I tasted for the first time what they called yongchae kimchi. At supper on the day when I arrived at Mingyuegou, Li Chong San's family served me with kidney-bean-and-maize porridge and yongchae kimchi. I ate them with relish. The people of K. ilju and Myongchon, North Hamgyong Province, are good at pickling that kind of kimchi. Nowadays it is served even at dinners given by the state.

At the time of the Mingyuegou Meeting, Lee Gwang caught five pheasants for us. He had hunted them, together with some activists from the Young Communist League, because he was sorry to see that the delegates to the meeting had been eating only maize porridge and foxtail millet all the time.

For supper that evening Li Chong San had noodles prepared, saying that pheasant meat was good for garnishing noodles. Rice was scarce in the area of Mingyuegou, but starch was available there.

Cha Gwang Su, who was helplessly fond of noodles, boisterously teased Lee Gwang, saying, "Hey, old man from Wangqing, five pheasants are not enough to go round all of us, are they?" Cha Gwang Su, who suffered from chronic stomach trouble, used to eat very little, but among young people he would pretend to be very hungry, as if he were a great eater. "Don't talk so big, you from Jirin who cannot even eat a bowl of maize porridge," Lee Gwang retorted, jokingly. "Listen, you oaf. I'm exhausted, carrying those five pheasants on top of my load of cereal."

Cha Gwang Su argued vehemently, saying that, because the five pheasants would not be enough to go round all of us, the delegates should be divided into two rooms and that those in one room should be served with noodles garnished with pheasant and those in the other room with noodles garnished with chicken.

But the delegates all objected to his idea. We saw to it that the pheasant and chicken were mixed and that all the delegates ate convivially in the same room. Park Hun, a big eater, ate three bowls of noodles and earned the nickname of "noodle lover."

In order to ensure the meeting's success, we held a preliminary meeting at Li Chong San's house beforehand. At that meeting the agenda, the participants and the order of the meeting were discussed.

Then the meeting was held, lasting for 10 days. The discussion was concentrated on the problem of what form the armed struggle should take. It was only when this problem was settled that it would be possible to decide other matters, such as the form of the armed organization and that of the base.

Because we had no country, resistance by a regular army could not be expected. Yet conditions were not ripe for all the people to be mobilized immediately for an uprising. In these circumstances it was only natural that my mind was drawn to guerrilla warfare. Lenin defined guerrilla warfare as an auxiliary form of the struggle which is inevitably adopted either when the mass movement has already become an uprising or when there is a midway period between major battles in a civil war. I very much regretted that Lenin regarded guerrilla warfare as a temporary and auxiliary form of struggle instead of regarding it as the basic form. This was because it was not regular warfare but guerrilla warfare which I was interested in at that time.

I thought a great deal about whether guerrilla warfare by a standing revolutionary armed force would suit the circumstances in our country, should we choose guerrilla warfare as the basic form of the armed struggle. In the course of this I read Sun Tzu's Art of War and reread the Three Warring Kingdoms. Among our country's books on military science I read such books as the Military Books of the Eastern Country and Instructions on Military Science.

Some people said that the origin of guerrilla warfare dated back to the 4th century A.D. However, we did not know in what country and how that guerrilla war was waged.

The guerrilla warfare which Marx and Engels studied with the greatest interest was the activities of the armed units of the Russian peasants during the Franco-Russian war of 1812. The story of Denis Davidov, a partisan hero born of the Franco-Russian war, and of General Kutuzov who skillfully commanded the combined operations of the regular units and guerrillas, fanned my curiosity about guerrilla warfare.

The Imjin Patriotic War<sup>22</sup> gave me many ideas concerning a definition of guerrilla warfare as the basic form of our struggle. I regarded the struggle of the volunteers who won a glorious victory in the Imjin Patriotic War as an example holding an outstanding place in the history of guerrilla warfare. I was totally fascinated by the bravery displayed and the varied fighting methods employed by the famous generals who emerged from among the volunteers such as Kwak Jae U, Sin Dol Sok, Kim Ung So, Chong Mun Bu, Saint Sosan, Choe Ik Hyon and Ryu Rin Sok. The words guerrilla warfare gripped my heart with the approach of the great battle against the heavily-armed Japanese imperialists.

However, some people said that a guerrilla war could be waged only when there was a home front or support from a regular army. This presented me with a problem. These preconditions laid down in the classics of Marxism-Leninism forced me to go through a complicated process of inquiry to choose the form of the armed struggle. No one could decide whether a guerrilla war would be possible, given the circumstances of Korea which had no home front or regular army. It was a serious and controversial issue for us.

Successive dramatic incidents pushing us towards revolution occurred around us. Military disturbances took place among the patriotic officers and men of the former Northeast Army who were displeased by the capitulation of Chiang Kaisek and Zhang Xue-liang. Wang De-lin, Tang Ju-wu and Li Du did not follow Zhang Xue-liang they all altered course and left the former Northeast Army. General Ma Zhanshan created a military disturbance and then took up arms, calling for resistance to Japan. With these people as the center the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units were formed and the movement of the national salvation army began in various parts of Manchuria.

This situation created favorable circumstances for us who were aspiring to an armed struggle.

I spoke to the following effect: So far as the form of the armed struggle is concerned, there has been regular warfare and guerrilla warfare throughout history. Regular warfare has been predominant, but guerrilla warfare has also been employed. We must choose one of these two forms. I am of the opinion that guerrilla warfare will be more suitable to the situation in our country. Under the conditions in our country where regular warfare is impossible, guerrilla warfare should be the main form of our struggle, irrespective of what has been happening until now.

Then I said, "Constantly-varying guerrilla warfare is the main form of the armed struggle which we must choose. In our country which has lost its statehood, it is impossible to oppose the Japanese imperialists by waging regular warfare. We must wage constantly-varying guerrilla warfare because we must fight the powerful Japanese imperialist aggressor army with an armed force which is inferior both in military equipment and in numbers. There can be no other way than this."

The young people who had seen only the warlord army of Zhang Xue-liang, the Independence Army and the Japanese army knew nothing about a guerrilla army.

After explaining the difference between a regular army and a guerrilla army, I went on: "If we are to beat the strong Japanese aggressor army, we must conduct every type of military, political and economic activity, such as superb combined operations by small and large units, surprise attacks, ambushes, political activities, political underground work and production activities. To this end we should form a guerrilla army that is capable of waging war constantly and of freely dispersing and concentrating its soldiers."

After hearing me some people expressed doubts: Will it be possible to defeat the enemy by waging such a form of the armed struggle? Will it be possible to beat, with an irregular armed force such as a guerrilla army, an army several millions strong equipped with modern, highly efficient weapons such as tanks, artillery and warplanes when we will have to fight without any home front or the support of a regular army, and in a foreign territory at that?

It was not unreasonable for them to express such doubts. As a matter of fact, I myself had considered such a possibility many times.

I thought: Will we not be exposed to the ridicule of the world if we, with only a few guns, dare to oppose such a military power as Japan? All of the Righteous Volunteers, the Independence Army and the 300,000-strong army of Zhang Xue-liang have not been able to escape the fate of being beaten by the great strength of the Japanese army. So, what shall we be relying on when we try to defeat them? Have we state power, territory or wealth? I said to them:

"We are the sons of mined people who have been deprived of all their state power, territory and resources. We are empty-handed young people who are now living in a foreign country. However, we have not hesitated to challenge the Japanese imperialists. What is it we are relying on in doing so? We have decided to start an anti-Japanese war by relying on the people. The people are the state, the people are the home front and the people are the regular army. When the war starts, the people will become soldiers and rise up. Therefore, the guerrilla warfare which we shall wage can be called a people's war."

Thus after a long argument we reached complete agreement on the matter of organizing and waging an armed struggle with guerrilla warfare as its basis.

Guerrilla warfare is a method of armed struggle with which one can deal heavy political and military blows to the enemy while preserving one's own forces and annihilate, with a small force, an enemy who is superior both in numbers and equipment. We firmly believed that we would ultimately be able to defeat the enemy if we organized and waged an armed struggle by relying on guerrilla warfare, the active support and encouragement of the popular masses and the favorable natural and topographical conditions.

When all others regarded guerrilla warfare as a means of helping regular warfare, we confirmed it as the basic form of our struggle and adopted it as our policy. This was a scientific and creative decision commensurate with our situation. When our consultation on waging an organized armed struggle with guerrilla warfare as the basis was over, we discussed ways of conducting it.

First the problem of building a revolutionary armed force was brought up for discussion. We decided to organize first a small-scale guerrilla unit for each area and gradually develop them into a revolutionary armed force consisting of large units while fighting to arm these units. We also agreed that we would form battalions at the first stage and expand them gradually into a people's revolutionary army. Following this the way to obtain arms was also discussed.

The discussion on the formation of a guerrilla army gave way for one on bases. We put the following questions: If an anti-Japanese guerrilla army is formed, where should the base for its operations be? Should it be on a mountain, in a city or in a rural village? Now that both Korea and Manchuria are under the occupation of the Japanese imperialists, should the base for guerrilla warfare be in the homeland or in Manchuria? We exchanged serious views on these problems.

That there must be a stronghold for any army is simple common sense which even a primary school pupil knows.

Our armed forces had to fight without any home front and without the support of a regular army. Therefore, only when there was a base where we could rest securely after battle while putting our ranks in good order, replenishing our weapons and ammunition, carrying out military training and giving medical treatment to the wounded soldiers, would we be able to wage a guerrilla war for a long time. Therefore, we had to build a base at the same time as forming a guerrilla army.

At the end of an animated discussion we decided to build a guerrilla base in the mountainous areas of Jiandao where there was a good mass foundation, fine supply conditions and favorable terrain. We decided to establish a base first in Jiandao for the time being because in Manchuria with its wide area the enemy's rule was spread more thinly than in Korea. And we agreed that when the time came, we would go into the homeland and occupy the wide forest area of Mt. Paekdu and the Rangnim Mountains.

The form of the liberated area, the area where the enemy's rule could not reach, had to be the main form of the base and we had to establish that base without fail in the mountainous areas along the River Tuman which were convenient for us both in conducting our operations into the homeland and in getting support from the people there. Along the River Tuman there were many mountain villages providing good conditions for supplying materials and unfavorable for the enemy to attack but favorable for us to defend ourselves. When we started to choose real places for establishing our base Lee Gwang, Oh Bin, Kim Li Hwan and many others vied with one another in advancing many good opinions.

According to their proposal it was decided to establish the base in such natural strongholds as Yulangclin, Niufudong, Wangougou, Hailangou, Shirengou, SandaOwan, Xiaowangqing, Gayahe, Yaoyinggou, DahuanggOu and Yantonglazi. In those areas were concentrated the revolutionary masses who had gone there after the harvest struggle to avert the "punitive operations" of the Japanese imperialists even the Red Guards had been formed there and were defending the revolutionary organizations and the people.

As the discussion deepened and became more detailed, the matter was raised of operating and maintaining the base for a long time; there were many complicated practical problems such as how to conduct agricultural production and manage the economy, how to build an ordnance repair shop and a hospital and who should take charge of population administration and how to conduct this work.

At the meeting we also discussed the matters of laying a mass foundation for the armed struggle and forming an anti-Japanese joint front of the Korean and Chinese peoples, as well as the problem of strengthening party organizational work and the work of the YCL. All these were important problems which had to be solved in order to wage an armed struggle with guerrilla warfare as the major tactic. At the meeting all these matters were formulated as a policy.

It was truly gigantic and unfathomable creative work. There was no history of guerrilla warfare in any era or in any country which could provide something to serve as a model for our revolutionary struggle. Therefore, we had to think over all the problems by using our own brains and establish the base by our own efforts. It was an unavoidable task for us Korean communists who had to wage a guerrilla war in unprecedented arduous conditions without any home front or the support of any regular army.

If, in solving this task, we had dogmatically copied the experience of other countries which had waged a guerrilla war in combination with a regular army, regarding its support as essential, we would have met with failure.

One year a Latin-American resistance fighter came to see me and asked me to tell him about our experience in waging a guerrilla war.

I told him about some of the experience we had gained during our anti-Japanese war and said: "There cannot be a universal formula in guerrilla warfare. That is a creative struggle in which the creative wisdom of man should be displayed to the highest degree. Our experience may be of some help to you, but you must not regard it as absolute and adopt it mechanically. Circumstances differ from country to country. So you, too, create and apply fighting methods and forms which are suitable in your situation. The key to victory lies precisely in that."

After listening to me, the leader of the resistance movement thought over something for a while and then spoke to the following effect: There are many mountainous areas in our country. However, until now we have put too much stress on guerrilla warfare in the towns without taking this into consideration. It is probably for this reason that we have achieved little success and suffered much loss. From now on we will conduct our resistance movement with a guerrilla war in the mountainous rural areas as our major tactic, in conformity with our situation.

We wound up our discussion at Mingyuegou after reaching an agreement on starting the formation of guerrilla units immediately upon our return to our respective areas of activity following the meeting. Whenever they had lost their kinsmen and comrades owing to the bloody suppression and "punitive operations" of the Japanese imperialist aggressors. The young people beat their chests and craved for our army, for our armed forces. And now that they could see the birth of this army, these armed forces, as something to happen in the near future, these young people rose up all at once and solemnly and loudly sang the Revolutionary Song and the Internationale, expressing their oath to their beloved fatherland and revolution.

The Mingyuegou Meeting was also attended by Dong Changrong and many other Chinese communists. They were farsighted revolutionaries who had from the start attached great importance to the friendship between the Korean and Chinese peoples and cooperation between the Korean and Chinese communists in view of the specific situation in east Manchuria where the Korean communists and residents formed the overwhelming majority.

Dong Chang-rong repeatedly requested that the Korean comrades who had fought for a long time in east Manchuria and accumulated a lot of experience should make major speeches. With the subjects under discussion at the meeting as the main point, I made an inflammatory speech in Korean and Chinese about our idea of forming armed ranks and waging an armed struggle.

Our Chinese comrades expressed their full support for this idea. They were of the same opinion as us on all matters such as that of the form of the guerrilla warfare, that of forming a guerrilla army and that of a guerrilla base.

From that time on the armed struggle of the Korean and Chinese peoples against the Japanese imperialists, their common enemy, shook the continent, and the tradition of great Korea-China friendship started to strike root amid a bloody battle.

The Winter Mingyuegou Meeting of 1931 marked the start of the anti-Japanese armed struggle; it was a historic meeting that brought about a fresh turn in the anti-Japanese national liberation movement and communist movement in our country. The line of the armed struggle advanced at the Kalun Meeting was developed in depth through this meeting.

If the will of the Korean nation to switch from the anti-Japanese national liberation movement to an armed struggle, its highest stage, was confirmed in Kalun, in Mingyuegou that will was reaffirmed and an anti-Japanese war was formally proclaimed with a view to annihilating the Japanese imperialists under the slogan "Oppose armed force with armed force, and resist counterrevolutionary violence with revolutionary violence!" At this meeting the main point of the strategy defining the direction of the guerrilla war and of its tactical principles was defined and, on the basis of this, immensely rich and varying methods of armed struggle were created.

After the Mingyuegou Meeting Dong Chang-rong and I talked about many things while we sat under a white rock. I think it was at that time that I heard from him about Kim Lee Gap who was then in Dalian prison and Chon Gyong Suk who was supplying him with clothes and food while working at a textile mill and doing YCL work.

Dong Chang-rong said that an analysis of the composition of not only the population but also the members of the party organizations in east Manchuria showed that the greater part of them was Koreans, and asked me to help him on their behalf.

He said: "The main force of the revolutionary struggle in east Manchuria is the Koreans. The guerrilla war can be victorious only when we rely on the Korean residents. No matter how hard Japan may try to alienate us, the communists of our two countries will be able to prevent national prejudice. The Ad hoc committee intends to pay special attention to working with its Korean comrades, so we wish you to give us great help. I believe in you, Comrade Kim Il Sung."

Gladly I granted his request.

I said: "We are also particularly concerned about the unity of our two nations. So set your mind at rest. The gun report of the guerrilla war will end all the temporary mistrust between the Korean and Chinese peoples."

We gripped each other's hands and smiled.

Afterwards Dong Chang-rong and I often recollected that day.

Whenever I visited China Premier Zhou En-lai said, in his banquet speeches or in his talks with me, that Korea-China friendship had developed onto a high stage through the founding of the Anti-Japanese Guerrilla Army at the beginning of the 1930s and through the joint struggle of the Korean and Chinese armed forces against the Japanese imperialists. He spoke a lot of moving words about the deep-rooted tradition of that friendship.

Each time he said this I thought of the Mingyuegou Meeting and its heated atmosphere of Korea-China friendship, and I recollected with great emotion our intimate Chinese communist friends such as Wei Zheng-min, Dong Chang-rong, Chen Han-zhang, Wang De-tai, Zhang Wei-hua, Yang Jing-yu, Zhou Bao-zhong and Hu Jin-min who joined us in the flames of the war. A feeling of friendship is a human feeling. Therefore, it can be firm only when it is established through concrete human relations, and it seems that the feeling that has been established in such a way will not cool no matter how much time passes.

5.4. Preparations for a Bloody Battle

---

After we had adopted the decision to wage an organized armed struggle at the Mingyuegou Meeting, I was requested to play the pivotal role in the work. "A start should be made by you, Kim Il Sung. In any work there must be a model and an example." With these words my comrades parted from me. I remained in Mingyuegou until those who had attended the meeting had all left, and then I went to Antu after parting from Dong Chang-rong. Antu was in all respects suitable for guerrilla warfare.

We decided to establish the basic forces of the organization in Antu and Wangqing, in view of the fact that in forming the armed groups priority should be given to work with the national salvation army, the Chinese anti-Japanese armed forces, formed in different parts of Manchuria after the September 18 incident, as was decided in December at the Mingyuegou Meeting. The national salvation army was massed in Antu and Wangqing.

Returning to Xinglongcun, I stayed in Ma Chun Uk's house for a while with my family and then moved to Kalbat village in Tuqidian valley in Xiaoshahe. There I concentrated on the preparations for founding the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. The circumstances in Xiaoshahe were better than in Xinglongcun because the people of Xiaoshahe were enlisted in organizations. Secret agents had no free access to the village where the underground organization had struck deep roots.

Because there were no running dogs sneaking about in Xiaoshahe, the army and police rarely ever came there for "punitive operations." Our efforts to found the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army faced difficulties from the beginning. The questions of cadres, weapons, military drill, provisions, the mass foundation and relations with the national salvation army, as well as many other questions of a military and political character, were raised and awaiting solution.

In forming the armed units we considered cadres and weapons as the most essential two elements. But we were short of them both. By cadres we mean those who were prepared militarily and politically. We needed young people who understood politics and military affairs and were ready to fight in arms for the country and people for a long time.

We had lost almost all the core elements of the Korean Revolutionary Army in a year and a half. The main force of the revolutionary army, including Kim Hyok, Kim Hyong Gwon, Choe Hyo Il, Kong Yong, Li Je U and Park Cha Sok fell in action or were thrown into prison within a year. On top of that, in January 1931 Li Jong Rak who was a company commander was arrested together with Kim Gwang Ryol, Chang So Bong and Park Byong Hwa by the police of the Japanese consulate when he went out to obtain weapons, Carrying pamphlets concerning the Korean Revolutionary Army. Kim Lee Gap, who was versed in military affairs, was imprisoned and Pack Sin Han fell in action. There was no knowing what had become of Choe Chang Gol and Kim Won U.

There were so few among the rest of the revolutionary army who had military experience that they could be counted on the fingers of both hands. But because they were conducting mass political work, they could not be included in the armed units. When I was busy forming the guerrilla units in Antu, Cha Gwang Su was the only person from the Korean Revolutionary Army who stood by me.

Those holding state power could easily find the military personnel they needed through a mobilization order or a system of obligatory military service, but we could not recruit men by such methods. The masses cannot be enlisted in the revolution by law or by force. The Provisional Government in Shanghai included in its constitution an article stating that all the citizens were under an obligation to pay taxes and undergo military service, but the people did not even know that such law had been adopted.

It is self-evident that the decrees and directives of a government in exile which exercised state power in one corner of a concession in a foreign country, without national sovereignty, were ineffective.

In the national liberation revolution in colonies it is impossible to make people take up arms by means such as a mobilization order or a system of obligatory military service. In the revolution the appeal of the leader of the revolution or farsighted people replaces the law, and the political and moral awareness and militant enthusiasm of each man decides his voluntary entry into the army.

The masses take up arms for their liberation of their own accord without the request or direction of anyone else. It is an act natural to the people who regard independence as their lifeblood and are ready to devote their lives to it.

Based on this principle, we began to search for people to be enlisted in the guerrilla unit in Antu and the surrounding area. In the paramilitary organizations such as the Red Guards, the Children's Vanguard, the worker pickets and the local shock brigades there were many sturdy young people who wanted to join the army. Paramilitary organizations grew fast and young people were awakened ideologically beyond recognition in the stormy harvest and spring struggles.

But it was impossible to enlist into the guerrilla unit anyone who requested to be enlisted in it without our considering his preparedness. The young and middle-aged men of east Manchuria were not yet prepared militarily. To ensure a guerrilla reserve it was necessary to intensify the political and military training of the young people in the paramilitary organizations such as the Red Guards and Children's Vanguard.

But I had no suitable drill instructors. I alone could not conduct military drill for all the young people in the Antu area. Though I had attended Whasung Military Academy for some time, I was not qualified to command a new type of army, a guerrilla army. Cha Gwang Su, who was fresh from school, knew less about military affairs than I did. As Li Jong Rak was in prison, I had no one to whom I could look for help. If I had had the like of Li Jong Rak, I could have devoted all my time to political work, entrusting military affairs entirely to him, but being unable to do so, I was anxious.

Whenever I had difficulties I felt the shortage of comrades.

While we were experiencing these difficulties, we were visited by Park Hun, a famous graduate of the Huangpu Military Academy. Chiang Kaisek was the commandant of the military academy and Zhou Enlai was in charge of political affairs there. The academy was attended by many young Koreans. The Chinese people called the Guangzhou revolt the "three days' soviet," and a leading part in it was played by the cadres of that military academy. Park Hun and An Bung took part in the Guangzhou revolt and, after its failure, fled to Manchuria from China proper. Park Hun was of sturdy constitution and free and open in his speech and behavior; he was every inch a soldier. He spoke Chinese more often than Korean and wore Chinese dress more than Korean. He became my military adviser.

After the collaboration of the Kuomintang and the Communist Party had broken down because of Chiang Kaisek's betrayal of the revolution in the April 12 incident, and the first revolutionary war had ended in failure, Yang Lim, Choi Yong Kun, O Song Ryun (Chon Gwang), Chang Ji Rak, Park Hun and many of those who took part in the Chinese revolution after graduating from the Huangpu Military Academy, the Guangzhou Military Academy and the Yunnan Military Training School came to Manchuria from the southern area of China to avoid the reprisals of the Chiang Kaisek clique.

Frankly speaking, I expected much from Park Hun when I heard the name of the Huangpu Military Academy. Park Hun had the special skill of shooting with pistols in both hands in battle. His marksmanship was remarkable. He shot like a devil. Another of his special skills was in giving commands. He had a splendid voice capable of easily commanding an army ten or twenty thousand strong without using a megaphone. When he shouted commands on the tableland of Tuqidian the whole village heard him. Intrigued by his commanding voice, all the young people of Antu looked on him with fascination.

"His voice is so stentorian that even the Japanese Emperor in Tokyo can hear it. Where did such a man come from?" said Cha Gwang Su in admiration, when he saw Park Hun conducting military training for the Red Guards. Cha Gwang Su took a great liking to him. The two men were close friends though there was a lot of theoretical argument between them.

Because Park Hun imparted such good training in Antu, the unit we formed was later famed as a "student unit" in Wangqing. The members of our guerrilla unit were respected by the people for their good order and discipline, good manners and good appearance throughout the whole of the anti-Japanese war. Yang Jing-yu, too, always admired our revolutionary army for its discipline and cultured manners. At such times I always thought of Park Hun and his words of command resounding across the tableland in Tuqidian.

His next conspicuous quality as a drill instructor was his rigid demands on his trainees. The trainees acquired military knowledge quickly due to his rigid demands. But at times he punished the members of the unit. When trainees failed to perform the drill as he required, or violated discipline, he hurled abuse at them as he glowered at them, kicked them or made them stand aside as a punishment. I said to him that punishment was unacceptable in a revolutionary army, but to no avail.

One day as I returned home with Park Hun, whose voice had become husky after conducting drill, I asked him, "You have something of the warlords about you. Where did you get it?" At this he looked at me with a smile and said, "Our drill instructor was a German and a martinet. It might be the legacy I acquired from him. Anyway, the rod makes a good soldier of a man."

He retained many traces of his German military education. In his lectures he spent a great deal of time talking about the Prussian army. He talked much about the bravery of the British soldier, the promptness of the French soldier, the exactitude of the German soldier and the stubbornness of the Russian soldier. Whenever he talked about them, he called on the trainees to become versatile soldiers with all these qualities.

Most of the military training he conducted was not suited to the special type of guerrilla warfare we planned. He explained to the trainees about the Napoleonic column formation and the British line formation and made a tremendous effort to make such formations with 20 or so trainees.

At the training I once said to him quietly during a break, "Comrade Park, what about replacing the drill in the British line formation you just conducted with a short explanation? If we were to fight a battle such as Waterloo, it would be another matter. But we are intending to wage a guerrilla war in the mountains against an enemy armed with cannons and machine guns. So what is the use of learning outmoded tactics?"

"But in order to wage a war one must have at least some military knowledge, I believe," he said.

"Of course, it is important to acquire a general knowledge of the military experience of other countries, but it is necessary to select and teach what is of immediate use. You would do better not to teach them all you learned at the military academy."

By saying this to Park Hun I meant that he should guard against dogmatism.

When I gave Park Hun charge of ten or so red guardsmen and told him to make them practice their shooting, he had targets set up on the level ground and told them repeatedly to shoot at the lower part of the center of the enemy when he appeared.

I said to Park Hun, "It will not do to conduct drill that way. We must put aside what does not suit the actual situation and first teach what will be useful in a guerrilla war. Specifically, we must give priority to training in mountain warfare. Let us change what does not suit our condition and, by pooling our wisdom, work out fresh tactics that are not found in the manuals."

He listened to me attentively and acceded to my suggestion.

From then on we conducted drill with the emphasis on what would be useful in a guerrilla war. We began with imparting a practical military knowledge as to foot drill, the use of arms, camouflage, signaling, bayonet drill, reconnaissance, mountain walking, the handling of a club, capturing arms and the discrimination between friends and foe at night. Park Hun at first taught things in a happy-go-lucky fashion, but finally he drew up a teaching schedule and conducted drill according to a plan.

Looking back on those days later, Park Hun said, "At the Huangpu Military Academy I acquired the military knowledge accumulated by the five great military powers of the world. It was comprehensive knowledge crystallizing the tactics used in all ages and by all countries. I took pride in having gained such a knowledge at the famous Huangpu Military Academy, an edifice of military education in modern China.

If I disseminate that knowledge in east Manchuria, people will greet me with wild applause, I thought. But I was proved wrong. I was given the cold shoulder instead of wild applause. The young people regarded my lectures as imparting common sense, but not as having any vital and essential significance. I realized that the military knowledge I had acquired over several years was useless for guerrilla warfare, although it was universal, and was disgusted with myself for regarding it as a code of universal significance. I realized the need to create a new military theory for a guerrilla war. So I rid myself of dogmatism and acquired a new way of thinking suited to the Korean revolution."

Another conspicuous drill instructor in the Antu area was Kim Il Ryong. He had no knowledge of modern warfare to speak of, as Park Hun did, but persistently trained the men by relying on the practical experience of war he had acquired in the Independence Army.

With the training in the Red Guards, Children's Vanguard, Children's Expeditionary Corps and other paramilitary organizations being intensified and their ranks built up, dozens of reliable young people who were prepared politically and militarily were rallied around us. We selected those who were working in the various counties along the River Tuman and the young people tempered and seasoned in the harvest and spring struggles and called them together in Antu. Many young people came to us from different parts of Manchuria, including Antu and Dunhua.

We selected 18 of them as core elements, including Cha Gwang Su, Kim Il Ryong, Park Hun, Kim Chol (Kim Chol Hui) and Li Yong Bae and formed them into a guerrilla group. At the same time we saw to it that similar armed groups were formed in the Yanji, Wangqing, Helong and Hunchun areas. As a result, armed groups comprising between 10 and 20 men came into being in succession in each county. This was the line adopted at the Mingyuegou Meeting, that of forming small armed groups, obtaining weapons and accumulating experience through stealthy activities, increasing the ranks and forming large armed groups in each county when the situation was right. The formation of these guerrilla groups was attended with a bloody struggle to acquire weapons. The struggle was beset with great difficulties.

The Japanese aggressor army steadily increased the fighting ability of their ground, sea and air forces by supplying them with modern arms and other equipment mass-produced in their own country, whereas we had no home front to provide weapons nor money to buy rifles. What we needed was not cannons and tanks but, for the time being, rifles, pistols, grenades and other light arms. If our country had had factories producing weapons, we could have acquired them with the help of the workers. But our country did not have such factories. Unfortunately, in arming ourselves we did not benefit from the industry of our country. That was why the grim slogan "Let's take the enemy's weapons and arm ourselves!" was adopted.

On returning to Antu I dug up from the ground the two pistols which my father had entrusted to my mother. I said to my comrades, as I held up the two pistols: "Look, these are the pistols my father left for me. My father did not serve in the Righteous Volunteers or in the Independence Army, but he had these pistols with him until the day of his death. Why? Because he considered the armed struggle to be the highest form of struggle to achieve national independence.

My father's desire was to launch an armed struggle. When he left me these two pistols, I made a firm resolve to do what he desired in his place. The time has come. Let us start our march for independence with these two pistols to help us. Now we have two pistols, but think that one day they will have multiplied to two hundred, two thousand and then to twenty thousand. With 2,000 rifles, we will be fully able to liberate the country. Let us multiply these two pistols into two thousand and then twenty thousand rifles."

I felt a lump in my throat at the thought that my father had died an early death without realizing his aspiration, and I could speak no more.

When the acquisition of arms was placed on the list of priorities, Park Hun told me that he had heard that a son of a rich family in Fusong had given dozens of rifles to me and asked me what I had done with them. Who he meant by the son of a rich family in Fusong was Zhang Wei-hua. When we were active in Wujiazi, he had visited us, bringing with him 40 rifles of the private soldiers at his house. We handed them out to the men of the Korean Revolutionary Army.

Park Hun, on hearing of this, said that it was a great pity, and that the only solution was to get money. He proposed to raise money by appealing to the peasants in the villages we had made revolutionary.

We did not agree. If we had raised funds by appealing to the rich people, it was another matter. But depriving the poor workers and peasants of their money was not a good way to buy weapons. The easy way to obtain weapons was to raise money, but they should also be taken from the enemy, at the risk of one's life.

We chose the difficult way. I thought that we might buy weapons but I did not encourage this. To ask the people for money was the way of the Independence Army, not our way. Even if we had raised money, it would not have helped us much. Once Comrade Choe Hyon had bought a machine gun for 1,500 yuan from some mountain rebels. One machine gun cost thirty oxen at market prices in those days when an ox was priced at about 50 yuan. We could not ignore such a figure.

After much discussion we went to Naidaoshan and dug up some rifles buried there by men of the Independence Army. In other counties, too, weapons which had been used by the Independence Army were collected in a similar fashion. The Independence Army under the command of Hong Bom Do had buried many rifles and a lot of ammunition in the Dakanzi area after the Battle of Qingshanli and retreated across the border separating the Soviet Union and Manchuria.

Informed of this through its secret agents, the Japanese garrison carried away a lot of rifles and ammunition, loading them on to dozens of lorries. Our comrades in Wangqing sent people to Dakanzi after the Mingyuegou Meeting to recover about 50,000 cartridges from the place where the Japanese garrison had been digging. Having acquired some rifles, we went over to taking weapons away from the enemy with their use.

The house of landlord Shuang Bing-jun was chosen as the target of our first attack. He had a guard of about 40 men. Its captain was Li Do Son who later became the notorious captain of the Sinsondae Band which was routed by Comrade Choe Hyon's unit. The guardroom was both inside and outside the earthen wall which surrounded the landlord's house.

We formed an assault team with the members of the guerrilla group and Red Guards and took over ten rifles in a raid on the landlord's house in Xiaoshahe after preliminary scouting. The struggle to obtain arms was waged vigorously in a mass movement all along the River Tuman. The revolutionary masses, irrespective of age and sex, with members of the guerrilla group, the Red Guards, the Children's Vanguard and the local shock brigands in the van, waged a brave battle against the Japanese aggressor army, the Japanese and Manchukuo police, the pro-Japanese landlords and the reactionary bureaucrats to take their weapons from them under the slogan "Arms are our lifeblood. Arms for arms!"

At the time the phrase "Yochang puyomin" was in vogue. It means: Off with your gun, not your head! When one shouted "Yochang puyomin," pointing a gun at a customhouse, guardhouse, police station or landlord's house, the timid officials, reactionary landlords and police offered their weapons, trembling. The phrase "Yochang puyomin" was used widely and spread across the areas by the revolutionary organizations in east Manchuria.

Oh Jung Hwa's father O Tae Hui and his uncle, too, took weapons from policemen and guardsmen, threatening them with a bogus gun made of a table's leg and shouting "Yochang puyomin!" at them; these weapons they sent to the Red Guards. News of this spread to Antu. On hearing the story, we admired the old men's wit and boldness.

When I met old man O Tae Hui later in Wangqing, I asked him, "How did you come up with such a good idea?" The old man said with a smile, "At night a table's leg looks like a gun. We have no rifle or grenade. So I used a bogus gun made of a table's leg. At my wits end, I hit on the idea. There is the saying 'A thirsty man digs a well,' isn't there?"

He was right. Then we threw ourselves boldly into the fight to take weapons like thirsty men digging a well. It was an arduous struggle requiring the highest degree of creativity and wisdom.

The revolutionaries and revolutionary people of east Manchuria took weapons by cleverly disguising themselves as military police, men of the national salvation army, officials of the Japanese consulate, rich men or merchants, as the situation required. In some places women attacked soldiers and policemen with their laundry paddles or clubs and seized their weapons.

The struggle to obtain arms was a prelude to an all-people war of resistance. All the revolutionary organizations and the entire people roused themselves to the struggle and enlisted in it. As the revolution required arms, the masses came out in the struggle to obtain them without hesitation. In the course of this they were awakened ideologically, and they came to realize how great their strength was.

Our slogan that one should obtain weapons for oneself proved its great vitality everywhere. Needless to say, in the course of struggle we lost many revolutionary comrades. Each rifle we obtained was imbued with the warm blood and the ardent patriotism of our revolutionary comrades.

At the same time we launched the struggle to make weapons for ourselves under the slogan of self-reliance.

At first we made spears and swords at smithies. Then we made pistols and bombs. The most elaborate and useful pistol we made was the "pijikkae pistol" which was manufactured by the members of the AJYL in Nangou, Wangqing County. People in North Hamgyong Province called a match a "pijikkae," like the Russians. They made powder from matches and put it in the cartridge chamber. Hence the name of the pistol they made. They also made the barrels of rifles with sheet steel.

Famous among the arsenals of east Manchuria were the Suribawigul Arsenal in Xinchengde Hill in Jingu, Helong County, the Nangou Arsenal in Wangqing County and the Chugagol Arsenal in Nanyang village in Yilangou, Yanji County.

The Suribawigul Arsenal made bombs with powder obtained by the revolutionary organization in a mine in Badaogou, Yanji County. At first they made noise bombs. They exploded with a thundering sound, but their killing capacity was slight. Next they made chili bombs, an improved version. They were better than the noise bombs but they merely emitted a disgusting smell and were not very effective.

Later comrades in Helong made some effective bombs with iron shrapnel instead of chili powder. These were the famous Yanji bombs. After the appearance of the Yanji bombs we summoned Park Yong Sun from Helong and held a two-day bomb-making course in Dafangzi in Xiaowangqing to disseminate bomb-making techniques to different parts of east Manchuria. The short course was attended by people from the arsenals and the commanders of guerrilla units in different counties.

On the first day of the short course I gave a lecture on the manufacture of gunpowder. The arsenals of the guerrilla units were using powder which was obtained secretly from mines to make bombs.

This method of acquisition was always dangerous because the enemy exercised rigid control over powder. We succeeded in manufacturing powder with the powder materials that were readily available in private houses. The short course taught the skill of powder-making to those attending it so that it could be widely introduced in different areas.

Park Yong Sun lectured on the manufacture, use, keeping and handling of bombs. The story of how they made bombs for themselves in Helong aroused the admiration of the people attending the short course. Park Yong Sun and Son Won Gum who managed the Suribawigul Arsenal were particularly talented. Later the arsenal became a reliable weapons-producing and repair base for the Korean People's Revolutionary Army and made a great contribution to the anti-Japanese war.

If a writer were to collect episodes about the unexcelled spirit of self-sacrifice, boldness, wit and creativity our people displayed in their struggle for arms and give a vivid portrayal of them, it would make an epic story. A simple people who had been worked hard as cheap labor for tens of thousand years, plunged in the darkness of ignorance and illiteracy and were suffering the sorrow of a stateless nation shedding tears of blood, deeming it to be their fate, finally embarked on the path of the noble liberation struggle to forge their own destiny.

Whenever I saw the weapons the local organizations acquired or manufactured I noted with pride that our determination to clear the way for the Korean revolution by believing in the strength of our people and depending on it was quite right.

We paid special attention to laying a mass foundation for the anti-Japanese armed struggle while pushing ahead with the preparations for building active revolutionary armed forces. It was an essential demand of our developing revolution to awaken and ceaselessly temper the masses in the practical struggle and prepare them thoroughly for the anti-Japanese war. Their voluntary enlistment across the country in the anti-Japanese war was a guarantee for ultimate victory in the war.

The unprecedented bad harvest and ensuing famine in 1930 created the conditions for us to launch a new mass struggle following the harvest struggle in east Manchuria. We saw to it that a new struggle was launched against the Japanese imperialists and the pro-Japanese landlords as a continuation of the heightened fighting spirit shown in the harvest struggle. The spring struggle which began with the struggle to borrow cereal from the landlords rapidly developed into a struggle to confiscate the cereal of the Japanese imperialists and pro-Japanese landlords and a violent struggle to eliminate the lackeys of the Japanese imperialists.

The work to make the people of east Manchuria revolutionary in the flames of the spring struggle developed to a new high. The Korean communists persistently enlightened and educated the masses by going among them in spite of the intensified offensive of the counterrevolution against our revolution. The mass organizations kept the door to the masses wide open and steadily tempered them in a practical struggle.

But the work was not smooth sailing everywhere. In one case several revolutionaries laid down their lives to make a village revolutionary. At times revolutionaries had to tolerate intolerable insults and the mistrust of the people, without revealing their identity. Such was my experience in Fuerhe village.

Fuerhe is an important village occupying a key position on the road from Antu to Dunhua. Free travel between Dunhua and south Manchuria was impossible without passing this village. Without making the village revolutionary it would have been impossible to ensure the safety of Xiaoshahe, Dashahe, Liushuhe and other nearby villages.

The organization sent several able political workers there, but all of them, one after another, met with failure. Those who went there to ensure that the organization took root there were all arrested and lost their lives, but no one could come up with a solution. Kim Jong Ryong was angry, qualifying Fuerhe as a reactionary village, and said that spies or some white organization seemed to be there, but it was impossible to discover them. Whenever the village was mentioned, I could not dismiss my doubts.

In Fuerhe there was an organization member called Song, but he alone could not discover the reactionary elements or make the village revolutionary. Someone had to go to the village at the risk of his life and reshape the village into a revolutionary one from a reactionary one by removing certain people and forming organizations.

So I volunteered to go to Fuerhe.

I summoned Comrade Song to Xiaoshahe and made prior arrangements with him. I said to him, "When you return to the village, spread a rumor that you have sent for a young farmhand as you are short of hands. Then I can act as a farmhand at your house."

Comrade Song said, staring at me with his eyes goggling, "The village is very reactionary. How can you go on such a venture? It would be nonsense for you to act the farmhand," and he shook his head. The organization, too, disapproved of my going to Fuerhe.

Comrade Song and I rode in an ox-drawn sleigh to Fuerhe village, in spite of the disapproval of my comrades.

I slipped into the "reactionary den," assuming the appearance of an uncouth simpleton with long hair and a dirty face.

Several hours later, when Comrade Song and I were at supper, some mounted policemen unexpectedly galloped into the village, raising clouds of dust behind them. The authorities in Antu had already dispatched police to the village. I did not know how they were informed of my arrival.

When the children playing outside shouted that some mounted policemen were coming, I went out to the yard and began to split firewood with an axe. The situation was similar to that I had experienced at the house of the unknown woman in Jiaohe.

The mounted policemen pointed at me and asked who I was.

Comrade Song said that I was his farmhand.

One of the mounted policemen said, tilting his head to one side dubiously, "A head of the communist party has come to this village to give guidance, I have heard." They had come rushing, expecting to find a gentleman arrayed in good Western clothes, and they seemed disappointed at having had a wasted journey, seeing me in a shabby overcoat with my face smeared with soot.

I wondered whether an alien element communicating secretly with the enemy was in our ranks, for only a few responsible people knew that I had slipped into the village.

When the mounted policemen had left, I found Song looking terribly pale, perspiration standing in beads on his forehead.

Getting up early in the morning the next day, I fetched water, chopped firewood, swept the courtyard and boiled cattle feed. Every day Song and I went up a mountain on his ox-drawn sleigh. On the mountain I examined documents, collected firewood and discussed matters, while giving Song assignments.

The rumor went round the village that I was good at my work. The people in Fuerhe took me for a meek farmhand. When the well iced over, the village women waved to me to come and break the ice. I did what they asked with good grace. I did so because if the village people gave me more work to do, I would look more like a farmhand. If I did what they asked of me creditably, it would have been harder for secret agents to recognize the revolutionary in me.

One day a wedding was held in the house opposite Song's. That day the village people came and asked me to pound some steamed rice to make rice cakes. As I was a "farmhand," they seemed to think that I would be good at it.

My grandfather who was a farmer all his life used to say that only when one is able to plough, chop fodder and pound rice can one be called a real farmer. But I had never before pounded steamed rice into rice cakes. Our situation at home did not allow us to live in luxury eating rice cakes. I feared that if I complied with their request I might give myself away. But it did not seem becoming of a farmhand to refuse their request. So at first I hesitated and said that I could not help them because I was doing domestic chores. People came repeatedly and pressed me with requests, so finally I had to agree.

When I appeared in the courtyard of the house where the wedding was to be held, the master and mistress of the house were delighted. Taking a mallet from the hand of their slender, middle-aged neighbor, the mistress gave it to me, saying, "Look here, the quality of today's rice cakes depends on your skill. Prove your worth." The way the mistress bustled about bringing me steamed rice in a wooden dish was strange and ludicrous. The village people stood around to see the "farmhand's" skill. It was a spectacle for people in the countryside to see how rice was pounded into rice cakes.

Grasping the mallet firmly, I thought: "Whatever will be, will be. Let me wield the mallet to the best of my ability. Pounding rice is work for a man, isn't it? A farmhand cannot do everything, can he? At worst I will be looked down upon as a poor hand." But just then Song, who had evidently read my thoughts, saved me. Pretending to put on airs, he reproached me, saying, "Hey, you! How can you pound rice with your arm? How many times have I told you to take good care of your arm?" Looking round at the people, he said, "He hurt his arm yesterday while collecting firewood. He cannot pound rice. But I will pound the rice for my neighbor's happy event."

That day the village women, as they served rice cakes to the guests, treated me like a farmhand. They handed out rice cakes on a dish to others, while handing me some with their hands. Yet I did not consider the village people to be bad because of this insult. I rather thought it helped me in my work.

So it was not easy to make the village of Fuerhe revolutionary. The process of making Wujiazi village revolutionary had been attended by many difficulties, but it was easier than that of Fuerhe. But while staying in the village for about one month and a half, I formed organizations and induced the youth core elements to get rid of the secret agents.

When I told this story to my comrades on returning to Xiaoshahe, they held their sides with laughing. I said to them, "Revolutionaries can gain a foothold anywhere. So far we have failed to do so because we made the revolution in a gentlemanly fashion without going among the masses, like drops of oil floating on water."

I once went to Fuerhe at the head of a unit after forming the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Riding to the village on horseback I, the commander of the guerrilla unit, stopped there and held a mass meeting at which I delivered a speech. Seeing me, the people were extremely surprised.

When she saw me riding my horse again after my speech, one woman who had waved me over to crush the ice exclaimed in surprise, "Dear me! Isn't that the young farmhand who was once in our village?"

He's become the commander of the guerrilla army!"

The difficulties in our way were overcome in this way. But the most difficult problem still remained unsolved. The work with the Chinese national salvation army caused much bloodshed for the Korean communists.

5.5. The Birth of a New Armed Forces

---

The spring of 1932 was turbulent with events that shook the world. After occupying Manchuria the Japanese imperialists rigged up the puppet Kingdom of Manchukuo through the reinstatement of Pu Yi, the last Qing Emperor who had been dethroned by the nationalist revolution led by Sun Yat-sen. The Japanese government-patronized mass media and the Chinese and Manchurian pro-Japanese publications chanted their praise of the kingdom, clamoring about the "concord of five nations" and the building of a "paradise of righteous government," whereas the progressive people of Asia and the rest of the world strongly denounced it.

The world's attention was focused on the activities of the fact-finding commission from the League of Nations which had just arrived in Japan on a mission to investigate the cause of the outbreak of the September 18 incident and the responsibility for the incident.

The commission headed by Lytton, an adviser to the British Privy Council, and consisting of delegates from such great powers as the United States, Germany, France and Italy was received in audience by the Emperor of Japan and met the Japanese Prime Minister, the Minister of the Army and the Minister of Foreign Affairs; it proceeded to China to hold talks with Chiang Kaisek and Zhang Xue-liang, and then appeared in Manchuria where it met Lieutenant-General Honjo, the commander of the Kwangtung Army, and inspected the area where the September 18 incident had occurred. Japan and China vied with each other in welcoming and entertaining the Lytton commission in order to win its support.

The conjecture that Japan might withdraw her troops from Manchuria if the commission disclosed the true facts and the League of Nations exerted its influence, was widespread not only in political, public and news circles but also among primary school pupils and old men in the rural villages, who had become interested in politics.

But we who were in the Antu area preparing for the armed struggle did not listen to the rumors and conjectures; we were applying ourselves to military training, with the Women's Association of Xiaoshahe bringing our lunch in large wooden vessels to the tableland near Tuqidian every day.

In the middle of March we organized in Antu a short training course for the leaders of the small guerrilla units in several of the counties of east Manchuria. Nearly 20 leaders gathered in Tuqidian, Xiaoshahe.

The training course lasted for two days' theoretical lectures on the first day and drill on the second day. I gave a lecture on the lines and policies of the Korean revolution in the political class and on the regulations and code of conduct for the guerrillas. Military drill was mostly supervised by Park Hun. We started with the basics of formation drill and the disassembly and assembly of weapons, and then dealt with such tactical matters as raids and ambushes.

Antu became the headquarters of the Korean communists who were forming the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Political workers and messengers from several counties along the River Tuman often came to Xiaoshahe to make contact with us. The news of our activities to form the guerrilla army in Antu spread from mouth to mouth as far as the homeland. On hearing the news, young patriots in their early twenties from Korea and various parts of Manchuria flocked to Antu, at the risk of their lives, to volunteer for the guerrilla army.

At this time Pyon Dal Hwan and 8 young volunteers were arrested and imprisoned by the Japanese military police on their way to Antu from Wujiazi. Pyon Dae U came to see me after liberation to express his sorrow that his son had been unable to join the army and had wasted several years behind bars. Many people came, particularly from Yanji County in Jiandao. The enemy's ruling organs and repressive machines were concentrated in the Yanji area and its network of secret agents was developed.

The Jiandao task force under the command of Colonel Iketa, which consisted of the 75th Regiment, 38th Brigade and Ranam 19th Division, and was reinforced with artillery, engineers and a signal corps, crossed the Tuman and marched into Yanji and other parts of Jiandao for a "mop-up" operation in east Manchuria. In this situation the underground organizations in the area sent to Antu many young people who had volunteered for the army.

On hearing the news, even people without any recommendation from such organizations came to us in large numbers. Chen Han-zhang came from Dunhua, bringing with him a young Chinese man, Hu Jin-min (Hu Ze-min). Hu had been a teacher at a normal school in Helong. Sometimes young people came in dozens at a time. But the Chinese national salvation army units often captured them on their way to us and killed them in groups.

At that time there were various Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units in the northeastern region of China, such as the Northeast Self Defense Army, the Anti-Jirin Army, the Anti-Japanese National Salvation Army, the Anti-Japanese Volunteers' Army, the Mountain Rebels, the Broad Sword Society, the Red Spear Society and so on. These nationalist armed units comprised patriotic soldiers who had broken away from the former Northeast Army to march under the banner of anti-Japanese national salvation after Japan's occupation of Manchuria, as well as Chinese government officials and peasants. These units together were known as the national salvation army.

Well-known among these units in Manchuria were those led by Wang De-lin, Tang Ju-wu, Wang Feng-ge, Su Bing-wen, Ma Zhanshan, Ding Chao and Li Du.

The largest one in east Manchuria was Wang De-lin's unit. Wang had in his younger days been an insurgent, as "a heroic man in the green forest," in the forests around Muling and Suifenhe, holding no principles or views, before being assigned with his followers to the Jirin army under the command of Zhang Zuo-xiang. There he became an officer in the regular army. He had served as the commander of the 3rd Battalion, 7th Regiment, 3rd Brigade of the former Jirin army before the September 18 incident. People called his unit the "Former 3rd Battalion."

After Japan's occupation of Manchuria his senior officer, Brigade Commander Ji Xing, had surrendered and met the commander of the Kwangtung Army. After pledging his allegiance to the Empire of Japan, he was appointed Jirin garrison commander. Indignant at the betrayal by his senior officer, Wang immediately revolted and proclaimed the anti-Japanese national salvation struggle. He took 500 of his soldiers to the mountains and, after organizing the national salvation army, appointed Wu Yi-cheng as the forward area commander and started his resistance against the Japanese imperialist aggressor army.

Wang De-lin's faithful subordinates Wu Yi-cheng, Shi Zhongheng, Chai Shi-rong and Kong Xian-yong, operating in the Luozigou area, contained the enemy in Jiandao and, in later years, established blood-sealed ties with our guerrilla army.

In the mountainous areas of south Manchuria the Self-Defence Army led by Tang Ju-wu was operating, and in Heilongjiang Province, Ma Zhan-shan's unit was resisting against the Japanese army which was advancing northwards. The unit of Commander Yu under the command of Wu Yi-cheng crowded into the backwoods around Antu. This unit was extremely reckless.

They all regarded the Korean communists as stooges of the Japanese imperialists and the Korean people as having guided the Japanese army of aggression into Manchuria. They were prejudiced against the Korean people partly because the Japanese imperialists continued to drive a wedge between the Chinese and Korean peoples, and partly because the bad impression the Chinese people had received of the Korean people from the May 30 Uprising and the Wanbaoshan incident was still vivid in their memory.

The die-hard upper stratum of the national salvation army lacked political judgment and insight with which to understand that both the Korean and Chinese nations were suffering the same disaster and misfortune because of the Japanese imperialist aggressors, that the Korean people could not be the cat's paws of the Japanese just as the Chinese people could not, and that the Korean people could not be the enemy of the Chinese people just as the Chinese people could not be the enemy of the Korean people.

They were blindly hostile to communism because they came mostly from the propertied class. They concocted their own equation that the Korean people were communists, communists were factionalists, and factionalists were the running dogs of the Japanese imperialists and, based on this equation, persecuted and ruthlessly killed young Korean people.

In the cities and lowlands the Japanese troops of aggression were running wild, and in the rural and mountainous areas which had not yet been occupied by the Japanese army tens of thousands of Chinese nationalist soldiers occupied vantage points to bottle us up. Their hostile acts were a serious obstacle threatening the very existence of our young guerrilla army.

Since the Japanese imperialists, the Chinese mountain rebels and the Korean Independence Army were all opposed to the Korean communists, we had seemed to have the world against us. Without improving our relations with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units, it was impossible for our guerrilla army to survive and operate as a legitimate force. And without making itself legitimate it was impossible for it to increase its ranks and operate in daylight.

As our organized unit was not legitimate, we were as good as confined in a back room. In such circumstances it was impossible to see the light. We merely lamented, saying, "How can we fight the Japanese by fumbling with Mauser rifles in civilian clothes in the back rooms of others' houses?" Worse still, we could hide only in Korean settlements; we could not go to other places and had to move about in groups surreptitiously and only by night. That was why we called the guerrilla army a secret guerrilla army in its early days.

In those days we had to keep away from not only the Japanese army but also the remnants of the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units and the army of Manchuria; we also had to guard against some of the Korean nationalists and reactionary elements. As we were fired at and persecuted in public on the ground that we were communists, we really had a headache. The same was the situation in Yanji, Helong, Wangqing, and Hunchun.

Nevertheless, we could not stay only at the houses of communists. As they were living in poverty, they would become even worse off if we stayed in dozens at their houses, eating their grain; this, too, was a problem.

If things were to improve and if we were to fight in high spirits, it was imperative for us to make the guerrilla army legitimate so that we could march in broad daylight, singing, welcomed by the masses and conducting propaganda. It was painful for us not to be able to do so.

Whenever we got together, we discussed over and over again how we should make our guerrilla army legitimate and how we should improve our relations with the Chinese nationalist army. The most serious issue was whether it was right to join hands with the nationalists of China. Several comrades doubted the validity of an alliance with them, considering that it would mean giving up our class principles and compromising with them, given the fact that their upper strata came from the propertied class and that their army represented the interests of landlords, capitalists and bureaucrats. These comrades insisted that, even though we might improve our relations with them on a temporary basis, we could never enter into an alliance with them, and that we should overcome their hostile acts by force of arms.

This was an extremely dangerous opinion. We maintained that we should not only improve our relations with them but also form a united front with them because we firmly believed that these units, in spite of their various limitations, could become our strategic ally in the anti-Japanese war as we shared common fighting objectives and a similar situation. The question on an allied front of two armed forces with conflicting ideologies and ideals was extremely controversial when it was raised for the first time in those days.

Forming a common front with those units was also a serious question facing the Communist Party of China. From the early days its east Manchuria Ad hoc committee had been interested in Wang De-lin's unit and sent seven or eight excellent communists there to conduct work with the unit. We sent Lee Gwang and some other Korean communists to the national salvation army units. On several occasions I received through liaison officers reports on the painstaking efforts of Lee Gwang, who had been sent to Tong Shan-hao's unit.

As their hostile acts became more and more outrageous, our comrades said that the allied front was an idle fancy and that we should return fire and avenge the people who had been killed by them. I made a lot of effort to restrain them. Making them our enemy and paying them back was inconsistent with our great anti-Japanese cause and moral duty and was imprudent enough to invite the destruction of our young guerrilla army.

The communists and guerrillas not only in Jiandao but also in the whole of Manchuria racked their brains over the Chinese nationalist armed units. The guerrilla units in the various counties at that time were small in size; there were only a few dozen guerrillas in each county. They were in danger of being annihilated if captured by the Chinese nationalist units, so they could not expand their ranks even if they wanted to.

In the light of this I wondered if it would not be a good idea for our guerrillas to join Commander Yu's unit and operate as a special detachment of it for a period. I presumed that if we joined Commander Yu's unit, we would be safe under the flag of the Chinese national salvation army and could obtain some weapons and, that if we had a proper influence on them, we could make the soldiers communists and reliable allies. I put this idea to my comrades to be debated.

We had a day-long meeting on this question at Kim Jong Ryon's house in Xiaoshahe, where the headquarters of the party organization was situated. It is now called the Xiaoshahe Meeting. The atmosphere at the meeting was very heated. We debated from morning till late at night until our throats were sore on the question of whether it was possible and favorable for us to operate as a special detachment of the Chinese national salvation army. Not only the heavy smokers but also those who were non-smokers puffed hand-rolled cigarettes continually. I still remember how my eyes smarted in the oppressive atmosphere. I was a non-smoker.

Finally my idea gained the support of my comrades. The meeting decided to dispatch a delegate to Commander Yu's unit to negotiate with the Chinese national salvation army unit, and I was singled out as the most suitable person for the job. To be more precise, I volunteered, rather than being chosen by my comrades.

None of us had any experience of military diplomacy. So the question of who should go on the mission was taken very seriously. None of us was sure whether or not the Chinese would agree, whether or not they would baffle us by making preposterous proposals at the negotiations or whether or not they would shoot our delegate if the worst came to the worst. We were all of the opinion that someone who was prepared for all these eventualities should go.

But none of us was right for the task. An elderly man was needed to deal with Commander Yu and we had Park Hun, Kim Il Ryong and Hu Jin-min as such. Kim Il Ryong was more than 10 years older than me, but he did not speak Chinese well. The rest of us were between eighteen and twenty years old and had, like Cao Ya-fan, recently left school.

I suggested that I should go, but they objected. They said that I, their commander, must not risk myself when Commander Yu might kill me because I was a communist, and that any of the Chinese Comrades, Chen Han-zhang, Cao Ya-fan or Hu Jin-min who was diplomatic should be sent.

When I asked them why Commander Yu would kill me, they said, "How do you know he won't kill you? If they curse you as a 'gaolibangzi' (a Chinese derogatory term for the Koreans) and shoot you when you are there, that'll be the end of you. They kill anyone, so why shouldn't they kill you? They say that the Chinese are more vigilant against young Koreans nowadays after the incident of the Guan Corps in Wangqing. So you must not go."

The secret guerrilla army in Wangqing led by Comrade Lee Gwang had disarmed a national salvation army unit called the Guan Corps. This was known as the Guan Corps incident. This incident further aggravated our relations with the Chinese units and created a more unfavorable situation for the activities of our guerrilla army. A messenger from Wangqing reported that, after the incident, the Chinese soldiers in his area had captured several of our guerrillas as retaliation and killed them. It was around this time that Comrade Kim Chaek had been arrested by the Chinese mountain rebels in north Manchuria and had only narrowly escaped execution.

Nevertheless, I insisted on my going to negotiate. I did not insist because I would be more skilful than others in dealing with them or because I had any particular means to force Commander Yu to yield. It was a brutal fact that the existence of our guerrilla army depended on negotiating successfully with Commander Yu, that the success of our activities depended on improving our relations with the national salvation army, and that without making them our allies, it would be impossible for us to go outdoors, let alone launch a guerrilla war in east Manchuria. I thought that unless we overcame the crisis and started the armed struggle I, as a Korean man, would have no reason to live.

I persuaded my comrades by saying that a man who was afraid of death could not fight for the revolution, that I could speak fluent Chinese, that I had experienced many trials in the days of the youth movement, that I would be perfectly able to deal with Commander Yu and that, therefore, I must go. Then I left with Park Hun, Chen Hanzhang, Hu Jin-min and another young Chinese man to negotiate with Commander Yu, without any guarantee for our personal safety.

The headquarters of Commander Yu's unit was situated in Liangjiangkou. We promised to say that we were from Jirin, not from Antu, when asked by the unit's soldiers where we were from. It was not to our advantage to name the place in east Manchuria where our guerrilla army was stationed.

On our way to Dashahe we came across Commander Yu's unit. Hundreds of soldiers were marching in a stately manner, carrying a standard on which was written "Commander Yu," as in the Three Warring Kingdoms. As they had already defeated the Japanese army at Nanhutou and even captured some machine guns, their reputation was running high. "Why don't we try to avoid them?" Hu asked me, with an uneasy look.

"No. Let's carry on," I said, walking on. The other four kept in step with mine, walking at my side. The moment they saw us, the soldiers shouted, "Gaolibangzi, come on!" They tried to arrest us there and then. I asked them in Chinese why they were arresting us who were fighting against the Japanese as they were. They asked in return if we were not Koreans. I answered proudly that I was a Korean and, pointing at Chen and Hu, said that they were Chinese.

"We are going to see your commander to discuss something urgent with him. Take us to your commander," I said with dignity.

They cowered and told us to follow them. After we had followed them for a short distance, a man in the uniform of an officer of the former Northeast Army ordered the men to take lunch, and detained us in a farmhouse. To my surprise Liu Ben-cao, a teacher of mine at Jirin Yuwen Middle School, entered the house. He had taught Chinese at Yuwen Middle School for a while and later at Wenguang Middle School and Dunhua Middle School. He had been on friendly terms with Mr. Shang Yue and knew Chen Hanzhang well. As he had been good-natured and had a wide knowledge, and moreover introduced many excellent books and enjoyed reading to the students the good poems he had written, we had admired him and respected him highly. As soon as we recognized him, Chen and I hailed him. In that adverse situation, we were delighted to see him.

Without concealing his delight and surprise, he asked us one question after another, "Why are you here, Kim Sung Ju? What have you come here for? Where were you going and why are you being detained?"

After I had given him a short explanation, he ordered the men in a loud voice, "Be polite to these people. I will take my lunch here with them. Serve us a good lunch." Later I learned that he had given up teaching when the Japanese army invaded Manchuria, and had joined Commander Yu's unit. He was chief of staff of that unit.

While having lunch with us, Liu said that he had put on the military uniform because he could not bear to see the country being ruined, but it was extremely difficult for him to fight alongside ignorant soldiers. He then asked us to work with him. We agreed and asked him to help us to see Commander Yu. He replied that the commander was on his way to the Antu county town from Liangjiangkou and that we could see him if we followed him.

"Sir, we would like to organize an armed unit of Koreans," I said. "As you know we Koreans hate the Japanese imperialists more bitterly than the Chinese do. So why are the Chinese nationalist soldiers against the Koreans' fighting the Japanese? Why do they persecute Koreans and kill them?"

"I know! I tell them not to do it, but they won't listen to me. These ignoramuses do not even know what kind of people communists are. What is wrong with the communists fighting against the Japanese imperialists?"

Liu Ben-cai was indignant, too. I was inwardly pleased that now we seemed to have found a way out. I sent Park Hun immediately to Xiaoshahe to inform the comrades there that we were safe and that it seemed possible that we would make the guerrilla army legitimate as the chief of staff of Commander Yu's unit was giving us his full backing.

After lunch we followed Liu Ben-cai to the Antu county town. Liu had a horse of his own. We told him to ride on the horse, but he replied, "How can I ride on a horse while you are walking? Let's talk while walking together."

He walked with us all the way to the county town. Most of the soldiers were wearing arm-bands with "Bu pa si bu rao min", written on them, meaning that they should not be afraid of death nor should they harm the people. Unlike the nasty attitude of the soldiers, their maxim was very sound and militant. The maxim gave me a ray of hope that my interview with Commander Yu would be a success.

Thanks to the good offices of Mr. Liu, that day we met Commander Yu without difficulty. He received us with courtesy and accorded us hospitality probably for the sake of the dignity of the chief of staff, or probably out of his desire to take us into his unit, for he had made secret inquiries about us and learned that we, having been educated at middle school, were capable of making speeches, writing declarations and handling weapons, in addition to being in the prime of our youth.

As I had guessed, Commander Yu asked us to join his unit. He asked me to work as chief of the propaganda squad under the headquarters. I was extremely embarrassed, for my intention was to form our own army and make it legitimate. If I declined, it would surely incur Commander Yu's displeasure and place Liu Ben-cai in an awkward situation.

I thought; things are developing in a strange way, but fortune might smile on me if I win his confidence. I accepted his offer saying, "Thank you, commander, I will do as you have asked."

Commander Yu was delighted. He ordered his subordinate to write a notice of my appointment immediately. Thus I became chief of the propaganda squad of the headquarters. Hu Jin-min was appointed an assistant staff officer and Chen Han-zhang, a secretary. This was a ridiculous development, and not something we had desired, but it was a step up the ladder we had to climb. To tell the truth, these absurd appointments proved valuable in making the guerrilla army legitimate.

In my mind I cried, "Bravo!" comparing our situation in which we had been confined in the back rooms of others' houses to the present situation in which we had penetrated deep into the heart of Commander Yu's unit.

That evening an unexpected event occurred. The soldiers of the unit had arrested 70 or 80 young Korean men on their way from Yanji to Fuerhe and brought them to the county town. I saw them at a distance with indignation and shock, and then hurried to Mr. Liu and said: "Here's a pretty state of affairs, sir. Your soldiers have again arrested dozens of Koreans. What sort of pro-Japanese can there be among them? There is no pro-Japanese. We should deal with any cat's paw after an examination, shouldn't we?"

He said, "Go and handle the matter, Sung Ju. We trust you."

"I can't do it alone, sir. Please come with me. You were a good orator, weren't you? If you make a speech, even a stooge of the Japanese will be moved. We should teach them to fight against the Japanese. What's the good of killing people who are not pro-Japanese?" "You are good at speaking, so there's no need for me to speak. You go alone." He flatly refused, waving his arm.

As he said, I had made speeches on many occasions in my school days. Roving around such places as Jirin, Dunhua, Antu, Fusong and Changehun, I had delivered many speeches denouncing the wild scheme of the Japanese imperialists to invade Manchuria and calling for the unity of the Korean and Chinese peoples. Mr. Liu knew this well.

"If I speak in Korean how will the officers of your unit understand what I am saying? They may think that I am conducting propaganda against them."

Again he waved his hand and urged me to go.

"At most you will make communist propaganda. That's all right. I will vouch for you, so please speak without any worry.

He knew that I was associated with the communist party and involved in the communist movement.

"Communist propaganda should be conducted whenever necessary. It isn't bad to conduct it, is it?"

If we had not been on intimate terms with each other, I would not have dared say this to Mr. Liu. If they regarded me as a communist and pro-Japanese and tried to kill me, I could do nothing. But no such Ahing1~appened because of our special relationship. He and I had been Open with each other since our days at Yuwen Middle School. When I had been attending school in Jirin, he had looked after me.

As I was talking to Liu Ben-caoy, Commander Yu entered the office. Looking outside, he remarked that his men seemed to have arrested some communists and, shaking his head, went on to say that he wondered when the communist party had produced so many members in Manchuria.

Then Liu Ben-caoy, winking at me, said, "You, the propaganda chief, go out quickly and talk with them. Not all Koreans can be communists and not all communists can be the cat's paws of the Japanese imperialists."

Commander Yu grew angry at his words and yelled, "What? Are the communists not the stooges of the Japanese? They have brought the Japanese to this land to rob us of our land by their revolt."

Commander Yu's prejudice against the Korean people was stronger and blinder than we had expected. His misunderstanding of communism was no less deep-rooted than his prejudice. I decided to make every effort to persuade him. With determination, I dared to ask him:

"Excuse me, sir, but how do you know that communists are bad? Did you learn it from books or did you hear it from others? If not, why do you call them evil?"

"Damn the books! I learned it from what other people told me. Anyone who has a mouth says that communists are bad. That is why I believe they are bad."

I felt aghast at his words, yet relieved, for I thought I would be perfectly able to dispel his misunderstanding, which was not based on personal experience but on hearsay. "How can you carry out a great undertaking if you believe what other people say blindly apart from your own experience?"

As Chen Han-zhang and Hu Jin-min were communists and his chief of staff was supporting us, Commander Yu was surrounded. Thinking this a golden opportunity, I continued:

"What is the use of killing precious youngsters at will? What about giving them spears, even if not guns right away, and using them as a shock force? In that way we can test them to see if they fight the Japanese bravely. If they fight well, can we expect anything more from them? It is too much to kill them for no reason.

After thinking for a while, he said, "That's right. Go and deal with them."

I went to the arrested young men and secretly circulated a slip of paper among them. The slip said: "As there is no material evidence, never say you are communists; tell them you picked up by chance the handbill reading, 'Appeal to the Anti-Japanese Soldiers' they have found on you.'" The young men did not know from whom the slip came.

When I appeared they shot angry glances at me. They seemed to suspect that I was a henchman of Commander Yu. Seeing their hostile glances I asked, “Has any of you ever heard the name Kim Sung Ju?”

This question dispelled the tension and they began to murmur. Some answered yes and some no.

“I am Kim Sung Ju. I am now working as chief of the propaganda squad in Commander Yu's unit. The commander has just given me the order to ask you whether you would like to join his unit and fight with him. Those who are willing to do so, please speak up.”

All the young men answered in chorus, “We will!”

I informed Commander Yu of what the young men had said; then I asked him to admit them to his unit and get them fight the Japanese. He agreed readily with my proposal. In this way the young men's fate and future was decided as we desired, and we were in a better position to achieve an allied front against the Japanese.

When we thus were on the threshold of making our guerrilla army legitimate, a Korean adviser to Commander Yu who was pulling the wires behind the scenes raised a fuss. A veteran nationalist belonging to the group of Kim Jwa Jin, he had been farming in Nanhutou before joining the national salvation army after the September 18 incident. As he was clever and had a wide knowledge, he enjoyed the deep trust of Commander Yu. It was he who had been instigating Commander Yu to persecute the communists. He claimed that admitting those 70 or 80 people without examination was rash, and that there might be pro-Japanese elements among them. Without forestalling him, our activities might be confronted with another great difficulty.

One day I asked Commander Yu casually, “I have heard that there is a Korean in your unit. Why do you hide him from me?”

He wondered why I had not yet met him, and ordered one of his men to bring him to me. I found the man to be very tall and sturdy. I introduced myself, and then said, “I am glad to see you. As you are old and probably experienced, please help us young novices as much as you can.”

He introduced himself to me. He said he had heard that a young Korean man who spoke fluent Chinese had come to the headquarters and was assisting Commander Yu as the chief of the propaganda squad, and that he, as a Korean, had been very glad at the news. Because he was speaking about the nation, presenting himself as a Korean, I took the opportunity to scold him:

“If so, you should enlist many people who are willing to fight against the Japanese. Why are you killing so many of them? Is it right to kill them because their ideology is different from yours? It is pitiful for Koreans not to be able to live in their homeland and it is all the more pitiful for them to be killed by the national salvation army in Manchuria. You ought to ensure that they unite, irrespective of their ideology, be they communists or nationalists, and fight against the Japanese; what is the good of ostracizing and killing them’?”

He said I was right and gave me a meaningful look. Thus the second barrier was removed.

Commander Yu smiled as he saw our conversation ending in a friendly atmosphere. I asked the commander if he would trust me and allow me to be relieved of the command of the propaganda squad by Hu Jin-min and to form and lead a unit of Koreans. Liu Ben-cao supported me, saying that my proposal was reasonable. Commander Yu asked me how we would obtain weapons for the proposed unit.

I replied, “Never mind the weapons. We will not ask you for them. We will arm the unit by capturing weapons from the enemy.” The commander was extremely satisfied with my answer. “Then you may form a unit. But what if you turn your guns against us?”

“Don’t worry about that, we will never be guilty of such a betrayal. Should we turn our guns against you, your large army will be able to destroy us greenhorns, won’t it?” Waving his hand and laughing boisterously, he asked me if I had taken his joke seriously. Afraid that he might get angry if I began by asking him for his permission to break away from the national salvation army, I asked him as the commander to name the unit. Liu Ben-cao who was standing beside us said, “So, call it a special detachment. What about a special detachment of Koreans?” Commander Yu and I agreed with Liu’s suggestion.

The preparations for making the secret guerrilla army legitimate came to a successful conclusion with the birth of the special detachment. We enlisted in this detachment secret guerrillas from Antu and the 70-80 young men who had been detained by Commander Yu’s unit, making the guerrilla army legitimate.

I left the commander's room, taking the hands of Chen Hanzhang and Hu Jin-min in mine. We shouted “We’ve won!” “Success!” and we walked round the walled town all that night. Hu offered me a cigarette, saying that it would be a good experience to get drunk on alcohol or on cigarette smoke if there was no alcohol on that happy day.

I put a cigarette between my lips for the first time in my life and inhaled the smoke but, choking, I coughed for a good while. We all laughed. Hu even said, jokingly, “How can you become the commander of the guerrilla army when you cannot even inhale cigarette smoke?”

I returned to Xiaoshahe, and when I told them about the success of the negotiations, the comrades, who had been staying in a back room, carried me on their shoulders, crowding out of the room. The three cheers they raised reverberated throughout the village.

Kim Il Ryong, a celebrated singer, sang Arirang. It was strange to see him, a steel-like man, singing such a sorrowful song on that festive day when he should have sung a merry, lively waltz or a vigorous march.

Kim Chol (alias Kim Chol Hui) asked him, shaking him by the arm, “Brother Il Ryong, why are you singing such a song on this happy day?”

"I don't know. Arirang just came out of my mouth. Yet, we have passed through many crises, haven't we?"

Kim Il Ryong finished singing and glanced at Kim Chol, with tears in his eyes. What he said made me muse over the trials we had overcome to greet that day. Kim Il Ryong himself was the epitome of all these trials. He had lived through the nationalist movement as an Independence Army soldier, and also through the communist movement. He had lived in Korea, Manchuria and in the Maritime Province of Siberia. His very life was a continuation of suffering, lamentation and tears. Arirang was a musical interpretation of his life. At a historic juncture when he could laugh off all his sorrows and jump from setback to offensive, he sang the song to sum up his tortuous past and announce a fresh start in a jubilant mood.

If we had not met Liu Ben-cao on our way, what would have happened to us and to the destiny of the guerrilla army? With this thought I express my silent gratitude to him, who has now passed away.

Liu Ben-cao was happier than anyone else at the success of our negotiations with Commander Yu. When I left the town, he followed me a long way from the military camp and said in excitement that now we were friends, friendly forces, we should destroy the Japanese imperialist aggressors together. When I heard of his death, I mourned, remembering the eventful days at Yuwen Middle School and in the walled town of Antu where we had held the negotiations.

Thanks to the successful negotiations with Commander Yu, we were able to make our guerrilla army legitimate and have an ally in the war of resistance against the Japanese imperialists. The success also gave us the belief that in the great, patriotic cause we would be able to form a united front with the nationalists of another country who had a different ideology and different ideals.

This belief, I think, has had a great influence on my political career of more than half a century since then. Whenever I encountered officials who were prejudiced or hesitant in dealing with the matter of winning over the nationalists with a different ideology and different ideals and people with checkered records from the propertied classes, I would tell them about the experience I had gained in the negotiations with Commander Yu and persuaded them to be magnanimous.

Back in Xiaoshahe, I sent detailed information of our negotiations with Commander Yu and the resultant formation of the special detachment of Koreans to Lee Gwang who had been struggling with the problem of working with the national salvation army unit in the Wangqing area, and gave him the assignment of forming without delay another special detachment in Wangqing, in view of our experience in Antu.

Lee Gwang had been working underground until then. I sent one of my companies to him so that he could form a special detachment there and emerge from underground to conduct legitimate operations.

The special detachments were formed of Koreans. Of Korean units, only my unit and Lee Gwang's unit conducted legitimate activities in relation with the national salvation army. The naming of the special detachment at that time was, so to speak, a tactical measure to ensure the legitimate activities of our guerrilla army, improve our relations with the Chinese nationalist units and form an anti-Japanese allied front with them.

After forming the special detachment we pushed ahead with preparations for expanding and reorganizing it into the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army as soon as possible. The organizational structure was established after a wide-ranging discussion. Some comrades were very apprehensive of the small number of people of working-class origin in the guerrilla army.

An investigation into those 100 men applying to join showed that most of them were students or peasants. Alarmed at this fact, some of my comrades said that if the army was composed mainly of such people, it would mean violating Marxist-Leninist principles for forming a revolutionary army, and that it might be a factor leading to the degeneration of the revolutionary army.

I explained to them that, although the general principle of Marxist-Leninist military science regarded the industrial working class as the main component of a revolutionary army, there was no need to apply this principle mechanically. Although the industrial working class was relatively small in our country, with peasants accounting for the overwhelming majority of the population, I said, we could not postpone the formation of the guerrilla army until the number of workers had increased.

I told them that the peasants and students in our country had as high a revolutionary spirit and as strong a national spirit as the working class, that it would be good if people from different backgrounds fought with the ideology of the working class, and that the preponderance of peasants and students in the revolutionary army would not cause the army to degenerate.

In establishing a command system we did not regard the existing formula as absolute. We defined the organizational structure in such a way as to increase the combat strength to the maximum and to keep the number of commanding officers to the minimum to suit the characteristics of guerrilla warfare. In short, we made the command system as simple as possible. We did not maintain a supply department or a supply officer. We ensured that everyone was able to cook, launder, fight and, if necessary, conduct political activities.

How much useful information we would have received if we had such a book as On War by Carl von Clausewitz at that time! In those days we had no more than the basic military knowledge that the triangular system of military organization had been created by Napoleon. We knew of Clausewitz only by name. I obtained his work On War for the first time during the Second World War. His principle that the command system should be simplified so as to increase combat strength sounded reasonable to me.

Uniforms for the army were made from cloth dyed green in water and boiled oak-tree bark. A five-pointed piece of red cloth inscribed with the company number was worn on the left breast of the tunic. We were to wear caps with a red star insignia and white leggings. Our hearts swelled as we prepared the design of the uniform, the finishing touch to the formation of the guerrilla army.

The members of the Women's Association began to make the uniforms according to our design. My mother, even though she was suffering from her recurrent illness, cut the cloth or handled a sewing machine with all her heart with the other members of the Women's Association.

In the second half of April 1932, we held a meeting to finalize the preparations for the formation of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army in Antu. The meeting discussed the date and place of the inauguration of the guerrilla army along with the final screening of the applicants, defined the area of its immediate activities and adopted general measures related with the activities of the guerrilla army.

After the meeting the recruits assembled at Liujiafenfang (Polchatun), at the entrance to Sandaobaihe and then proceeded to Xiaoshahe. The recruits numbered more than 100; those whose names I still remember are Cha Gwang Su, Park Hun, Kim Il Ryong (from Xiaoshahe), Cho Dok Hwa (from Xiaoshahe), "pockmark" (a nickname, from Xiaoshahe), Cho Myong Hwa (from Xiaoshahe), Li Myong Su (from Xiaoshahe), Kim Chol (alias Kim Chol Hui, from Xinglongcun), Kim Bong Gu (from Xinglongcun), Li Yong Bae (from Xinglongcun), a Kwak (from Xinglongcun), Li Bong Gu (from Sanrenfang), Pang In Hyon (from Sanrenfang), Kim Jong Hwan, Li Hak Yong (from Korea), Kim Dong Jin (from Korea), Park Myong Son (from Yanji), An Tae Bom (from Yanji) and Han Chang Hun (from south Manchuria).

On the morning of April 25, 1932, we held the founding ceremony of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army on the tableland at Tuqidian. The guerrillas, dressed in their new uniforms and with their guns on their shoulders, lined up in unit order in the clearing on the tableland surrounded by larch trees, and the people from Xiaoshahe and Xinglongcun were buzzing, as they stood in a group at one edge of the clearing.

When looking at the fresh, sturdy soldiers, my mind was flooded with surging memories. How many miles our comrades had walked, how many meetings they had held, how many speeches they had delivered, how many rugged mountains they had trekked, and how many comrades had laid down their lives in the course of forming this armed force! The Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army was a priceless creation of our revolution, born of superhuman efforts, a bloody struggle and sacrifice.

Feeling an irresistible urge to summon all the comrades and people who had sacrificed themselves for this day to this tableland at Tuqidian, I made a speech, with strong emotion bursting out of my heart. As I proclaimed the founding of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army, the soldiers cheered at the top of their voices and the people applauded them enthusiastically.

On May Day, the militant holiday of the working class of the whole world, the AJPGA entered the county town of Antu with the red flag flying in the van and marched in parade, while blowing trumpets and beating drums. Kim Il Ryong, who had been appointed an officer of the guerrilla army, led the chorus of the march that day. Not only the citizens but also the officers and men of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units crowded out to the streets and extended a welcome to us with their thumbs up, applauding us to congratulate us.

When we returned to Tuqidian after the parade, Cha Gwang Su and Kim Il Ryong hurried to my house and fetched my bed-ridden mother. Her face did not look well, with wrinkles between her eyebrows and with gray hairs on her head; but her eyes were smiling a quiet smile. She walked to Li Yong Bae and stroked his rifle, cartridge belt and five-pointed star. Then she proceeded to Kim Chol, Cho Dok Hwa, Kim Il Ryong, Pang In I-lyon and Cha Gwang Su, stroking this or that rifle and patting one man's shoulder, and then another's. Before long, her eyes were moist. She said:

"I am proud of you. Now we have our own army! That's what we needed. You must destroy the Japanese and win back the country without fail."

Her voice was thick. Forgetting her devotion to us, she was apparently thinking of the painstaking efforts of my father and other patriotic fighters who had passed away, praying for the liberation of the motherland.

Later guerrilla units were formed in Yanji, Wangqing, Hunchun, Helong and other parts of east Manchuria. Guerrilla units were also formed in north and south Manchuria by such staunch Korean communists as Kim Chaek, Choi Yong Kun, Li Hong Gwang and Li Dong Gwang, and began to fight the enemy.

The spring of 1932 advanced with the rumbling of the gunfire of the great war against the Japanese imperialists.

6.1. To South Manchuria

---

Following the legitimization of the guerrilla units and the formal founding of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army, our comrades discussed how it should start its activities. After parading in the walled town we returned to Xiaoshahe, and billeted the troops on the villagers in groups of three or four. We let them rest for a few days and held discussions to decide upon the direction of the guerrilla army's activities. The process of these discussions was attended by a hot dispute, as had been the case in Kalun and Mingyuegou. Everyone had his own opinion.

Not only was everyone's view with regard to guerrilla warfare different but also their assertions and expositions of tactics for it varied. Our collective consisted of over 100 young people with varying standards of learning and different backgrounds who had previously belonged to different organizations. Therefore, it was natural that their intentions and beliefs should be varied.

Their beliefs can largely be divided into three categories.

The first category was the theory of small groups. The advocates of this theory insisted that many small and mobile armed groups should be formed and the enemy defeated through a war of attrition instead of following the stereotyped method of forming such units as the company, battalion, regiment and division. They were of the opinion that if the strength of the guerrilla army was divided into small groups of three or five and tens and hundreds of groups conducted operations in many places in accordance with the unified strategy of the general staff, it would be quite possible to bring the Japanese imperialists to their knees.

The advocates of this theory claimed that guerrilla warfare with small armed groups as the basic unit might mark the creation of a new form of the national liberation struggle in colonial countries. Many advocates of the small group theory were to be found among the young people from Dunhua and Yanji in particular. The young people in these two places were most influenced by Li Li-san's Left adventurism line. The evil aftereffects of this were still evident in their way of thinking.

Cha Gwang Su harshly criticized this theory of small armed groups as modern Francisism. I was of the same opinion as Cha Gwang Su. The essence of the theory of small armed groups was that groups of several people would roam around avoiding a full-scale armed confrontation by large units because the military strength of the Japanese imperialists was enormous, and throw bombs at enemy leaders, set fire to their ruling installations and deal heavy blows to pro-Japanese elements and traitors to the nation, as Ra Sok Ju and Kang U Gyu had done.

The theory of small armed groups was a type of terrorism disguised as guerrilla warfare. If we did as they maintained, we would virtually be abandoning guerrilla warfare in large units. This would represent a retreat. We could not tolerate a retreat.

Before and after the founding of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army, two noteworthy incidents took place in Japan and China perpetrated by our country's patriots. One of them was the heroic deed of martyr Li Bong Chang who threw a bomb at the Japanese Emperor's carriage outside the Sakurada Gate of the royal palace in Tokyo; another was the incident involving patriot Yun Bong Gil's throwing of a bomb in Hongkou Park in Shanghai on April 29 that year.

Li Bong Chang failed to achieve his aim of assassinating the Emperor because the bomb did not hit the mark. However, Yun Bong Gil succeeded in killing General Shirakawa, commander of Japanese forces in Shanghai, Murai, consul general in Shanghai, and Kawahashi, the leader of the Japanese residents. He also inflicted severe injuries upon many key military and political figures who had gathered in the park to celebrate the Emperor's birthday, such as the resident minister to China, the commander of the 9th division and an admiral. By doing so he caused a great sensation at home and abroad.

On January 9, 1932, the day after Li Bong Chang was arrested for throwing a bomb at the Emperor's procession, Guominribao, organ of the Kuomintang in China, carried in special type an article entitled "Korean Li Bong Chang Attempts to Assassinate Japanese Emperor, but Sadly Fails." Many other newspapers gave wide publicity to the heroic deed of Li Bong Chang. The report made such an impact that Japanese soldiers and policemen in the field even raided the office of the newspaper Guominribao and destroyed it. All the newspapers that had expressed their regret for the failure were closed.

All the Korean and Chinese peoples highly praised the brave deed of Yun Bong Gil. After the incident in Hongkou Park prominent figures from Chinese public circles asked for an interview with Kim Gu who had organized and instigated the incident. Even the bosses of the Chinese Kuomintang-led reactionary government who were capitulating to Japan's aggression, promised to cooperate economically with the Koreans in China, moved by the great spirit of resistance and heroism of the Korean nation.

Both Li Bong Chang and Yun Bong Gil were subordinates of Kim Gu and members of the Group of Korean Patriots which was superintended by him. This group's basic method in the anti-Japanese struggle was terror.

Following the heroic deeds of Li Bong Chang and Yun Bong Gil, an incident occurred in Dalian in which some members of the Patriotic Group sent by Kim Gu were arrested on the charge of attempting to assassinate the commander of the Kwangtung Army. They had intended to assassinate the commander of the Kwangtung Army, the president of the Manchurian Railway Company and the newly appointed chief of foreign affairs, taking advantage of the moment when key figures in Japanese military and political circles were coming to the station for the arrival in Dalian from Fengtian of the Lytton-led fact-finding commission of the League of Nations. Kim Gu even wanted to send his subordinates to finish off the governor-general in Korea.

Terrorism dazzled many Korean youth who were burning with hatred for the enemy at a time when Ahn

Jung Gun who had shot Ito Hirobumi to death was praised as a national hero and when all our compatriots dispersed on the American continent, in the Maritime Province of Siberia and in Manchuria, not to mention the people at home, were inspired by the heroic deeds of Li Bong Chang and Yun Bong Gil. So it was not at all strange that at this time the theory of small armed groups should come to the fore and be brought up for discussion when we were discussing the direction of the activities of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. The advocates of the theory of small armed groups were emphatic in asserting that the stronghold of Japanese imperialist rule would be shaken if such heroic deeds as that of Yun Bong Gil took place in succession in all parts of Korea, Japan and China.

The second category was made up of those who recommended that we should go over to a full-scale armed offensive immediately. While such people as Kim Il Ryong were interested in the theory of small armed groups, Park Hun, Kim Chol (Kim Chol Hui) and the like supported the theory of a prompt armed confrontation. I could to some extent understand it when Park Hun, who had seen tens of thousands of the soldiers of the regular army and rioters thronging a big city, insisted on starting an immediate full-scale armed attack, not satisfied with the theory of small armed groups. However, when Kim Chol, who was married, and living in his wife's parents' home, spoke with fervor, which was unusual for that mild man, claiming that we should operate immediately on a large scale, I found it strange.

All those who insisted upon going over to full-scale armed attacks had some grounds for their argument. Through the September 18 incident Japan had easily achieved her aim of occupying Manchuria and seized Shanghai and many other strategic points in China proper. A new puppet state called Manchukuo was established in the three eastern provinces. What was her next target? It was China proper and the Soviet Union. It was as clear as daylight that, although the Japanese army was slowing down its speed of attack as it watched the trend in the situation, it would invade China and the Soviet Union on some pretext or other. Therefore, starting full-scale military operations with the existing armed units would mean attacking from behind the Japanese imperialists who were deep in the mire of war. For us guerrillas to adopt a positive attacking posture was the law of history, so went their argument.

Kim Il Ryong rejected this extreme assertion and quoted the brief proverb "Cut one's coat according to one's cloth." This theory was thoughtless and subjective and did not take into consideration the preparedness of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army.

Needless to say, the line of the armed struggle we had advanced in Kalun was one which envisaged a full-scale armed confrontation with the Japanese imperialists. Without doubt the main aspect of the anti-Japanese armed struggle would be an organized and full-scale armed confrontation. However, it would be tantamount to committing suicide for a guerrilla army which had only just made a start to follow such a road from the beginning without making any preparations.

There was another category besides these two. It was the theory of prudence which put forward the principle that one would be ever-victorious if one knew the enemy and oneself and that one would always be defeated if one did not know either the enemy or oneself. This is what the advocates of the theory of prudence said:

"Our enemy is strong. How are we? We are no more than a young bud in both numbers and quality. Without doubt in the future we shall be enormously powerful. However, now we must steadily foster our strength quantitatively and qualitatively at the same time as conducting secret activities. Because our struggle will assume a protracted nature, we must accumulate our strength and beat the enemy at a stroke, taking advantage of a time when they are weak."

This view was censured as very lukewarm and vague, as no one could guess when such a time would come.

This time in Xiaoshahe was not the first time we had had such an argument. We had had a similar argument when we were forming the Revolutionary Army in Guyushu; We had also had such an argument when we confirmed the line of the armed struggle in Kalun and also when we adopted in Mingyuegou the resolution on waging an organized guerrilla war. Therefore, those who had not been leading an organizational life with us for long could not understand our intention fully. The fact that various opinions were expressed in the revolutionary ranks with regard to an important line was a good example of the incipient nature of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army.

Our unit comprised of people who had various occupations and different standards of learning, and who came from various places and organizations. Some of the young people were regularly reading such publications as Dong-A Ilbo and Choson Ilbo as well as the lecture texts for secondary schools. Others had been dreaming about transforming society after reading such novels as A Boy Wanderer by Chiang Guang-ci or Ascendance by Choe So Hae before joining the guerrilla army. Still others had no schooling at all.

However, they had been training themselves politically for several years in such revolutionary organizations as the Red Guards and the Children's Vanguard. Then they got rifles and joined the armed ranks. Therefore, it was inevitable that there were differences in the levels of their understanding of things and phenomena.

This situation encouraged us to pay special attention to organizational and political work to ensure in our unit singleness of idea, identity of action and unity of practice. We decided that, as the first process in this, we should adopt, before anything else, the measures needed to ensure identity in the understanding of the tactical principles of the guerrilla army and of our major strategic lines and that, unless we went through this process, the newly-born Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army might at the outset be in danger of meeting with disaster.

Walking around the village with Cha Gwang Su, I said the following to those who did not fully understand our tactical intention well.

"The theory of small armed groups will repeat the same method as that of An Jung Gun. It is an illusion that the Japanese imperialists can be brought to submission through terror. Although Ito Hirobumi was killed, Japan's rule remains as ever; it has even established Manchukuo and is now stretching out its tentacles to China proper."

There may be cases in which the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army needs to undertake small group activities, but the small group should not be the basic combat unit.

"The claim that we should immediately go over to full-scale armed attacks is also unrealistic. It is absurd to try to fight, with a unit of a little over 100 men, against the large Japanese army that is hundreds of thousands strong, meeting it head on. Thinking it possible to defeat a large army of hundreds of thousands by a charge of some 100 soldiers is very unrealistic. Comrades, don't underestimate the enemy, please.

"So, what should we do then? Let us wage a guerrilla war with the company as the basic unit for the time being. If we operate with a small group as a unit, we can do nothing big. If our unit increases in size in the future, we shall be able to operate by a larger unit, but for now it is best to conduct our operations with the company as a unit. You also know that we are not in a position to form large units immediately. The anti-Japanese war will not be a short war which will be over after a few battles. Therefore we must, after starting with a small force, continually accumulate and expand our military forces in the course of the war, and when the time comes, we should win the final victory through a decisive battle combined with a nationwide armed uprising.

We should constantly ensure our strategic and tactical predominance over the enemy and defeat the Japanese imperialists through an unceasing war of attrition. To this end we must, equipped with small arms and moving secretly, disperse the concentrated enemy soldiers and destroy the dispersed enemy troops one by one, avoid large enemy forces and swallow up small enemy forces.

This is guerrilla warfare and here lies the advantage of guerrilla warfare. You advocates of the theory of prudence who maintain that we should not fight but only build up our forces furtively and defeat the enemy at a stroke after waiting for a favorable opportunity to do so, do you think that such a time will come of its own accord without a struggle and sacrifice, without bloodshed? You must remember that no one will present us with the opportunity to win our independence. We must win the opportunity by ourselves through a struggle." Thus I convinced the men of the wisdom of our decision.

Needless to say, not all the men understood me immediately. Some young people did not withdraw their opinions but stubbornly stood by them. I thought that only a practical example would bring our heated argument to a close and decide on which side truth was. Thinking thus, I devoted my time to studying to decide the direction of the guerrilla army's activities.

Our unit, which had started on the ambitious course of the anti-Japanese war, was confronted with the following tasks at that time. Firstly, we had to strengthen the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army in the course of a practical struggle. Secondly, we had to expand and strengthen our unit quickly in terms of its quality and quantity. Thirdly, we had to lay a solid mass foundation for the revolutionary army to rely on, and rally all sections of the masses around it.

We discovered a way to resolve these matters in an expedition to south Manchuria and set this to be our main strategy for the year 1932.

The armed unit which we formed in Antu had specific features that made it different from those formed in other counties and districts. Whereas the guerrilla units in other counties were formed of people from the given counties, the guerrilla unit in Antu comprised vanguard elements selected from various counties in east and south Manchuria as well as farsighted people from the homeland. If the guerrilla units in other areas regarded it as a principle to carry out their operations by settling in their respective areas, our unit considered it to be its principle to operate in the area of Mt. Paekdu and in all the areas along the Rivers Yalu and Tuman instead of confining the theatre of its activities to one or two places.

From the geographical point of view, Antu was very favorable for guerrilla warfare, but we could not remain only there. Our newly-created guerrilla unit had to advance into a vast area and, exposed to the elements, grow and take root among the people. While it was true that we had to guard against the practice of hastily leaning towards a struggle alone, we could not allow either the practice of idling away our time in one place, thinking only of preserving our forces.

An important reason why we chose the expedition as the initial step of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army lay precisely in this.

The main, immediate aim of the expedition to south Manchuria was to establish contact with the units of the Independence Army active along the River Yalu. The unit of the Independence Army under Commander Yang Se Bong was stationed in the area of Tonghua in south Manchuria, and we intended to form a united front with them. The Independence Army force under the command of Yang Se Bong amounted to hundreds. The unit was known as the Korean Revolutionary Army.

At the time when the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army was founded in Antu, Yang Se Bong, in cooperation with Tang Ju-wu's self-defense army, was successfully defeating the Japanese army and the Manchukuo army. This news reached even the valley of Xiaoshahe, to our delight.

Park Hun wondered if Yang Se Bong would agree to collaborate with communists because he was a nationalist from Kukmin-bu with a deep-seated anti-communist idea. But, I said that we should make every possible effort to achieve a united front with the unit of the Independence Army. I told him that, now that we had formed an allied front with the national salvation army of China, there was no reason for us people of one and the same blood not to combine our efforts when we had a common ambition to fight against the Japanese.

I considered that collaboration with Yang Se Bong would prove successful also because I attached importance to our past friendly feelings and our personal relations; as someone who had been on extremely friendly terms with my father, Yang Se Bong loved me very much. In my childhood I heard that Kim Si U and Yang Se Bong became sworn brothers with my father in Huadian and even had their photograph taken with him. Commander Yang and my father were very close.

Had it not been for this relationship he would not have written a letter of introduction for me, a letter addressed to Whasung Military Academy, and would not have visited Yuwen Middle School and slipped money into my hand whenever he came to Jirin. In those days I was saving every penny, unable even to eat a Chinese pancake stuffed with sugar when everyone else was buying them, because of my difficulties in paying my school fees. So, I used the money which he gave me only when absolutely necessary.

After the Wangqingmen incident Yang Se Bong and I became estranged because of my disillusionment over the Kukmin-bu as a whole. However, I was no less grateful to him. It was not by chance that, at the time when I was undecided what to do after founding the guerrilla army, the first thought that came to my mind was that I must visit Yang Se Bong. It is true that in doing so I wanted to form a united front with him. However, no less was my desire to take the necessary advice and encouragement from him who had acquired combat experience over many years.

Commander Yang Se Bong was a veteran of many battles when compared with us who were excited at making an expedition without having gone through even a single battle. In the presence of those who were engaged in the national movement we had time and again expressed our resolve not to fight in the way the Independence Army did. This meant that we would not repeat the blunders of those who had not relied on the strength of the people, but it did not mean that we would ignore their military experience and technique.

When we witnessed the white terrorism committed by Kukminbu at Wangqingmen, we resolved with bitter tears not to deal with the old people of the Independence Army any more. But we decided not to consider their past faults when we shared the common noble work of liberating the country. If we took the past into account we would never be able to collaborate with them.

Besides Yang Se Bong's unit, in south Manchuria there were anti-Japanese armed units led by such Korean communists as Li Hong Gwang and Li Dong Gwang. The guerrilla unit which Li Hong Gwang formed in May 1932 was called the Panshi Worker-Peasant Volunteers. Later this unit was reformed into the South Manchurian Guerrilla Unit of the 32nd Army of the Chinese Worker-Peasant Red Army, and into the First Army of the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army.

Li Hong Gwang became famous partly because he commanded his unit skillfully by displaying remarkable resourcefulness and art of command, and also because such enemy publications as the newspaper of the Kwangtung Army and the newspaper of Manchukuo reported him wrongly to be a "woman general." That Li Hong Gwang came to be called a "woman general" was associated with a comic story which caused everyone to smile. When he returned to his base after an assault on Dongxing, Li Hong Gwang had a woman guerrilla under his command interrogate the prisoners of war. Before interrogating the captives the woman guerrilla introduced herself by saying, "I'm Li Hong Gwang." Then she demanded that they state the disposition of the policemen and their plan for "punitive operations." When the prisoners of war returned to their unit they spread the rumor, "Li Hong Gwang is a beautiful lady of about 20." This is how the rumor started among the Japanese soldiers that Li Hong Gwang was a woman general.

While Li Hong Gwang was someone who fully displayed his wit and courage as a warrior through the armed struggle, Li Dong Gwang was an able political worker who displayed extraordinary ability in the building of the party and in the political awakening and organization of the masses. His name was known widely in east Manchuria from the latter half of the 1920s.

It was Kim Jun, So Chol and Song Mu Son who told me about Li Dong Gwang. When he was attending Dongxing Middle School in Longjing Li Dong Gwang began to distinguish himself as a leader of the student movement. The news of the escape from prison of Li Dong Gwang, who had been arrested in Longjing in connection with the first incident involving the Jiandao Communist Party, reached even Jirin.

In the summer of 1930, I happened to meet So Chol in Harbin. In the course of our conversation he unexpectedly told me that Li Dong Gwang knew of me. He had told So Chol that he had seen me when Mr. Ahn Chang Ho was delivering a lecture in Jirin and then, later, when a meeting of the representatives of the peasants in the Panshi area was held in Wulihezi. So I asked So Chol to tell Li Dong Gwang, when he met him, about our strategy for the struggle and that some time we should meet each other, exchange greetings and fight hand in hand in the same trench.

Afterwards Li Dong Gwang worked as secretary of the south Manchuria Ad hoc committee and as head of the organizational affairs department of the south-east Manchuria provincial committee. However, at the time when we were making preparations for our expedition to south Manchuria, he was working as secretary of a district committee in Panshi County. As in east Manchuria, so in south Manchuria, too, the Korean communists formed the backbone of the anti-Japanese armed force.

We intended to establish contact with them, too, when we went to south Manchuria. I regarded it very good for the development of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army if the young units met one another, swapped experiences and jointly sought measures for the struggle. In the whole course of the anti-Japanese armed struggle we conducted our operations in close contact with the guerrilla units in south Manchuria. In the course of this I formed unbreakable relations with Li Hong Gwang, Li Dong Gwang and Yang Jing-yu.

Many of our organizations were in the area of south Manchuria, such as Liuhe, Xingjing and Panshi. When we were operating in central Manchuria we had sent to these areas many fine workers of the YCLK and AJYL to form organizations. We had also sent there Choe Chang Gol and Kim Won U. However, those organizations that were born thanks to their efforts had been destroyed after the September 18 incident.

If we went to south Manchuria, a favorable phase could be created in restoring the organizations there and instilling vigor into the hearts of the daunted revolutionaries. Some historians suggest that all our activities were conducted smoothly and quickly without any obstacles and vicissitudes following the foundation of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. However, a revolution is not so simple.

We had had to experience enormous psychological distress and many twists and turns until we chose our expedition to south Manchuria to be the first action of the new-born guerrilla army and put it into effect.

At Kim Jong Ryong's house where the headquarters of the district party committee had been set up, we held in May 1932 a meeting of the party and YCLK leading core elements operative in the various counties of east Manchuria and discussed the problems of conducting an expedition into south Manchuria and establishing a base. Our plan for an expedition into south Manchuria enjoyed the unanimous support and approval of those attending the meeting. Even some young people who, divided into two or three groups within the same unit, had been engaged in an extremely heated argument, willingly accepted our policy of conducting an expedition.

One day when we were enthusiastically making preparations for our expedition, Cha Gwang Su who had been appointed the unit's chief of staff, appeared before me looking serious and said:

"Comrade Commander, as we intend to start on an expedition, what about leaving Xiaoshahe as soon as possible, in a few days? There is a main road in the neighborhood, and the enemy's convoys frequently pass along it, and this is not good for us. Our food situation is also very difficult. There are only some 40 farmhouses here, but more than 100 of us are eating their food. So how can the villagers of Xiaoshahe bear it, although they are very kind?" The people of that area had joined a spring uprising because they had been suffering from hunger. Therefore, his appeal concerning the food situation fully convinced me.

But I could not agree to leaving Xiaoshahe soon simply because the main road was frequented by the enemy's convoys.

So to Cha Gwang Su, in response to his proposal that we should disappear secretly from Antu, I said:

"Comrade Chief of Staff, since we have risen in arms, what about trying a battle?"

"Do you mean it?"

"Yes, now that we have formed a unit, we should start our battle. When the enemy troops are passing very near us, there is no reason for us to sit with folded arms. When we shall have to leave, we will leave, but let us fire a shot in Antu. We cannot talk about training the men without a battle. If we succeed, I think we will be able to procure the materials we need for our expedition."

Cha Gwang Su readily consented to my proposal. That very day he went to the road with Park Hun to scout the terrain. The aim of his scouting was to select a suitable spot for an ambush. They proposed that we should keep watch at an important position on the road in Xiaoyingziling and attack a passing convoy. Their proposal accorded with my plan. I regarded an ambush to be the most suitable and universal form of combat for a guerrilla army.

Xiaoyingziling was situated midway between Antu and Mingyuegou. It was between Dadianzi and Dashahe. It was a little over ten miles from Xiaoshahe as the crow flies. Although the mountains were not steep, it was a very good spot for an ambush because there was a winding cart track through a ravine. By using this road, the enemy was supplying munitions for its armed forces in the Antu area.

A provincial organization informed us that a puppet Manchukuo army convoy of carts carrying weapons and supplies had left Mingyuegou for Antu. I took those men who were scheduled to go to south Manchuria and, after reaching Xiaoyingziling by a rapid night march, placed them on both sides of the road in ambush.

An ambush at night is not a good idea. At night when it is impossible to distinguish friend from foe an assault is more effective than an ambush. Throughout the whole period of the anti-Japanese war we laid only a few night ambushes. We, who had just started on a new road, were unaware of this principle at that time. Fortunately, the moon was full and bright so our forces would not get confused and fight among themselves.

The enemy's convoy appeared in Xiaoyingziling towards midnight. Our men in the first position who were 100 meters ahead of us signaled the appearance of the enemy. The convoy was composed of 12 horse sleighs in all.

I was so tense and excited that I could feel my heart beating. I realized then that anything one encounters for the first time causes one great shock, apprehension and misgivings. I looked at Park Hun who was lying next to me, and saw that he, too, looked extremely tense. With him who had graduated from Huangpu Military Academy and had had a taste of gunfire being like that, it was not difficult to guess how the other men were feeling.

The first small unit of the ambush let the column of carts pass. When the head of the column reached about half the length of the distance along which the second small units were laying in ambush, I stood up on a rock and fired my pistol. With that piercing sound a battle cry was raised.

We could distinguish easily between friend and foe because we had bound white cloths round our arms. However, the men of the enemy's transportation unit who had been taken by surprise, fired at random, unable to tell friend from foe. Some ten or so of the escorts desperately replied to our fire from behind the carts. The longer the battle lasted, the more dangerous it was for us.

After about ten minutes' firing we charged and wound up the battle. The enemy surrendered after suffering more than ten casualties. The number of captives was also about ten. All of them were soldiers of the puppet Manchukuo army; one of them was a Japanese noncommissioned officer.

I made a brief anti-Japanese speech to the enemy soldiers who had surrendered to us. That night we returned to Mutiaotun carrying our trophies in ten carts. Our trophies consisted of 17 rifles, one pistol, a large amount of flour which was enough to feed 100 people, for about a month, cloth and combat boots and so on. It was very impressive as first trophies.

Until after midnight we sat in a circle around a bonfire in the yard and ate a clear soup with wheat flakes in it made from the flour. It was a plain dinner party arranged in celebration of victory in our first battle. Even as I ate the soup I could not calm my beating heart. The food tasted good, but my mood was still better. Even now when 60 years have passed since then, I can still vividly remember my joy over victory in my first battle and the great excitement which I felt that night.

Cha Gwang Su who had been looking into the bonfire weeping behind his glasses, grasped my hand tightly all of a sudden and said in a choking voice: "I say, Sung Ju, now that I have experienced battle, it is nothing special." Such was the chief of staffs impression of his first battle.

My impression was the same. A battle is nothing extraordinary. Anyone can fight if only he has a gun and courage. The enemy is not so strong as we have so far regarded them to be. Look! They have surrendered to us. So, let us prepare with confidence for a bigger battle. We can win.

"How good it would be if Kim Hyok were here at a time like this. If he were alive, he would already have recited an impromptu poem. What a pity he has gone so early. Kim Hyok, Sin Han, Lee Gap, Je U, Gong Yong. . .where have they all gone!"

Cha Gwang Su was muttering to himself thus as if complaining about something as he wiped away the tears streaming down his cheeks. He was thinking about those who had left our ranks early without seeing the birth of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. I was also thinking of those who had fallen in battle while working to lay the foundation of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. I could not ease the pain in my heart as the faces of my comrades-in-arms who had died without seeing this day came to my mind. If they were all still alive, how strong our ranks would be.

With his glasses in one hand and gesturing, Cha Gwang Su made a speech in front of the bonfire. "Comrades, we have taken the first step. We have achieved the first victory. Who has done this? It is we who are sitting here."

He stretched out his arms and made a gesture, as if he was lifting the men up in his arms. He said: "Once we have taken up a gun, that gun must be fired. And once the gun has been fired, we must win. Am I not right? This evening we have annihilated a convoy of carts. It is no more than a small incident, but it is the start of our cause. The water of a small stream has left a steep mountain valley and started to flow towards the ocean." It was the first time that I saw Cha Gwang Su so excited.

That night he made a really good speech. It was much more vivid and appealing than I can convey in writing by referring to my memory. I regret that I cannot repeat the speech as it was.

He said: "Comrades, how good fighting is. It gives us guns, provisions, clothes and shoes.... This evening I have learned a great and profound lesson. Now, let us distribute the rifles we have captured. Let us shoot more enemy troops with these rifles. Then we will obtain more rifles and provisions. We will also obtain machine guns and artillery. Let us fill our rice sacks with the captured food. Let us march vigorously, eating that food. Let us make the Japanese imperialists supply us with weapons and provisions as we have done today, until the day when they are completely annihilated. This is the way for us to exist and struggle, isn't it?"

I was the first to applaud his speech. The whole audience responded to his speech with warm applause.

Then someone stood up and sang a song. I am not sure whether it was Cho Dok Hwa or Park Hun. Anyhow, the song overflowed with inspiration.

Thus, we took our first confident step.

6.2. The Last Image

---

One day when our unit was busy preparing for its expeditionary campaign my younger brother Chol Ju came to Xiaoshahe to see me. The news of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army's raid on a puppet Manchukuo army convoy led by a Japanese noncommissioned officer at Xiaoyongziling had spread widely, going beyond the bounds of Antu and as far as Dunhua and Yanji, and everywhere our victory was the topic of conversation. The revolutionary organizations in Songjiang, Dadianzi and Liushuhezi went so far as to send people to Xiaoshahe to discover the truth about the Xiaoyongziling battle.

At first I merely surmised that my brother had come on a similar errand and met him in a matter-of-fact way. But contrary to my expectation, he asked nothing about the Xiaoyongziling ambush. He spent the whole day in silence watching the foot drill of the guerrilla men and then making straw sandals in company with the men chosen for the expeditionary campaign in the room next to the headquarters. Straw sandals were one of the items stipulated by the headquarters as equipment for the campaign.

I changed my mind and decided that my brother must have come to Xiaoshahe to help in the preparations for our campaign. At nearly suppertime, when I came back to the headquarters after meeting the head of the peasant organization in the Village, Chol Ju told me he was going home. I told him he should have supper with me before going. But he refused and insisted on going. He looked as though he wanted to say something to me, but never did.

Then he nervously studied my face with a somewhat curious expression. My sixth sense told me that my brother had not come to Xiaoshahe to help in the preparations for the expedition and that he had some cause to come to see me. If he had some cause, it must have been something which had happened to my mother or to himself. So I did not go inside the headquarters but walked with my brother as far as the entrance to the village to see him off, asking him point-blank:

"Has something happened in Tuqidian?"

By Tuqidian I meant my home. Somehow I was afraid to say "at home."

"No, nothing has happened," he said, forcing a smile. A clever actor and irresistibly humorous, my brother could easily crack a smile to deceive me. But his smile then was doleful and his mouth became twisted at one corner. Avoiding my eyes, he stared over my shoulder at the distant sky.

"If there is anything amiss, you should tell me directly. If you leave without telling me, I shall be anxious, shan't I? Don't keep it to yourself. Come clean right away." Chol Ju heaved a deep sigh before reluctantly opening his mouth: "It appears that mother's illness has become critical. She hasn't even eaten a spoonful of food for two days."

His words struck me like a bolt out of the blue. I felt faint inside on hearing that my mother was not eating anything. I knew she had been ill for a long time. When we were living in Badaogou, I had scarcely seen her ill in bed. But after my father had passed away in Fusong and I had left for Jirin to go to secondary school, my mother would often be ill. Chol Ju would sometimes tell me of her infirmity in his letters. At first when I received such letters, I was afraid that she had contracted Siuitu-bing, a local disease. Many of the people in the Fusong area suffered from it.

When someone caught it, his hands became crooked, his finger joints grew thick and his throat gave him trouble, so that he was disabled. Moreover, it was said, he would die before reaching 30 years of age. This local disease was one of the reasons why, after my father's death, O Dong Jin came to Fusong and advised my mother to move out to Jirin, so that our family should not be harmed. When I came home for the holidays I found my mother ill not from the disease but from fatigue. It upset me to think that her life of overworking, living in destitution, had at last come to tell upon her health. But I was relieved to learn that it was not the horrible Shuitubing. After coming to Antu she suffered from heartburn. In those days heartburn was called a "lump."

My mother would complain that she felt as if something big were pushing upwards in her chest. Looking back now, I think it might have been stomach cancer. The doctors diagnosed it as a "lump in the stomach," but were unable to find a remedy. No medicines were effective. When she felt a movement in her chest, she would lie down in her bed and skip her meals or take a few spoonfuls of thin gruel for a meal. That was the only cure. My friends went to a lot of trouble to find a cure for my mother's illness.

All my friends who were engaged in the work of the Young Communist League would send medicines to her. When they came across an advertisement for a medicine in a newspaper and thought it might be good for my mother's ailment, they bought it no matter how expensive it was and sent it to her by parcel post. Such postal packages came from Jirin, Shenyang, Harbin and Longjing. Traditional herb doctors in the Antu area, too, spared no efforts to treat my mother. The herb doctors in Dashahe treated her free of charge.

From the bloodshot eyes and dismal expression of Chol Ju I guessed that my mother's illness was in its last stage. When I asked if there was any grain in the house, he answered that it was almost all gone. The next day I bought a large mal of foxtail millet at Xiaoshahe with money my comrades had given me and set out for Tuqidian. I reckoned one ma/ of food grain would last the family of three (mother, Chol Ju and Yong Ju) for a month and that in that time we would have returned from south Manchuria. A large ma/of grain was about 15 kilogram's.

For our family struggling along on gruel in those days 15 kilogram's of grain was a great deal, enough for a feast. But that one ma/of grain hardly satisfied me. The straps cut painfully into my shoulders, but I did not feel the weight of my load of grain. It seemed as light as a feather compared with the love my mother had shown for me.

My father had once told me the story of Li Rin Yong, the commander of the Honorable Righteous Force of the 13 Provinces. The story of this man's appointment as the commander was dramatic and instructive. When the heads of the Righteous Volunteers units in the eastern regions called on Li Rin Yong to ask him to lead their units, he was tending his sick old father who was near death. Declining their request, he said: someone else can command the Righteous Volunteers, but I cannot see my parents again once they have passed away. How can I leave my home and my old father when he is at death's door?

I do not want to be an undutiful son. But on the fourth day he accepted their request. The Righteous Volunteers hastened to rally under his command from all parts of the country. Their number reached 8,000. Some time later the units of Ho Wi and Li Gang Nyon joined them, so that the strength of the Honorable Righteous Force swelled from 8,000 to 10,000. They were further reinforced by 3,000 troops of the old national army of the Li dynasty armed with rifles. The heads of the Righteous Volunteers units from all regions of the country hailed Li Rin Yong as the commander of the Honorable Righteous Force of the 13 Provinces, and under his command they advanced to Seoul.

The ultimate goal of the Righteous Volunteers was to storm into Seoul and crush the Japanese residency-general and abrogate the Protectorate Treaty. According to this plan of operations, the Righteous Volunteers units were closing in on Seoul when Li Rin Yong received word that his father had passed away. He handed over the command to another man and went off to his home. His departure, along with the defeat of Ho Wi's troops sent out as the advance force, demoralized the men and led sadly to the collapse of the whole army.

When I was involved in the student movement in Jirin, I had an argument with members of the Ryugil Association of Korean Students on the subject of Li Rin Yong's decision to leave for home on hearing of his father's death. Many of them accused him of being a spineless commander. They argued furiously that, because he, the commander of 10,000 volunteers, went home just because of his father's death when he had before him the great task of leading his army to Seoul, he could not be called a man and a patriot.

But not everybody criticized Li Rin Yong. Some expressed their approval of his act. They said it was right, proper and natural that a man should return home and go into mourning when his father died, and even praised him as a dutiful son. At the present time a dutiful son means a man who is both faithful to his country and devoted to his parents, but in those days he who was devoted only to his parents was considered a dutiful son. I refuted them by saying that Li Rin Yong's behavior should not be taken as a model of genuine filial piety. I argued:

"Only a man who loves both his country and his family can be called a truly dutiful son. If he merely thinks much of his family and shows little concern for the national calamity, how can such a man be called a dutiful son? Now it is high time we were correcting our Confucian sense of value on filial piety. If Li Rin Yong had, after fulfilling his duty to the country and achieving his aim, visited his father's grave and, pouring a cup of wine and burning incense, bowed before it, his name would have been honored more by posterity."

This came as a great shock to the people who were steeped in the old way of thinking, their minds soaked in the feudal moral view and Confucian idea on filial piety. The members of the Ryugil Association of Korean Students, divided into two groups, argued hotly for and against what I had said.

Although it is a simple and clear question beyond any dispute for the members of our League of Socialist Working Youth and Children's Union today, it was quite a controversial problem that was difficult to decide between who was correct and who was not at the time. It took decades and a bitter, dearly-bought experience for the entire people of the country to realize and come to believe firmly that loving both their country and their family was genuine filial piety.

As I returned to my house in the Tuquidian valley carrying the food grain on my back, I recollected this episode about Li Rin Yong. For some reason I was reflecting that the behavior of the commander of the Honorable Righteous Force might have been right. It was strange that I should have discovered some justice in the conduct of a man we had all decried so vehemently as a spineless commander, that I should feel inward sympathy, and express some understanding for him.

It is difficult, even impossible, for a man to lose sight of his family on the ground that he is making the revolution. The revolution is for the benefit of man, so how could revolutionaries ignore their families and remain indifferent to the fate of their parents and wives and children? We have always regarded the welfare of our families and the destiny of our country as one and the same. When the country is in distress, families cannot remain in peace, and when the families are overshadowed by misfortunes, the country will also be afflicted. This is our theory. Because we were convinced of this we were able to take the step, unheard-of in the history of warfare, of sending a regiment behind enemy lines to rescue the family of a soldier. This was motivated by the sense of duty and moral obligation which only the communists of Korea could display.

At first I, too, tried to be faithful to this moral duty. After shifting my theatre of activity to east Manchuria upon my release from prison, I often visited my house, taking medicines which I thought would be good for treating my sick mother, while moving about in the areas around Dunhua and Antu. But this offended my mother. As my visits became more frequent, my mother called me to her side one day and said in admonition:

"If you are to make the revolution, you should devote yourself to the revolution, and if you are to keep house, then you should devote yourself to housekeeping. Choose one or the other. In my view you should devote yourself to the revolution without worrying about household affairs since Chol Ju is at home and we can make a living by ourselves."

After that my visits home became less frequent. After the founding of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army I seldom went home. I regret that now. Even though mother might have admonished me, I should have fulfilled my filial duty, I reflected in anguish. It was not an easy thing to be faithful to one's family and to one's country at the same time. As I approached Tuquidian, my pace became irresistibly faster. But my heart grew heavier with each moment. I felt distracted at the thought that I would be seeing my mother critically ill. In a pool reeds Were swaying in the wind.

The area had been called a reed field village because of its abundance of reeds. But since a few years before when Kim Byong Il's family at the lower end of the village started making earthenware for sale, this sparsely-populated out-of-the-way village had changed beyond recognition and acquired the name of Tuquidian (earthenware shop). I crossed the wooden bridge and headed towards the upper end of the village. The sight of the familiar straw-thatched house met my eyes. The untrimmed bush-clover fence was leaning to one side and the straw thatch was unkempt, so the house looked deserted. This was my home that had been untended by a male hand for years. No sooner had I pushed open the brushwood gate and entered the yard than the door of the house opened.

"Mother!" I called, running up to my mother who sat leaning against the door post, smiling. "I thought the footsteps sounded familiar," she said, beside herself with joy, as she fingered the straps of the grain sack I had put down on the earthen verandah. I had been afraid that she would scold me for coming home. But to my relief she said nothing to reprove me for coming.

Mother and I exchanged compliments for a while. As we talked, I studied her complexion, her voice and her carriage, trying to discover the state of her health. Outwardly she had changed little from the previous winter, but she was much weaker than before. Her ample bosom had grown smaller, her neck was thinner and her hair at her temples was noticeably grayer. I could not help feeling sad at the thought that time had left its lamentable marks so early on my mother's appearance. That night I talked with my mother until after midnight.

Our conversation wandered on endlessly: what place had the Japanese army reached? What would be the guerrilla army's course of action in the future? How could we join hands with Mr. Yang Se Bong? What was to be done at the guerrilla base? Mother kept leading our conversation to political topics. When mention was made of the family's livelihood or her health condition, she would hastily close the subject and shift the conversation to other topics. When I noticed how my mother tried to conceal the state of her health from me, I decided that her illness must be serious. My intuition told me that my mother's days were numbered. This made me shudder, sending chills down my spine. I gulped back my tears.

The next day, after an early breakfast, I climbed up the mountain with my brother Chol Ju. I was going to collect firewood. Looking round the house, I had seen only one or two bundles of fuel. I would feel easier in my mind if I gathered some firewood, if nothing more, now that I was back at home, was my thought. I had wished to collect enough firewood to last a few months, but the circumstances did not allow me to do so. The mountain was not deep, so there were no dead trees. I had to content myself with cutting some shrubs. "Chol Ju, isn't there something better than this?" I asked.

"Let's collect anything that comes our way. If mother finds out, she will be angry," my brother answered, hitching up his hemp trousers.

He appeared to be an innocent boy, but he was already quite clever. While using his sickle, he was always looking down restlessly towards the village. It seemed he was worried that mother would discover that we had slipped out of the house to collect firewood unnoticed by her. He was also aware that mother would be angry if I bothered about trivial household matters. Taking hold of the branches of some shrubs, I worked my sickle swiftly until my hands were raw. Towards sunset we put the firewood on our A-frames and went down to the village. When we rounded the bend from where we could look out over the reed fields, I saw my mother standing at the edge of the yard.

As I was climbing down the mountain, a stick in my hand, my mind was weighed down by a depressing thought. I felt my heart breaking to think that I would be going off on an expeditionary campaign leaving my seriously-ill mother behind. The way ahead for me looked dark. We had decided we would be back from the campaign in a month or two, but no one could tell what would be my fate and where our unit would be going. I was thinking: what if I continue with the underground struggle for a few years more? Is it not right for me to do so and call at my home once every few months to discuss household affairs and console my mother? Is that not my filial duty to my mother who has lived in hardship all her life and experienced unusually bitter mental afflictions?

If I leave Antu now, only a short time after my grandmother's departure, how will my sick mother be able to bear up, feeling lonely and support less? Yet, for all that, I surely cannot allow my own family circumstances to prompt me to revoke the plan for the south Manchurian campaign that has been decided upon as the guerrilla army's line of action for a year, can I? "Why, you are worried we may lack firewood here, is that it?" asked my mother grimly, as she stood by the fence waiting for us.

Instead of answering, I looked at her with a smile, wiping the perspiration from my face. "You are behaving strangely. You didn't behave like this when we were in Fusong, and I didn't see you do this sort of thing in Xinglongcun, but recently you have become concerned about the housekeeping," she said in a thick voice.

"I feel refreshed when I smell the scent of grass after a long time," I said and walked into the yard with an innocent look, pretending not to have heard what she said. That evening we, the four members of our family, sat together round the table for the first time after a long separation. There was a plate of broiled fish called poduichi. They tasted good. When I asked how they had got them, mother said that my youngest brother who had been extremely concerned about the lack of side dishes to serve at the table should I come had caught them and hung them under the eaves to dry. Each of the fish was as thick as a finger. I was so moved that I could not eat all of them, so I left a few.

After my youngest brother had fallen asleep mother, who had been leaning against the wall, sat up straight and said to me in a grave tone:

"You seem to have changed a little from before. I never thought you would carry a sack of cereal here on your back to support your mother. I suppose you are anxious about your sick mother. I am grateful to you for your great filial devotion, but I am not of the type to be comforted by that. In Fusong I would cross rugged hills, holding your hand, in order to expand the Women's Association. Do you think I did so to get this sort of consolation today? You have a greater cause to attend to. Don't you think you should carry out your father's will? You know there are many Koreans who are suffering in a worse state than me.

Don't worry about me, but hurry along your own way."

She trembled with a strong emotion as she said this. When I raised my head, I saw her biting her lip, unable to continue. My mother's view of life reflected in every word she spoke shook my soul violently like a storm and went straight to my heart. It was a precious moment for me. After recovering her breath for a few moments, she resumed:

"I can say the same about your gathering firewood. You might well do it if you were a man with nothing else to do.... Forget your mother and your brothers and never trouble yourself on account of the family's affairs. If you acquit yourself well of your revolutionary work away from home, my illness may pass. So you should leave at Once with your unit. That's my desire."

I answered her promptly:

"I will always bear your wish in mind. Tonight I'll sleep here and tomorrow I'll go to Xiaoshahe and start immediately with the unit for south Manchuria to see Mr. Yang Se Bong."

Tears gushed from my eyes and I turned my face to the wall. My mother must also have felt heartbroken, as she pulled to her the sewing box which was lying in a corner of the room and started sewing buttons on my uniform jacket. Suddenly for some reason I recalled what had happened during my father's funeral. My mother did not put on mourning dress or go to the burial ground. She put us three brothers in mourning dress and sent us to the funeral. Dozens of people, including O Dong Jin, Chang Chol Ho, Yang Se Bong and other members of the Independence Army, followed the coffin with my uncle, but my mother did not even go to the burial ground.

The Tano festival came round soon after my father's death and we persistently asked mother to visit his grave. She asked us what was the use of her going there, and sent us by ourselves. She made a package of offerings for us to take to the grave. She taught us minutely how to burn incense, how to pour wine and how to bow. That she refused to join us in going to the grave, I surmise, was so that her sons would not see her tears.

She would visit the grave alone. Only once did she break her resolve, when Lee Gwan Rin, who had been unable to attend my father's funeral, came to Fusong and visited his grave. My mother went to the grave with her and, when she saw her wailing sadly before the grave until she was fit to faint, asked her soothingly to weep no more. My mother was warmhearted but tearless. She was very stouthearted, something rare in a woman. My mother's amazingly strong character has left a lasting impression on my mind.

Because she was a woman of such a type my mother, despite her lonely life in her sickbed, could without hesitation urge her son to go on his way and, as if she were giving him the rod, admonish him sternly, enough to prick him body and soul, which would remain an injunction for him all his life. I think my mother was a mother above the common run of humanity. Precisely for the same reason I used to consider the late Mrs. Chang Gil Bu, mother of Ma Dong Hui, to be an uncommon mother. She met me after liberation. But she did not weep.

All the other women wept when they met me, but that mother did not. When I told her to live in Pyongyang where many old comrades-in-arms of her late son were living, she said she was going in search of the foes who had informed against her son and went back home before anyone knew.

Being unable to sleep, I went outside. I was pacing in front of the crooked bush-clover fence enjoying the cool air when Chol Ju opened the door quietly and came out onto the earthen verandah. We sat on the bundles of firewood and talked. He said he had been absorbed in the work of the Young Communist League and failed to take good care of mother, but that from then on he would behave more wisely so that I should not worry about home. I myself, to speak the truth, had wanted to ask this same favor of him, but fortunately he mentioned it first.

In the morning we prepared and ate some ground-bean mash. After the meal I went to see Kim Jong Ryong, our neighbor behind our house. I wanted to discuss the future of my brothers with him. I told him frankly that, although I had to depart for south Manchuria without delay, I was reluctant to leave Tuqidian because my worries about my family weighed heavily on my mind. Kim said that I should go, leaving all my household cares to him, and that he would look to everything, take care of my brothers and attend well to my sick mother, so that I did not need to worry. I returned home and got ready to leave. As I was fastening my shoelaces, my mother took out four five-yuan notes from under the wicker trunk and handed them to me.

"Away from home, you will have many occasions when you are in need of money. So keep this. A man must have money in his pocket in case of emergency. Your father would often say that in the closing period of the Qing dynasty in China Sun Yat-sen, who was locked up in a foreign embassy, gave some money to the cleaning man and escaped with his help."

I accepted the money, but my hands trembled. I could not put it into my pocket, at a loss what to do with it. I was well aware of how much trouble the 20 yuan had cost my mother. The 20 yuan she had earned and saved penny by penny by working her fingers to the bone doing washing and sewing for pay! At that time one could buy a cow for some 50 yuan, so that much money was enough to buy a medium-sized cow or cereal to last our family of three for a whole year.

I stepped down from the earthen verandah, tottering as if I had lost my balance under the weight of that money, and bowed my head in farewell to her, "Good-bye, mother! Peace be with you." I was thinking at that moment that my parting words should be no different from those at other times so as not to cause my mother to cry. So I pronounced the words as casually as possible and in my usual way.

"Be off quickly, for it's a journey you must make," she said nodding, a smile on her sickly face. As I turned away, I heard the door shut behind my back. I walked forward, but I could not leave the village. I began to walk around my house. The 20 yuan was still in my hand. I went round, and round, and round yet again.... As I walked my mind was torn between a thousand and one thoughts which had gripped me like a vice all night long. When will I step into this yard again? Am I trying to go on my way with any prospect of winning? What is in store for me on the path ahead? Is there any hope of my mother's illness taking a turn for the better? As I went round the house despondently with these thoughts, my mother threw the door open and scolded me severely:

"What are you worrying about that you are still here? How can a man who has turned out with a determination to win back his country cope with the great cause when he has such a weak heart and so many worries about his home? You should be thinking of your uncles who are in prison rather than worrying about household affairs. You must think of your lost country and its people. It is already nearly twenty-two years since the Japanese burglars seized our country. If you are a true man of Korea, you should set yourself a high aim and stride ahead, shouldn't you? If in the future you ever think to come home, anxious about your mother, don't turn up before this door. I won't meet a son of that sort."

Her words struck my heart like thunder. My mother looked totally exhausted after uttering these words, resting her head against the door post. She was staring at me with eyes expressing a mixture of affection, passion and anger. Her appearance reminded me of her image on the day when I arrived at Badaogou after walking a distance of 1,000 ri (250 miles).

Then she told me to leave at once for Linjiang and pushed me off without allowing me even to stay for one night. At that time I first saw as her son the stout and noble image of my mother alive with a sense of justice and radiant with ardor. She looked as though she would be burnt to a cinder in the flames of her fiery sense of justice and ardor. Until then I had believed I knew my mother, who had born and brought me up, well. But my mother with her noble spirit and soul was now looking down at me from a height beyond my reach. Her image at that time was more of a teacher than of a mother. I felt so happy that my heart seemed to burst with pride in my mother who was so excellent and so kindhearted.

"Good-bye, mother!" I took off my cap and made a deep bow to her. Then I strode off. After crossing the wooden bridge down the village street, I looked back. My mother in white clothes, supporting herself against the door post, stood watching me. That was the last time I saw my mother. Where in that weak body was her noble and indomitable soul lurking, the soul that had shaken the heart of her son so violently? If my excellent mother had not been suffering from an illness, how light I should have felt in my heart as I was walking down the road? I bit my lip to keep myself from weeping.

That was not an ordinary parting a person experiences thousands of times in his life, but the last parting which has remained a heartrending memory to me and which would never occur again. I never saw my mother after that.

A few months later the sad news of my mother's death arrived, and the first thing I felt in my heart was sharp regret at my failure to speak more affectionately to her at our last parting. But it could not be helped because my mother did not wish for a pathetic parting. Even now, in spite of my advanced age, I cannot forget that scene. People will have similar experiences several times in their life.

Each time the slightest difference in their behavior will bring about a remarkably different result in their fates and their ultimate destinies will be poles apart. If at that time my mother had betrayed her anxiety about household affairs or had uttered a single word which could unbend my resolute mind, what impact would it have made on the heart of her son who was ready to spread his wings and fly up into the sky?

From the day when I left the hill of Xiaoshahe at the head of the ranks of the newly-formed Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army, I traveled the path of bloody battles, the path of severe frost, the path of starvation beyond human imagination, together with my comrades-in-arms for decades. After that, I passed half a century of creation and construction under the banner of socialism.

Each time I ran up against an ordeal which tested my faith as a revolutionary on the rugged and thorny path I was following in the cause of my homeland and its people, I would renew my resolve by recalling the words my mother had said to me as she pushed me off to south Manchuria, and the last image of my mother dressed in white seeing me off, before seeking recourse to an ideology or philosophical proposition.

6.3. Joy and Sorrow

When the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army was moving to south Manchuria, Commander Yu also dispatched a 200-strong detachment under the command of Liu Ben-cao to the Tonghua area. Commander Yu was sending his chief of staff Liu Ben-cao, his right-hand man, to south Manchuria for the purpose of cooperating with the self-defense army led by Tang Ju-wu and obtaining weapons from him, the shortage of weapons being a serious problem for Commander Yu. The self-defence army in south Manchuria, whose headquarters was in Liaoning Province, was better equipped than Commander Yu's army.

On hearing about our expedition, Liu Ben-cao had visited Xiaoshahe. Saying that he had received an order to march to south Manchuria, he asked me to go together since we were moving in the same direction. He added that he would help me to get in touch with Tang Ju-wu and that we would probably be able to obtain weapons from him.

I accepted Liu's proposal with pleasure. Frankly, we were badly in need of weapons. The joint operation with his detachment on our march to south Manchuria could avoid any clash with Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese army units on our way and guarantee our safety. Tang Ju-wu had been the commander of the 1st regiment of the eastern frontier defense force. He had organized the Liaoning people's self-defense army in their professed cause of anti-Japanese national salvation after the September 18 incident.

He had approximately 10,000 troops under his command. Being stationed in the Tonghua area and operating mainly in south Manchuria, his army was fighting, against heavy odds, with the Japanese Kwangtung Army stationed in Shenyang. In the course of this it organized combined operations with the Korean Revolutionary Army which was under Kukmin-bu.

The Liaoning people's self-defense army, in its early days, had enjoyed high morale and achieved fairly good battle results. But when the tide turned in favor of Japan and when he found himself in manifold difficulties, Tang Ju-wu began to vacillate.

In spite of the fact-finding investigation on the September 18 incident by the Lytton commission to Manchuria from the League of Nations, the Japanese army continued its invasion into wider area, experiencing little restraint from the commission. The Japanese imperialists occupied Jinzhou early in January 1932, and on January 28 the same year provoked the Shanghai incident in a conspiratorial and brigand way.

Seizing upon the violence done to five Japanese monks in Hongkou, Shanghai, they destroyed Chinese factories and shops and killed some Chinese policemen; they further launched a large-scale armed attack on Shanghai by mobilizing marines. Japan provoked the Shanghai incident in order to make the city a bridgehead for her aggression on the mainland of China. The Japanese military leadership miscalculated that, if they occupied Shanghai in a blitz attack, they would be able to follow up their success and seize the whole territory of China at a stroke.

The soldiers and people of Shanghai launched a heroic counterattack and dealt a heavy blow to the Japanese invaders. Nevertheless, their resistance failed because of the treachery of the reactionary government of the Kuomintang led by Chiang Kaisek and Wang Jing-wei, and the Shanghai incident ended in the concluding of the humiliating, counterrevolutionary Songhu Agreement.

The failure of the resistance in Shanghai dampened the spirit of the patriotic soldiers and people, particularly the Chinese national salvation army and self-defense army who were eager to fight against the Japanese.

As the Shanghai incident and the signing of the Songhu Agreement showed, the reactionary, traitorous policy of the Kuomintang government was the greatest obstacle in the way of the Chinese anti-Japanese national salvation forces. The reactionary Kuomintang clique not only refused to assist the Shanghai people to resist, but hindered their resistance, regarding it as criminal. Chiang Jieshi and Wang Jing-wei intentionally suspended the sending of supplies to the 19th route army and seized the financial aid sent to Shanghai from various parts of China, while ordering their naval forces secretly to supply the Japanese army with foodstuffs, including vegetables. This was a shameful act of treachery.

The Kuomintang reactionaries not only avoided fighting the Japanese invaders but also prevented the people from resisting the enemy. Their guns were always leveled at the people who were fighting against the Japanese invaders. People who spoke in favor of resistance against Japan fell victims to terrorism or died on the gallows.

Chiang Kaisek went so far as to say that if China was conquered by imperialists, the people could survive, though as slaves, but that if she was ruined at the hands of communists, they would not survive even as slaves. This shows that Chiang Kaisek and his reactionary clique feared and guarded against the people's revolution more than the imperialist forces of aggression, and that they themselves had been faithful vassals and stooges of the imperialists.

Chiang Kaisek's treachery had a bad ideological influence on the upper levels of the Chinese national salvation army and self-defense army which had been related to the Kuomintang in one way or the other and which were representing the interests of the former warlords, bureaucrats and politicians.

The ever-expanding sphere of Japanese military operations also badly affected the morale of the national salvation army. In its report the Lytton commission proposed that Manchuria be placed under an international condominium, not Japan's monopoly control, but Japan ignored this and continued her military action. The Japanese armed forces pressed upon Shanhaiguan and north Manchuria. They gradually occupied the vast area of north Manchuria and concentrated their forces in the Rehe area.

Prior to their campaign in north Manchuria, the Japanese imperialists had set the intelligence services of the Kwangtung Army in motion in order to break up the Northeast Army politically and disrupt its brigades by bribing them or plotting against them so as to make them suspect one another and fight for power. When attacking Ma Zhan-shan, they drew Su Bing-wen to their side; and, after defeating Ma Zhan-shan, they crushed Su Bing-wen; in this way they destroyed piecemeal the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese army units in north Manchuria.

The disintegration of these units in north Manchuria affected Wang De-lin in east Manchuria and Tang Ju-wu in south Manchuria. Even though he had raised the banner of anti-Japanese national salvation under the influence of the people's revolutionary advance, Tang Ju-wu was acting cautiously, tending to swim with the tide.

Several of the commanders of the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese army units such as Ding Chao, Li Du and Xing Zhan-qing Were under the illusion that they could solve all their problems by relying on the League of Nations, and refrained from active resistance to Japan. They even said, "Zhang Xue-liang does not resist the Japanese army because he wants to wipe out the communist rebels. We can drive out the Japanese army only when we have wiped out the communist bandits. The communists invited the Japanese."

In the spring of the year when we were moving to south Manchuria Zhou Bao-zhong was taken captive by the Chinese self-defense army. At that time he asked the commanding officers of the army why they called their unit the self-defense army.

They answered, "Self-defence means defending oneself. How can we fight against the Japanese when it is difficult to preserve our own strength? If the Japanese do not attack us, we do not attack them. That is self-defense." That was the way of thinking and political view of the self-defense army. Tang, who had been wavering without confidence in himself, neglected the control of his unit. It was a timely measure for Commander Yu to send Liu Ben-cao to the headquarters of the national salvation army.

Our guerrilla army left Xiaoshahe on the afternoon of the 3rd of June intending to march a short distance on the first day. Guided by the head of the Peasants Union in Shahe (Xi Xiaoshahe), we crossed the River Erdaojiang and proceeded to the village of Liujiafenfang. We had planned to stay there overnight to conduct political activities. The village had been known by this name from the time when a man with the surname Liu had set up a flour mill there.

After supper we lighted a campfire in the wide yard in front of the mill. At the news of the arrival of the guerrilla army, even the people from neighboring villages came to Liujiafenfang. The organization heads of the village collected straw mats from several houses and brought dead trees and rafters for the people from the neighboring villages to sit on. The people gathered in the yard numbered several hundreds. We huddled around the campfire and talked to them until midnight. They asked us many questions. I have conducted organizational and political work among the people all my life, but I cannot remember being showered with such a heavy barrage of questions as I was at that time. I talked to the people until I was hoarse.

The first question they asked me was what type of army our guerrilla army was and what the difference between it and the Independence Army was. They knew that an Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army had been founded in Xiaoshahe a month before. It seemed a simple, straightforward question, but it indicated their expectations of the new-born army and their uncertainty about its strength.

If both the AJPGA and the Independence Army were fighting for the liberation of Korea, what was the need to complicate things by forming a separate guerrilla army? Does the newly-formed guerrilla army stand a fair chance of defeating the Japanese army when the Independence Army has failed? If so, what is the guarantee? I think these were essentially what the people of Liujiafenfang wanted to know, the people who were exhausted with looking after the Independence Army and were filled with crushing despair when they witnessed its failure.

I tried to speak in as simple and concise language as possible. I said, "The Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army is not an extraordinary army. True to its name, it is an army of the people fighting against the Japanese imperialists. It is formed of the sons of workers and peasants like you as well as other young people, students and intellectuals. Its mission is to get rid of Japanese colonial rule and realize the independence and social emancipation of the Korean nation. It is an army of a new type which differs from the Righteous Volunteers and the Independence Army. Its guiding ideology is communism, whereas the guiding ideology of the Independence Army is bourgeois nationalism. To put it in simple terms, communism is the idea of building a society where everyone, irrespective of rank and wealth, leads a free and equitable life.

The idea of the Independence Army is to build a society in which rich people are the masters; the ideal of the AJPGA is to build a society in which the toiling people are the masters. The Independence Army has regarded common people such as you as its supporters and sympathizers; we regard you as the masters in carrying out the anti-Japanese revolution. The Independence Army has expected a great deal from outside forces and tried to liberate the country by drawing on their strength; we are going to liberate the country with greater confidence in ourselves and by our own efforts.

While it is true that the Independence Army, following the Righteous Volunteers struggle, has borne the brunt of the bloody fight against the Japanese aggressors in Manchuria and the northern area of the homeland for the last ten or so years, its strength has waned to the point where its very existence is now threatened. That is why we have formed a new army. We have formed the AJPGA with the determination to accomplish the noble cause of national liberation, which the Independence Army has failed to do."

When I finished the speech, a young man from the village asked me how many thousands of soldiers there were in our army. I told him that the number did not amount to thousands but to a few hundreds, for it was still young, and that sooner or later it would amount to tens of thousands. He asked me what procedures he should follow to join the AJPGA.

I answered that there was no special procedure or formality, and that any young person who was determined to fight and was physically strong enough could join it. I emphasized that one could join it either by being recommended by one's revolutionary organization or by reporting to the army to volunteer in person. Several young men surrounded me and asked me whether I would receive them there and then if they volunteered. What luck!

"Yes, I will," I said. "But you'll have to do without guns for the time being. You must obtain guns for yourselves on the battlefield. If you still wish to join, we will accept you right now."

They agreed, and we recruited them. This batch of young men was a surprise gift from the village of Liujiafenfang to our young guerrilla army. We were beside ourselves with joy. Just imagine how we rejoiced over the recruiting of nearly 10 young men, at a time when we sometimes had to sacrifice two or three comrades to gain one revolutionary comrade. We revolutionaries who tread a thorny path, allaying our hunger by licking a snowball and sleeping in the open, can feel pleasure that the bourgeoisie and philistines can never feel.

It is the spiritual fullness we experience when we gain new comrades-in-arms. When new comrades joined us, ready to lay down their lives, and when we helped them put on their uniforms and shoulder their guns, we felt an ennobling and thrilling joy that could never be experienced in the mundane world. We believed the joy to be unique to us. That night we put on an entertainment in honor of our new comrades. Cha Gwang Su and I sang a song.

That piece of good luck came to us because the AJPGA had been the focus of public attention after the September 18 incident. Since Japan swallowed up Manchuria and the Korean people could not live in peace there, either, young Korean people in general were determined to fight a do-or-die battle with the enemy.

We sat up talking until the small hours, and spread straw mats around the campfire towards daybreak to sleep in the open for the first time since the founding of the AJPGA. The villagers chided us, saying that it would be a disgrace for them if they let the guerrillas sleep outdoors in a Korean settlement, but we slept in the open, declining with thanks to be billeted on them as the organization heads had arranged. We declined their kind offer out of our moral sense of duty, that we must not encroach on the people's interests, but I think we preferred a bivouac to a warm room out of a romantic feeling as revolutionaries.

On our way back from south Manchuria we slept overnight again at this village. There was an old potato cellar by the house of an old Chinese man named Lu Xiu-wen. We covered the walls of the cellar with corn straw, built a fire and slept there.

Seeing that we had eaten in the open and were going to sleep outdoors, the old man had told me that at least the commander, if not the whole unit, should sleep in his house. "It would be a different matter if you, Mr. Kim, and I were strangers to each other, but we have known each other since the days in Jiuantu, haven't we?" the old man said in persuasion.

I declined, and he said how sorry he was that I was so obstinate. True, he and I were old acquaintances. When my family had been living in a room at Ma Chun Uk's inn in Jiuantu, I had seen him now and then. The lively and passionate temper he had shown in those days had left a strong impression on me. Asking us how he could sleep under a quilt with a light heart when the soldiers on their way back from an anti-Japanese campaign were sleeping in the open, he kept us company until late at night.

He was responsive to the trend of the times, as were most of the villagers in Liujiafenfang. He knew that the Japanese army after the September 18 incident had invented a puppet state called Manchukuo, made Changchun its capital, renaming it Xinjing, and put Pu Yi on the throne. I still remember what he told me about An Jung Gun. He said the great man he respected most of all the martyrs of Korea was An Jung Gun.

"An Jung Gun is a great man of the East," he said. "Even Generalissimo Yuan Shi-kai composed a poem in praise of his heroic deed."

His words impressed me very much. An Jung Gun's shooting of Ito Hirobumi made him a legendary hero among the Chinese people of Manchuria. Some public-spirited Chinese people hung his portrait on the walls of their houses and worshipped him as a god.

As the old man was speaking with so much affection for An Jung Gun, I asked him casually: "You are not a Korean, so how do you know so much about An Jung Gun?"

"There is no one in Manchuria who doesn't know of him. One man even proposed to build a bronze statue of martyr An at Harbin Railway Station. I still say to my children that they should become such a revolutionary as Sun Yat-sen and such a great man as An Jung Gun. Commander Kim, now that you have formed an army, why not slay such bigwigs as the commander of the Kwangtung Army?"

I could not help but smiling at his naive suggestion.

"What is the use of killing a man like him? As a new Ito Hirobumi appeared after Ito Hirobumi was slain, so a new Honjo will emerge if we kill Honjo. Terrorism cannot serve a great cause."

"How, then, are you going to fight?"

"They say that the Kwangtung Army numbers 100,000, and I will fight them all." The old man was moved deeply by my answer; he gripped my hands and would not let go of them.

"Wonderful, Commander Kim! You are another An Jung Gun."

With a smile on my face, I said:

"Thank you, but I am not worthy of your compliment. I am not as great as An Jung Gun; but I will not live as an enslaved Korean."

When our unit was leaving the village the next day Lu Xiu-wen, sorry to be parting with us, followed us a long way to see us off. Whenever I think of Liujiafenfang, I recollect with emotion my talk with the old man.

After leaving Liujiafenfang, we bivouacked overnight near Erdaobaihe. Then on our march along a highway we encountered a scouting party from a Japanese army unit moving from Fusong in the direction of Antu. As usual we had posted a scouting party of three or four ahead of the main body on our march. The two hostile parties began to exchange fire.

Frankly speaking, I was confused, for it was our first encounter with the Japanese enemy since the founding of the AJPGA and, furthermore, an encounter with the Japanese army which boasted of its victories in battle. During the Xiaoyingziling battle we had had a detailed plan for attacking our enemy in an ambush, so we had been able to destroy them by surprise, but things were different here.

Here the enemy was not the slovenly puppet Manchukuo army, but the shrewd, well-trained Japanese army with vast fighting experience. By contrast, we were beginners who had fought only one battle. We did not know how to handle the encounter. In view of the purpose of our campaign and the basic principles of guerrilla warfare, it was advisable to avoid, as far as possible, an unprofitable engagement which might have an unfavorable influence on our long-distance expedition. An ancient book on the art of war said that one should avoid a strong enemy and attack a weak enemy.

What was to be done? The whole unit turned to me with a tense look. They were waiting for my decision. It flashed across my mind that occupying the vantage ground before the main force of the enemy could close in on us was the best way of seizing the initiative in battle; I quickly moved my unit up to the northern ridge of the hill where the skirmish was going on and some of the unit to the south of the road. We mowed them down in a fusillade from both sides.

Soon a column of fully-equipped enemy soldiers appeared on the road. We estimated the enemy as being well over company strength. On learning that his scouts had been destroyed, the enemy was trying to encircle us.

Having ordered the men not to fire until I gave a signal shot, I watched the battlefield, waiting for the enemy to come within the range of our fire. We had not much ammunition. When I let off a signal shot, the whole unit opened fire. As I listened to the gunshots coming from all sides, I tried to imagine the men's mental state. Each gun report revealed their excitement and high morale as well as their extreme nervousness.

The enemy quickly dispersed in battle order and, relying on his numerical superiority, made a fierce attack on our position from both sides, in spite of having suffered heavy casualties.

our main force posted north and south of the road to our two flanks. As soon as they had taken up their position they destroyed the flanking enemy with prompt and accurate fire. However, the main force of the enemy continued to close in upon us. We held our position stubbornly, even rolling rocks down the ridge, but the enemy continued his charge.

During a lull in the enemy's attack, I gave the order for a counterattack. While the bugle call resounded, all the guerrillas fell upon the enemy, pursuing and destroying those who retreated. Only a few of the enemy's company escaped. Kim Il Ryong never stopped shouting the war-cry, "Another has fallen!" at the enemy soldiers.

We lost several men. After burying our dead comrades on the nameless hill, we held a funeral ceremony before their graves. As I looked at the sobbing soldiers, with their caps in their hands, I made a farewell address in a trembling voice. I can't remember what I said. I only remember that when I raised my head after my speech I saw the men's shoulders heaving up and down violently and that a shudder passed over me when I saw that our column was shorter than when we were leaving Liujiafenfang.

After a while I ordered the men to resume the march. All the comrades lined up along the road, but Cha Gwang Su was lying prostrate on a grave. He could not leave the graves no one would keep, the rough graves in which his dead comrades had been buried without coffins. I rushed up to the ridge and shouted to him, shaking him by the shoulder: "Gwang Su, what's this? Won't you stand up?" I shouted so loudly and so violently that he rose abruptly to his feet. I whispered to him: "The men are watching us. Where has your indomitable spirit gone?"

He wiped away his tears and walked silently to the front of the column.

Later I long regretted my behavior that day. When I received the sad news four months after the battle on the border between Antu and Fusong Counties that Cha Gwang Su had been killed in battle, I was immediately reminded of what had happened that day. Why had I spoken to him in that way? Could I not have told him to rise in a kinder tone of voice? After losing those comrades-in-arms I myself didn't feel like eating or sleeping for several days. They were core elements and the backbone of our army who had shared joy and sorrow with me since the days of the DIU.

There would be no battle without sacrifice. The revolution always requires sacrifice. A loss of one kind or another is inevitable even in the peaceful effort to transform nature, so how can one avoid sacrifice in the armed struggle in which victory is won by employing all the weapons and other means available? However, we regarded the sacrifice in that battle as too cruel and too unfair. Granting that merciless sacrifice was inevitable in a revolution, how could we tolerate such an indiscriminate loss to our army which had just taken its first step - these were my feelings at that time.

One might say that the loss of less than 10 men was not a heavy loss numerically. Such a loss might seem next to nothing in a modern war which takes a toll of tens of thousands of lives in a single battle. But we did not count the loss of our comrades numerically. For us numbers were not a criterion for estimating the value of a man.

Each of the fighters who had trodden the path of the struggle with us was a priceless being to which nothing in the world could be compared. We believed that we would not barter one of our guerrillas for 100 enemy soldiers. The enemy could recruit tens of thousands of soldiers in a single day by enforcing state laws and military mobilization orders and hurl them onto the battlefield, but we had no such physical or legal power.

Even if we had it at our disposal, each one of our revolutionary comrades was worth his weight in gold. It needs Painstaking efforts to gain comrades who have the same idea and Purpose with us or to recruit comrades-in-arms who will share life and death with us and to rally them in an organized force.

Therefore, throughout the whole period of the anti-Japanese revolutionary struggle I did not take pride in a victory in a battle in which we killed 100 enemy soldiers if one of us was killed.

Historians speak highly of the battle on the Antu-Fusong border as a successful battle in which we destroyed an enemy company by an adroit counterattack. Of course, it was undoubtedly victory. The battle was significant not only because the young AJPGA destroyed a company of a regular army but also because we smashed the myth of the Japanese army's invincibility for the first time in our guerrilla war. This battle gave us the conviction that the Japanese army, though formidable, was neither matchless nor indestructible nor unretreating, and that we would be perfectly able to defeat the powerful Japanese army with a small force if we skillfully applied tactics suited to the characteristics of guerrilla warfare.

Nevertheless we paid very dearly in this battle, losing nearly 10 of the first sons of the DIU.

When leaving the battlefield over which gun smoke lingered, I thought, as I looked back at the hill where my dead comrades lay buried, "We have lost nearly 10 of our comrades-in-arms in annihilating a company of the enemy; so, how much sacrifice do we have to make to defeat more than 100,000 Japanese invaders in Korea and Manchuria?"

After the first battle, we all realized that we would suffer much and pay dearly in the future course of the guerrilla war. The war against Japan we fought for more than ten years after the battle on the Fusong-Antu border was accompanied with suffering, difficulties and sacrifice which can never be measured by man's conventional concept of war.

6.4. Joint Operations with Yang Se Bong?

On the route of march of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army from Antu to Tonghua, there were many steep mountains and deep valleys similar to those in the northern border area of Korea. The Changbai Mountains stretch from Antu to Fusong and the Longgang Mountains, where there are such steep ridges as Sanchaziling and Sandaolaoyeling, lie between Fusong and Tonghua.

We continued our arduous march across these mountains for about a month. In the daytime we marched along mountain paths, avoiding roads within the sphere of the enemy's observation. At night we billeted on villages inhabited by Koreans, where we conducted ceaseless political work and combat training. We stayed in Fusong for a few days to work with the revolutionary organizations there. There I met Zhang Wei-hua. He expressed his regret that our stay was short, and entreated me to stay in Fusong for two or three days more, even if only for the sake of our old friendship in our school days. I was not loath to do so. In Fusong hundreds of things had happened to me.

But we set out after two or four days' stay there as scheduled. However dear the memory of the past was to me and however strong his kind feeling was, I had to part with him to meet Commander Yang Se Bong, though I was sorry to do so. The distance from Fusong to Tonghua was said to be about 125 miles. The further we went, the steeper the mountains seemed and the more difficult the march became. The men were all exhausted from the long forced march across unfamiliar ridges and valleys. They fell ill one after another. I, too, was quite exhausted by the continued march.

When the unit was near Tonghua, Cha Gwang Su unexpectedly hurried up to me and suggested that we rest at Erdaogang for a few days before going on to Tonghua.

"We have marched for 125 miles, having refrained from staying longer in Fusong with a bad grace. Why do you propose a rest with Tonghua so near at hand? You are not like Cha Gwang Su." I asked. I was unable to agree to his proposal, though I guessed why he had made it. Cha Gwang Su removed his spectacles and began to clean them with his handkerchief before making a reply, as he usually did when he was going to insist on his opinion.

"The men are all utterly exhausted. You, too. You may deny it but you cannot deceive me. The sick men walk, supported by others. When we look so miserable, how can we meet Commander Yang Se Bong?" he said. "Yang Se Bong is not so narrow-minded that he will fail to understand."

Rhee Wha Rang: *Photo: Yang Se Bong, **, was a noted nationalist army commander. Yang's military achievements were no less significant than those of Hong Bom Doh and Kin Jwa Jin, and yet, he is not well known.*

Yang was born into a poor farming family in 1894 in North Pyongahn Province. When his father died in 1912, he moved his family to Manchuria and worked as a hired farm hand to support his mother and siblings. In 1922, he joined Jung Chang Ha's army and waged endless attacks on Japanese, pro-Japanese Koreans and Chinese puppets until he was shot in a trap set by Park Chang Hae, a Korean traitor.

Today, Yang is a national hero in both Koreas.

"A commander with an appreciative eye may understand, but what about the eyes of his several hundred men? It would be bad if we were pointed at and whispered about as a rabble, wouldn't it? I fear that our long march over hundreds of miles might come to nothing." No one could refute Cha Gwang Su's argument.

I, too, thought there was some truth in what Cha Gwang Su had said. It was fully possible that if we cut a poor figure in Tonghua, the Independence Army men would make light of the People's Guerrilla Army. If so, our long-arranged plan for a joint operation might fail. It did not seem bad to do as Cha Gwang Su had suggested, so that we could march into Tonghua in orderly array, full of vigor.

I ordered the unit to stop and camp in Erdaogang and sent an orderly to Commander Yang to notify him that the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army which had left Antu to conduct a joint operation with the Independence Army had arrived and was resting near Tonghua. We were billeted on the village of Erdaogang waiting for the orderly to return and resting after our long journey.

The headquarters was at a miller's. The old miller and his wife looked after me with all their hearts. When he saw me giving a dozen of my men a political lesson on the rules of conduct necessary in working with the Independence Army, the miller reproached me for ignoring the sincere intention of the people.

He said, "An ancient sage said 'if one speaks too much, one will lose vigor. If one rejoices too much, one will hurt feelings. If one often grows angry, one will impair one's will.' It is a rule for good health handed down from olden times to think little, worry little, work little, speak little and laugh little. If you speak much, worry much and think much, how can you preserve your health and prevent sickness? Moreover, you soldiers are going to liberate the country, aren't you?"

The old man explained to me dozens of rules of health and repeatedly stressed the need to take good care of my health in consideration of the future, since a great cause could not be achieved in a day. So I had to stop my political lecture and entrust Cha Gwang Su with it. Listening to the old man, we learned that he was a worshipper of Ho Jun and that the rules of health he had explained to us were from the Handbook on Korean Medicine.

There was no knowing how and where he acquired the knowledge, but he was well versed in the regimen. When we left Erdaogang, the old man handed Cha Gwang Su several packages of dried berries from the Chinese matrimony vine compounded with lotus pips and honey which he had kept in oil paper, and he said that he would be obliged if they were used to promote my health.

I politely declined his offer, for it was tonic compounded for the promotion of his own health.

"Sir, thank you for your concern, but I cannot take it. We young people will live without suffering from infirmity and anemia. You have failed to enjoy your life because of the various hardships you have experienced all your life. Please take the medicine and live long so as to witness the day of Korea's independence."

He was somewhat offended at this and forced the medicine on us, saying, "My days are numbered. Tonics are no good to me. You are vanguards in the fight to win Korea's independence. If we are old trees, you are young, green trees."

We left Erdaogang soon after the orderly came back from Tonghua and conveyed the news that Commander Yang had received my letter and would welcome the entry of our unit into Tonghua, and that he had told his subordinates to make good preparations to welcome the guerrillas. The men of the guerrilla army had their hair cut and pressed their trousers during their stay in Erdaogang and, by order of their commanding officers, proceeded in an orderly manner to Tonghua, marching in step and singing revolutionary songs.

When the unit marched out onto the road, I entrusted Kim Il Ryong with leading the column and had a discussion with Cha Gwang Su about the plan for negotiating with Yang Se Bong. I devoted my whole mind to the work we were to conduct with the Independence Army. Although the old man of the water mill had told me that it was the rules of health to think, worry, speak and laugh little, I could not observe such rigid rules. We had to think, care and discuss more than anyone else since what we did was a process to create everything from scratch and an original creative process of blazing a trail.

I was particularly concerned about what attitude Yang Se Bong would take towards negotiations with the AJPGA. Cha Gwang Su was doubtful about the results of the negotiations from the beginning, but I was optimistic.

When the streets of Tonghua came in view, a pleasant anecdote about Yang Se Bong suddenly occurred to me. It was an anecdote my father had told me and my mother when he, lying on his sickbed, recalled some like-minded people one by one.

On the eve of the March First Popular Uprising a project to turn dry fields into paddy fields was launched under the auspices of a mutual assistance team involving some poor peasants in Yang Se Bong's village. Yang Se Bong's family joined this team. As he knew from common sense that paddy fields were more productive, he welcomed the project. But the old people at the upper level of the team stubbornly opposed the project on the plea that they were not sure about paddy farming. With spring sowing approaching the old people argued heatedly every day with the young people.

The young people could not break the stubbornness of the old people. When the sowing season came that year, the team planted millet and barley in the dry field which the young people had wanted to turn into a paddy field. The old people heaved a sigh of relief, thinking it good that the farming of the team was proceeding without a hitch as before, without being interfered with by the young people.

But Yang Se Bong, the leader of the young people, waited for an opportunity to carry out a plan he had conceived. One night in the rice-transplanting season when frogs were croaking everywhere he Went out to the field with an ox and, unnoticed, ploughed several plots that were green with millet and barley to make them paddy fields.

The old people were surprised to see that the millet and barley field had been turned into paddy fields filled with water in a single night and thundered, "Scoundrels! May you be struck by lightning! You are ruining the farming of the team. If this year's farming fails, you shall become beggars."

That autumn Yang Se Bong gathered 24 sacks of rice from the plots which had previously yielded nine sacks of millet or barley. Marveling at this, the old people of the team said, "What a praiseworthy fellow Se Bong is!" From then on the number of families engaged in rice farming began to increase drastically in Yang Se Bong's village and the neighboring villages. The old people who had lorded it over the team came to obey Yang Se Bong meekly.

I wonder why the anecdote occurred to me with Tonghua near at hand. It is perhaps because I hoped that the negotiation with Yang Se Bong would be successful. Yang Se Bong came to Xingjing County, in south Manchuria having left his birthplace, Cholsan, on the eve of the March First Popular Uprising. It was there that my father first met him.

At that time he was serving as a military inspector in Tongui-bu. After the birth of Chongui-bu he was appointed a company commander and became a leading cadre, winning the favour of Commander O Dong Jin. His company had been stationed in Fusong. So I had met him there.

Yang Se Bong was transferred to Xingjing County again after we had moved to Fusong from Badaogou, and Chang Chol Ho came to Fusong as his replacement. When Kukmin-bu came into being as a result of the merger of the three nationalist organizations the leading cadres of the Independence Army entrusted the supreme command of the army to Yang Se Bong who was upright, had great executive ability and was popular with the people. He had great influence not only in military circles but also in the Korean Revolutionary Party involving the veterans of the three organizations.

He loved me dearly as the son of his friend, always saying that Kim Hyong Jik and he were sworn brothers. Yang Se Bong helped me financially in Jirin, together with O Dong Jin, Son Jung Doh, Chang Chol Ho, Li Ung, Kim Sa Hon and Hyon Muk Gwan.

After the Wangqingmen incident our feelings towards the upper level of Kukmin-bu grew worse and I for a long time failed to meet Yang Se Bong, the brain of the military circles of the organization which turned reactionary, but I was convinced that Yang Se Bong's love of and faith in me were constant.

All these were memories conveying to me an agreeable impression of Yang Se Bong as a man and a patriot. I did not awaken memories which might cast a dark shadow over our efforts to conduct a joint operation. I tried to summon up memories which would brighten the prospects for our negotiations. This might be attributed to a defensive impulse to drive away memories that were unfavorable to our prospects for the negotiations.

Twenty counties of the eastern peripheral territory were under the control of Yu Zhi-shan, garrison commander in the eastern peripheral territory. He had once been a general, appointed commander of the 30th army by Zhang Zuo-lin, but fell into disfavour with Zhang Xueliang because he did a poor job of suppressing the revolt of the Broad Sword Society in June 1930. Yu Zhi-shan was the supreme ruler of the eastern peripheral territory, stationing the defense force of the strength of a brigade at strategic points in the area. After the September 18 incident he formed the public peace maintenance commission of the eastern peripheral territory and became its chairman, and he collaborated actively with the puppet government in Fengtian, maintaining contact with the brass hats of the Kwangtung Army.

Assured by Yu Zhi-shan of his cooperation, the Kwangtung Army did not throw large armed forces into the area and entrusted the maintenance of public peace there to the independent garrison, the Manchukuo army and police. In those days the main force of the Kwangtung Army was thrown into north Manchuria.

Taking advantage of this opportunity the Liaoning people's self-defense army led by Tang Ju-wu and the troops of the Korean Revolutionary Army under the command of Yang Se Bong surrounded Tonghua county town. The head, Okitsu Yoshiro, and other Japanese officials of the Tonghua branch office of the Japanese consulate and their families were awaiting rescue.

Although the headquarters of the Kwangtung Army was informed that the lives of the Japanese in Tonghua county town were threatened, it sent there a rescue party of about one hundred policemen and waited for help from Yu Zhi-shan's troops, for all its forces were in north Manchuria. Yu Zhi-shan's troops, divided into two groups, closed in on the allied armies of Yang Se Bong and Tang Ju-wu from the north and the direction of Fengcheng.

The Kwangtung Army had its chief of staff Itagaki speak by radio, "Japanese in Tonghua, reinforcements from Fengtian will arrive tomorrow morning. Please hold out." So, simultaneously with the dispatch of the fact-finding commission of the League of Nations to Manchuria the armies fighting against Manchukuo and Japan in Fengtian Province were menacing the Japanese troops of aggression and the puppet Manchukuo troops everywhere. Morale was high in the Korean Revolutionary Army and the self-defense army holding the Tonghua county town.

The Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army entered Tonghua county town on the evening of the 29th of June.

The Independence Army welcomed our party in grand style, putting up the slogans "Welcome to the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army!", "Down with Japanese imperialism!", "Let us win Korea's independence!" throughout the streets. Several hundred men of the Independence Army and citizens lining the street welcomed us with applause and waved their hands. Yang Se Bong seemed to have intended to make the entry of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army into Tonghua a turning point in the extension and development of the independence movement. Our party from Antu was divided into two groups. Conducted by the representative of the self-defense army headquarters the men of the national salvation army led by Liu Ben-cao went to the houses of Chinese people to stay, and the men of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army led by me were quartered in the houses of Koreans.

Even after having conducted the guerrillas to their quarters, the Independence Army soldiers remained with us. Their reaction to our unit was better than we had expected. They envied us, saying that at the news of the arrival of a guerrilla army from Antu they had expected paupers carrying spears and matchlocks, but ours was a gentlemanly army.

That night I visited Commander Yang Se Bong at his home. He met me gladly. I first asked about his health and his wife's health and conveyed to him my mother's compliments. "Mother often spoke about you, even after she had moved to Antu. Mother said to me, 'When your father passed away, Commander Yang and his friends held a funeral for him and recommended you to Whasung Military Academy. Don't forget his kindness."

At this Yang Se Bong said, waving his hand, "Your father and I Were sworn brothers. Don't mention it. I shall never forget the encouragement I received from your father. How is your mother? I heard she has been suffering much from stomach trouble after moving to Antu." "Yes, she seems to be fairly far gone in her sickness. Recently she lies in bed more than she works."

Thus our conversation began by our asking after each other's health. I told him about the impression I had got upon entering Tonghua.

"We were all moved to tears when we saw hundreds of your men welcoming us with cheers in the street. Our hearts were light when we saw the bright faces of the Independence Army soldiers."

"Our men are not so good at fighting, but they do not neglect to offer hospitality." "You are too modest. Before leaving Antu we heard that your troop had surrounded and easily seized Tonghua county town in cooperation with the Tang Ju-wu's Liaoning people's self-defense army."

"That is not worth boasting about. The self-defense army is tens of thousands strong. If it cannot capture a walled town, how can it justify its existence?"

Nevertheless, he gave me a detailed account of the siege of Tonghua county town. After thus talking with him that day, I stayed overnight in his house. I did not say why I had come and he did not ask. I felt a little uneasy about his not asking me the aim of our expedition, but I accepted his hospitality and renewed my hope that the negotiation would be successful.

After breakfast the next day we talked in real earnest.

Yang Se Bong broke the ice, "As you know, now Manchuria has become a hornets' nest. A multitude of hornets have risen to sting the uninvited guest called Japan. Tang Ju-wu, Li Chun-run, Xu Yuanyan, Sun Xiu-yan, Wang Feng-ge, Deng Tie-me and Wang Tongxuen? all of them are hornets in the eastern peripheral territory. How many hornets have also risen in east and north Manchuria! I think if we put up a good fight by pooling our efforts we will win. What do you think, Commander?"

What he said was in line with the aim of our expedition. He had expressed his desire for a joint operation of his own accord and had taken the initiative in proposing it, and I was grateful to him for it.

I admired his broad vision with which he viewed the independence movement from the national viewpoint and gladly accepted his proposal.

"I agree with you as to fighting in cooperation with each other. We came to you to discuss this matter. I think if the armed units of Korea form an alliance and the Chinese armed units join forces with one another, and the patriots and people of Korea and China fight in unity, we are fully capable of defeating Japanese imperialism," I said.

Yang Se Bong said with a smile, "If you agree, let's discuss the matter in earnest." "But sir, the situation requires unity, whereas our nation is, to our regret, not united. Neither are the communists united nor are the nationalists. The nationalists and communists are not united with each other. How can we fight our strong enemy Japan in this way?" I asked.

"That is entirely because the Leftists are conducting a wrong policy. Since you're also a Leftist, you must realize that. Because the Leftists pushed ahead with the struggle too vehemently, they lost the hearts of the people. They made peasants despots through a tenancy dispute and disposed of landlords on the plea of Red May or so. That's why the Chinese avoid Koreans. Those engaged in the communist movement are entirely to blame for it."

This was a remark which could be heard only from those who were disgusted with every manner of violence organized by communists. But I did not think he had spoken thus because he was hostile to the workers and peasants and sympathized with the landlords and capitalists. Before he joined the independence movement he was a poor peasant who had a hard time of it. He was a tenant farmer verging on being a debtor slave who was pestered and harassed by a landlord for the payment of a debt at the end of the year and a descendant of poor peasants who had miraculously survived the years of famine, living on barnyard grass gruel mixed with radish leaves.

I did not think that he denounced the violent struggle organized by the communists because he opposed communist ideas themselves or defended their antithesis, capitalist ideas. What he ridiculed and criticized was the form of movement and methods of struggle applied by some communists, not communist ideas themselves. But, the attitude and approach to methods could not but exert an influence on the attitude and approach to ideas. The Leftist errors committed by the early communists in the guidance of the mass movement resulted in dispelling the yearning for communism from the minds of many people who aspired after the new trend, to our regret. Through my talks with Commander Yang Se Bong I again realized the great harm caused by the errors of the old-time communists.

I admitted that some communists had rashly committed Leftist errors in the mass struggle. Nevertheless, I thought it necessary to rectify Yang Se Bong's biased view, according to which he described the whole of the mass struggle as a harmful act that destroyed national unity.

I said, "As you have said, it is a fact that the leading figures of the Communist Party of Korea committed too much of a deviation in conducting the class struggle. To tell the truth we, too, suffered much because of their reckless Leftist acts. As a result, Koreans were even thought to be the stooges of the Japanese, weren't they? However, I think it inevitable that peasants rise against landlords. As you know, having been engaged in farming for many years, how much is given to the landlord and how much to the peasants in autumn? Because peasants find it hard to eke out a living, being deprived of what they have harvested at so much effort, there are tenant disputes as they strive to survive. They can't be tarred with the same brush, can they?"

Commander Yang did not respond, either because he was displeased with my arguing for the inevitability of the mass struggle or because he took my argument to be fair. That day the troops of the Independence Army held a meeting of welcome for the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Among the men of the Independence Army there were many young people who were under the communist influence of members of the DIU and political workers sent by us from Liuhe and Xingjing. The meeting of welcome was held in grand style and an enthusiastic manner, having been arranged under the auspices of these young people. The meeting was attended by many Koreans resident in Tonghua county town.

Hosts and guests in turn made speeches and sang songs. During the meeting clear differences between the characters of the men of the guerrilla army and those of the Independence Army were revealed. The Independence Army men admired the guerrillas for their free and easy character, modesty, optimism, constancy, and vigor, as well as for the good order of their unit. They most envied the revolutionary songs our men sang and our Model 38 rifles. Some Independence Army men were puzzled and said, "Where did such a sturdy army suddenly appear from?" and others said, "I hope that we reach an agreement as to a joint operation with you."

What is the result of the talks with Commander Yang?"

Commander Yang visited the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army to inspect the soldiers I had brought. Our soldiers welcomed him warmly with applause and a military salute. But Commander Yang made an anti-communist speech, which changed the welcoming atmosphere into a hostile one.

He said, "To win the independence of Korea one must first of all refrain from acts that benefit the enemy. But the communist party is now acting in the favor of the enemy. They set workers to fight with capitalists in the factory, peasants against landlords in the countryside and, advocating sex equality, wives against their husbands within the family. They sow the seeds of discord within the nation and set up barriers of distrust between nations, advocating expropriation and the overthrow of oppressors on the slightest excuse." All our men were enraged at his speech. Cha Gwang Su turned pale and gazed at him with reproachful eyes.

I, too, disapproved of Yang Se Bong's speech which was run through with anti-communism. I wondered why he made such a speech.

"Sir, we are not doing things beneficial to the enemy. We fight for the liberation of the Korean nation and for the interests of the working people. To achieve the independence of Korea the struggle should be led by the workers, peasants and other working people. The efforts of a few patriots and heroes in the old fashion are not enough."

When I made this remark, our men began to attack Kukmin-bu unanimously: Wasn't it beneficial to the enemy for Kukmin-bu to have murdered six young patriots at Wangqingmen? How does the Kukmin-bu group dare to treat us roughly on the excuse of our so-called helping the enemy, after committing such a great crime before the nation?

Offended by this, Yang Se Bong slandered us. He went so far in his attack on us and so departed from etiquette that I was astonished. The way he reproved us, losing his reason, seemed somehow strange to me. I wondered whether what I had said hurt his self-respect and whether someone undesirous of a joint operation had spoken ill of us to him. Anyway, there must have been a reason why he was so offended.

But I talked patiently to him, saying, "Sir, why are you so offended? It will take time for you to know what we are like, won't it? I think your men and my guerrillas should meet each other frequently to gain a mutual understanding."

Yang Se Bong did not respond to this.

I returned to my quarters with a hope and the confidence that if we persuaded him patiently we would bring him over to our side, though he was firm in his anti-communist attitude. It can be said that a lack of belief in others is a manifestation of exclusivism, while belief in others is the greatest manifestation of humanitarianism. I held that the best humanitarianism for patriots who were deprived of their country was to achieve national unity and deliver their parents, brothers, sisters and compatriots through the concerted efforts of the nation. To achieve this aim I had visited Yang Se Bong at the head of the unit which had been born just one month before.

Then on the day of the breakdown of the negotiations I was informed by a member of our organization in Tonghua that the Independence Army was plotting to disarm the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. I could not believe that Yang Se Bong had hatched the plot, but we withdrew promptly from Tonghua as a precautionary measure. Thus I parted from Liu Ben-cao, too.

The men of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army were in a gloomy frame of mind when they left Tonghua to avoid a conflict with the Independence Army, having failed to reach an agreement on a joint operation against Japan which was urgently needed. Cha Gwang Su trudged at the rear of the column in silence, looking into his memo-book in which an itinerary was written.

"Comrade Gwang Su, why are you so sulky and angry today?" I asked him with a smile, guessing his feelings.

He put the memo-book into his pocket and said in an angry voice, "Should I smile at this time? Frankly speaking, I am furious. We came 250 miles in haste, bleeding, but it came to naught."

"Why do you, the chief of staff, regard the negotiations with the Independence Army only as a failure?"

"So they were a success, not a failure? Anyway Commander Yang intended not to conduct a joint operation but to disarm us, didn't he?"

"You, the chief of staff, saw only the looks of those at the higher level, and not those in the lower echelon. How the Independence Army soldiers admired and envied our guerrilla army! I attach more importance to that than to a rumor about disarming us. What is important is not the looks of those at the upper level but the attitude of those in the lower echelon. In this I see the future joint operation."

Though I said this, I had no firm confidence in the future alliance. I only expressed my presentiment and hope.

In fact I was in mental agony. I was pained at the thought: Why is it so difficult to agree to a joint operation of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army and the Independence Army who are of the same nationality, while cooperation between Commander Yang and Tang Ju-wu and that between Commander Yu and us who were of different nationalities were agreed upon? Is joint operation with Commander Yang impossible?

Whether the Independence Army had plotted to disarm us or not remained unknown for a long time. Although I thought the information was true because it was supplied by a member of our organization, I hoped it was groundless. Even if it was true, I had no mind to blame Commander Yang for it. A man's thinking has limitations and it takes enormous time and experience to overcome them. Therefore, when we left Tonghua then, I did not draw a hasty conclusion that cooperation with the Independence Army was impossible.

I rather hoped that some day Commander Yang would understand our real intention and the time would come when he would open the door to cooperation. Patriotism can be compared to a stream flowing into a sea called alliance with communism.

Commander Choe Yun Gu of the Independence Army who defected to the Korean People's Revolutionary Army at the head of his troops many years later wistfully recalled with me the summer of 1932. According to Commander Choe it was not Yang Se Bong but a staff officer under him who plotted to disarm the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Commander Yang wanted to agree on cooperation with the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army but the staff officer spoke ill of us behind our backs, advocating anti-communism, and together with his trusted henchmen hatched a plot to disarm us.

Choe Yun Gu's remark entirely cleared our suspicion of Commander Yang. When I heard that Commander Yang was constantly pained because of the rupture with us and that he was not involved in the plot against us, I felt relieved. It gladdened me that I could again confirm that he was a pure patriot and had an unstained sense of duty, though he is now dead. I am particularly happy when a man I have taken as good remains good even after decades and my good impression of him is not impaired.

Yang Se Bong's error was that he had failed to see the enemy's evil design. He was upright and resolute, but did not know that the staff officer under him was plotting to wreck cooperation with us. Commander Yang failed to see his ulterior design in viciously slandering us. He died regrettably because he was taken in by an enemy's trick.

It was in his latter years that Commander Yang Se Bong switched over from anti-communism to an alliance with communism. The situation in the Independence Army was then very complicated. The subversive activities of the secret agents and their corrupt henchmen became grave and the numbers of stragglers and deserters increased from day to day. On the other hand, the voices calling for cooperation with the communists grew louder.

Yang Se Bong could not ignore the communists any more. Admitting that an age of upheaval had come in which the communists had appeared as the main force of revolution in Korea and China and were exerting a great influence, he reviewed his attitude to communism and in the course of this decided to cooperate with the communists.

Commander Yang, who had failed to decide on cooperation with us, falling prey to a misunderstanding of communism and unintentional hostility, switched over to an alliance with the communists. It was a remarkable event not only in his life but also in the history of the struggle of the Independence Army. That he abandoned anti-communism and chose the path of cooperation with the communists can be proved by the fact that he conducted a joint operation with Yang Jing-yu. He had a mind to cooperate with us as well.

The Japanese imperialists were particularly fearful that Yang Se Bong's army would join hands with us. A joint operation of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army and the Independence Army would mean the political and military unity of communists and nationalists in the national liberation struggle in Korea. This was a great threat to the enemy.

The Japanese military police, police and secret service hatched a plot to murder Yang Se Bong and break up the Independence Army from within. The plot was carried out by the military police in Fentian and the Fukushima Agency under the government-general in Korea. The "Tongbyondo flying corps of the secret service of the Kwangtung Army" also kept watch on and shadowed Yang Se Bong.

Over 100,000 yuan is said to have been appropriated as secret funds for the operation to murder Yang Se Bong. Secret agents in Xingjing, including Park Chang Hae, were enlisted in the operation.

After having worked out a scheme to lure Commander Yang, the enemy dispatched the traitor Wang, who had cooperated with the Independence Army and maintained contact with it at ordinary times. One day Wang visited Yang Se Bong and said that the Chinese anti-Japanese army wanted to meet him to discuss helping the Independence Army. Foolishly believing him, Yang Se Bong went with him to Dalazi where he was told the anti-Japanese army was waiting for him.

Suddenly on the way Wang produced his pistol and shouted, "I'm not the Wang Ming-fan of old. Surrender to the Japanese if you want to stay alive."

When Commander Yang took out his weapon and shouted at Wang, the enemy who were lying in ambush in a sorghum field shot him to death.

As Choe Il Chon said, "Park Je Sang's advice to prefer punishment by Korea to serving the Japanese Emperor" was the spirit of the late Commander, and it struck terror into the hearts of the enemy.

I sometimes think that if he had taken the path of an alliance with communism his fate might have been different. Of course, I say this out of my lingering regret over his death. "I die and cannot fight Japan any more, but you remain alive and seek and go to Commander Kim Il Sung. That is the only way to survive."

Leaving this instruction to his subordinates, Commander Yang closed his eyes. It was a declaration of cooperation with the communists made by a patriot on his death bed, removing the barrier of anti-communism. Over 300 men of the Independence Army who had welcomed us in the streets of Tonghua came to Mt. Paekdu, led by Commander Choe Yun Gu four years later, to join the Korean People's Revolutionary Army. I met them in Huadian.

The Koreans in Huanren County buried Commander Yang's remains in a grave that was level with the ground so that the enemy would not find his body. But the Japanese troops and police found his body and dug it up, beheaded it and hung the head up in the street.

Commander Yang's bereaved family were very badly treated. Persecuted by the Japanese troops and police, they changed their surname Yang into Kim and led a secluded life in a mountain village in Huanren over 250 miles from a railway.

After liberation I sent people to south Manchuria and had Yang's bereaved family brought to the homeland. His wife Yun Jae Sun, his son, daughters and sons-in-law returned to the homeland.

"Madam, having lost your husband and having been persecuted by the Japanese troops and police, you must have had a hard time of it." When I greeted her with these words, she wept, her shoulders shaking.

"General, now that I have seen your face I feel as if all my sorrows have vanished. Being driven from place to place is no great trouble. But you must have had a hard time of it, driving out the Japanese."

"I failed to get in touch with you because I was busy fighting the enemy. Excuse me."

"General, don't mention it. We in the mountains heard news of you. When I heard news of you I inwardly reproached my husband for having died in a foreign land without following you."

"However, Commander Yang put up a good fight without yielding to his last days."

Later we sent his son Yang Ui Jun to Mangyongdae Revolutionary School. Kim Gu who visited the school on the occasion of the April Joint Conference of the Representatives of Political Parties and Social Organizations of North and South was surprised to see Commander Yang's son there.

"I never imagined that the north Korean authorities would educate the son of the Commander of the Independence Army in this school where the sons and daughters of guerrilla fighters are being educated," he said.

"This school is attended not only by sons and daughters of guerrillas but also by those of the patriotic martyrs who were engaged in the trade union and peasants' association movement in the homeland. We make no distinction between the patriots who laid down their lives for the country, whatever group they belonged to," I said.

Moved by this, Kim Gu said, “The school is the symbol of national unity.”

Yang Ui Jun became a political worker in an air force unit after leaving school, but he was killed in a plane crash after the war. I was very saddened by the news. I feared that Commander Yang's lineage might be broken. Fortunately Yang Ui Jun left a son behind him. He was named Yang Chol Su. But he was crippled with polio. The Party saw to it that he was given the same education at primary school, senior middle school and then university for 14 years as other, healthy, boys were. His comrades carried him on a wheel chair and to and from the classroom on the 17th floor of the university building every day for four years while he attended Kim Il Sung University. Our second and third generations' respect for the patriotic martyrs was thus manifested in the warm affection shown for the crippled grandson of the martyr. Yang Chol Su has become fully-fledged writer for the Republic and creates literary works in bed.

He has two sons and a daughter. They are Yang Se Bong's great-grandsons and great-granddaughter. On harvest moon day they and their parents visit their great-grandfather's tomb in the Patriotic Martyrs Cemetery. They probably do not know what distressed and anguished their great-grandfather during his lifetime.

I hope that the burden of the question - anti-communism or an alliance with communism - will not weigh on these innocent children.

6.5. With an Ideal of Unity

---

We speeded up our march towards Liuhe. Liuhe, along with Xingjing, Tonghua, Huadian and Panshi, was widely known as an important operational base of the Korean independence movement in south Manchuria. Many fighters of the new generation who aspired to communism, as well as the independence fighters of the previous generation, were operating in that region. The Sinhung Training School which was famous as the first military academy in the history of the independence movement of Korea was located in Hanihe, Liuhe County, in south Manchuria.

We had decided on Liuhe as our destination in order to conduct extensive political work for expanding the mass foundation of the AJPGA in that area. We had also intended to launch an intensive campaign to give the masses revolutionary training and expand the ranks of the guerrilla army not only in Liuhe but also in Sanyuanpu, Gushanzi, Hailong, Mengjiang and other places on our way back to Antu. This was one aspect of the strategy of our campaign in south Manchuria.

On our way we stopped at Sanyuanpu, Gushanzi, Liuhe and Hailong to work with the revolutionary organizations there.

After the September 18 incident the revolutionary organizations in these areas had been severely disrupted by the enemy's white terrorism. Most of the organizations which the communists of the new generation had formed over several years at the cost of their blood and sweat had been disrupted or disbanded. Some organizations would never be reactivated because all their members had been killed or arrested.

Hailong had suffered most because of the September 18 incident. The Japanese consulate was situated there and the enemy had struck deeper root there than in any other area. Everywhere we went, there were people who had been trying hard to re-establish contact with their organizations.

In all the places where we stopped we met members of the primary party organizations which had been expanded from the first parent party organization, as well as core members of the YCLK and the AJYL and leaders of the Peasants' Union, the Anti-Japanese Women's Association and the Children's Expeditionary Corps. We acquainted ourselves with the activities of these organizations and discussed with them the immediate revolutionary work and fighting tasks. In the course of this I learned that there were some problems that could not be overlooked with regard to the tendency and way of thinking of the members of the revolutionary organizations in these areas.

The first problem was the defeatist tendency which had become widespread as a result of the September 18 incident.

This tendency found expression first in the fact that people were thinking that things were hopeless since Manchuria had been occupied by Japan. Quite a few people were thinking that it was useless to wait for Korea's independence, or that there was no knowing when Korea would become independent, because Japan, who had defeated Qing and Russia, the largest country in the world, and occupied Manchuria, was now casting her covetous eyes on China proper, because the US and British armies, powerful as they were, would not be a match for the Japanese army, and because Japan might even occupy the whole world. The illusion about the Japanese army that had been created by its victory in the Sino-Japanese war and the Russo-Japanese war became exaggerated and widespread around this time.

Some people even thought that it was empty talk to say that the Korean nation could defeat Japanese imperialism on its own. Such an opinion might lead to a capitulationism idea that there was no need to fight for the revolution when there was no hope of success. Without overcoming this defeatism, it was impossible to rally the people and enlist the broad patriotic masses in the revolution.

We selected the commanding officers and men who had been well-qualified politically and practically, and sent them among the masses to give them public lectures and explanations on the subject of the September 18 incident and the future of the Korean revolution. The audience was interested mainly in news of our battle against the Japanese, and particularly in the size and the tactical and strategic principles of the AJPGA. I repeated the speech I had made to the people in Liujiafenfang and the audience applauded.

The most popular topic in our lectures and conversations was the story of the battle on the border between Antu and Fusong Counties. When compared to the victory of Japan in her sweeping conquest of Manchuria that resulted in the setting up of Manchukuo, our victory in the battle that destroyed a company of the enemy was insignificant. But the people listened to our account of the battle with the utmost interest. They were struck with admiration at the news that the young AJPGA which had just made a start had destroyed a company of the Japanese army on a road in broad daylight when Japan was lording it over Manchuria. They wanted to know all the details of the battle, even how the enemy had given up resistance to our counterattack and run away. They showered us with a barrage of questions. We had to repeat several times the same details in the same place.

When I reviewed the people's impressions of the result of the battle on the Antu-Fusong border, I realized once again that actions were more effective than words in convincing the people of the possibility of winning independence by the efforts of our nation, and that it was important to demonstrate the strength of the guerrilla army through actual battles. Another problem arising in the people's tendency was that some young people, with the founding of the AJPGA, regarded the armed struggle as absolute and underestimated the underground revolutionary activities. They were neglecting their organizational life, thinking that it was pointless to hold meetings and discussions and scatter leaflets every day at a time when the enemy was crushing anything with its tanks, artillery and aircraft, and that it would be more worthwhile for them to rise in arms and kill even one Japanese than to conduct underground activities.

They did not realize that the armed struggle was undertaken by a nuclei trained in an organization and that it was impossible to form armed forces and expand their ranks without a large organizational reservoir. It could also be called an aftermath of the Left infantile disorder resulting from the September 18 incident.

It was not very difficult to bring home to them the fact that the reservoir of the AJPGA was organizations, that a revolutionary struggle was inconceivable and could not be carried out without the organizations, and that if the organizations were not active, the life of the gigantic organism called the revolution would come to an end. We tried to convince them that the Korean communists were able to form AJPGA units in various parts of Manchuria and launch the armed resistance entirely because the revolutionary masses had carried out their activities faithfully in their organizations.

Another problem with the people in south Manchuria was the tendency to respond to the terrorism of the Kukmin-bu with terrorism. In those days the Kukmin-bu reactionaries were intensifying their terrorism against the communists in south Manchuria and the progressive nationalists who were attempting to alter its principles.

The members of the YCLK and AIYL in the Liuhe area insisted on responding to the Right-wingers of Kukmin-bu who had indulged in terrorism. They would not accept our reasoning that it was harmful to react to Kukmin-bu terrorism with terrorism. They insisted that if nothing was done by force to deter them from committing terrorism, it would only encourage them to further terrorism.

I had to explain at length why terrorism in return for terrorism was not just and proper and why it was reckless and would do great harm to the revolution.

I told them to this effect: needless to say, Kukmin-bu, by killing patriots, is committing a serious crime that can never be redressed, and losing stalwart patriots at the hands of our compatriots is a tragedy for us all, a tragedy which we can do nothing to stop; for this crime Kukmin-bu will be cursed for ever by our nation and by posterity; of course, I understand why you have labeled it as a gang of murderers and resolved to take revenge; but we must think deeply why something so disgraceful happens before we take up an avenging sword; we must not assume that all the people in Kukmin-bu are evil on the ground that it has degenerated into a den of Right-wing nationalists; the problem is that the Japanese imperialists, in order to make it reactionary, have smuggled their agents into it and are plotting ceaselessly to break it up; alarmed at the emergence of a new progressive group in Kukmin-bu, they have been cunningly encouraging a split and conflict within the organization; if we destroy Kukminbu by terrorist means, only the Japanese will be happy and benefit from it; therefore, we must ferret out the Japanese agents in it and lay the enemy's plot bare while isolating its reactionary upper level; let none of us forget that unity is the guarantee of national resurrection.

At this the young people nodded. While correcting these tendencies, we gave the comrades in south Manchuria the tasks of restoring the disrupted organizations as soon as possible and rallying more people around them, of training hardcore elements and sending them to the armed force, of expanding the party organizations by recruiting young communists of worker and peasant origin who had been tested in the practical struggle, and of improving the work with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese armed units.

When we were staying in the areas of Sanyuanpu, Gushanzi, Liuhe and Hailong, many young people volunteered to join the army. This could be called a result of the political work we had conducted in south Manchuria.

In order to solve the difficult problems in promoting the revolutionary movement in Liuhe, we had to enhance the role of Choe Chang Gol and other members of the first party organization and the hardcore members of the YCLK who had been sent to work in this area. Therefore, we tried hard to discover the whereabouts of Choe Chang Gol with whom we had lost contact the previous year. If we met him, we could hold a serious discussion on intensifying the revolution in south Manchuria to suit the new situation in which Japan had occupied Manchuria and we had started the armed struggle. We could show him the direction for his work. Choe Chang Gol was our representative in south Manchuria, so to speak. Liuhe was the area in which Choe had operated, according to the decision of the DIU, and a place with which he was greatly associated. He had served as a soldier of the Independence Army there and had been recommended to Whasung Ulsuk School by Yang Se Bong.

After the closure of the school, he went back to his former company and, serving as adviser to the Independence Army, devoted all his energy to expanding the DIU's influence in Liuhe and in the wide area of south Manchuria. In Liuhe he took part in a raid on the branch of the Japanese consulate in Jinchuan county town.

The rapid expansion of the ranks of the DIU in Liuhe, Xingjing and other places in south Manchuria could be attributed not only to the unrelenting efforts of Kim Hyok and Cha Gwang Su but also to the titanic struggle and the efficient and seasoned working ability of Choe Chang Gol who could be called the master of that area. He went into the Independence Army, a forbidden area for the new ideology, and did not hide the fact that he was a communist while he lived among them; on the contrary, he actively awakened the progressive Independence Army soldiers to consciousness and transformed many of them into adherents of communism. He conducted work with people on so large a scale and in so daring a way that his superior officer connived at it, instead of reporting him to his seniors, even when Choe did political work for months 4 kilometers away from the area where his unit was stationed.

Liuhe had been under the strong influence of the factionalists and the conservative nationalists who were indulging in an anti-communist conspiracy. Those from the M-L group formed an organization called the Residents' Association in Panshi County in opposition to the nationalist organizations in south Manchuria. Inside the Independence Army which was on the verge of division because of the antagonism between the progressive group and the conservative group, some Left-wingers who aspired to socialism, joining hands with the Tuesday group and the Seoul-Shanghai group, were speeding up their efforts to form a national single-front organization.

Hyon Muk Gwan, Ko I Ho and other conservatives launched a wide reactionary offensive against those aspiring to communism. In this complicated situation Choe Chang Gol formed an AJYL organization in Liuhe and expanded it rapidly.

The factionalists tried to find fault with him, saying that the ALYL in Liuhe was not a proper organization since the General Federation of Korean Youth in China was the one and only organization of the Korean youth in China. The factionalists from the M-L group infiltrated alien elements into the Liuhe AJYL to break it up from within. They recruited dozens of young men from Panshi and summoned them to Danigou to form a terrorist organization called Cudgel; then, they gave the police the false information that the Independence Army was plotting a riot in Sanyuanpu and, in cooperation with the police, attacked the cadres of the AJYL.

Choe Chang Gol checked their shameful act and rescued the hardcore members of the league from the assault.

He did not retaliate against the provocations of the factionalists by resorting to arms. By nature, he was broad-minded in his approach to people and in handling affairs. When he met me in Kalun later, he said that he was very surprised that he had not lost his reason and had refrained from opening fire when he saw AJYL members spitting blood and having their flesh torn by the cudgels of the factionalists.

Cha Gwang Su was delighted at our going to Liuhe. He did not hide his delight, looking forward as he was to seeing Choe Chang Gol. Cha Gwang Su, like Choe Chang Gol, knew Liuhe. When Choe, with a pistol at his side, had been working under the command of Yang Se Bong, Cha taught the children there. At that time they had become comrades sharing the same idea. "I am fastidious about people, but I lost my heart to Cha when I first met him. He appears boisterous, but he is a man. He has ten Karl Marxs in his head."

Once Choe Chang Gol said, jokingly, as he recalled their first encounter:

"If I were a girl," Choe continued, "I would not hesitate to marry that boisterous fellow. It seems the girls in Jirin are all blind." Cha Gwang Su smiled at his joke.

In his days in Jirin Cha Gwang Su was still a bachelor. Choe Chang Gol always said he would arrange a match for Cha and accompany him to his house on a horse on his wedding day. Whenever they met they would joke openly with each other, one claiming to be older than the other, so the other should respect his elder. Their friendship was intimate and deep enough to stir the envy and jealousy of everyone else.

It can be said their friendship was further strengthened during the days when they were expanding the ranks of the YCLK and the AJYL in the areas of Liuhe, Xingjing and Tieling. Choe Chang Gol, with Cha Gwang Su, formed the Gushanzi branch of the Young Communist League of Korea and set up enlightenment organizations called institutes of social sciences in Xingjing, Liuhe, Panshi and in several other counties in south Manchuria, with Wangqingmen as the center.

The institutes had the mission of studying and propagating Marxism-Leninism and the guiding theory of the Korean revolution. Its mode of operation was similar to that of a correspondence course today. It summoned young people and gave them lectures for about a fortnight at the end of the farming season and enlightened its members by giving them lessons at home once every few months and by posting the necessary study materials to them for the rest of the year. The members of the institutes studied by themselves what they had learned in the lectures, referring to the materials, and held a discussion once a week; they fully digested the materials by a question and answer method through correspondence if there was a subject that was difficult to understand.

When I heard Cha Gwang Su's explanation of the activities of the institute of social sciences in Liuhe in the autumn of the year when the conference of the General Federation of the Korean Youth in South Manchuria was convened, I could only admire the original and fresh mode of its operation and I praised the three comrades (Choe Chang Gol, Cha Gwang Su and Kim Hyok) who had been running the institute as people who had done a lot of creative work. The method they had created in practice showed that, if we racked our brains, we would be fully able to educate the young people to make them pioneers of the times and trail blazers of history even in the difficult circumstances in which we were conducting an underground struggle.

As I led the column towards Sanyuanpu, looking forward to meeting Choe Chang Gol soon, I felt my heart beating no less than Cha Gwang Su. Two years had passed since we parted with one another after forming the first party organization in Kalun. In those years he had formed party organizations and expanded various mass organizations in the wide region of south Manchuria including Liuhe, Xingjing, Hailong, Qingyuan and Panshi, and commanded a unit of the Korean Revolutionary Army, busying himself with recruiting men and making the material preparations that were necessary for building a standing revolutionary armed force. In the spring of 1931 he had renamed the Jijiang command of the KRA the eastern revolutionary army and taken command of it. The liaison officer who had brought this news to me from Choe Chang Gol had told me that Choe had been having a great deal of trouble in his conflict with the reactionary group of Kukmin-bu.

Communications with Liuhe had been broken since then. I had been feeling anxious about this. I was uneasy not only because he was an inherent adventurer and optimist who would devote himself unsparingly to any task, but also because he was a communist operating under the eyes of the reactionaries, within the framework of Kukmin-bu which had begun to regard terrorism as an all-powerful means. He was on Kukmin-bu's blacklist, so to speak. Towards the end of the year when the Wangqingmen incident happened, the Kukmin-bu reactionaries had attempted to arrest six young communists, including Choe Chang Gol and Choe Duk Hyong, and execute them at Daougou. This is recorded in history as the Liuhe incident.

Since this incident the progressive forces within Kukmin-bu who had been aspiring to the new ideology had denounced the reactionary group bitterly. Choe Chang Gol, who might have been a victim, had been furious, saying that he would take revenge on the fascist leadership of Kukmin-bu.

On being informed of the incident, I had sent Park Gun Won to Liuhe with a letter which read: "A clash with Kukmin-bu, in any form, will be utterly destructive. There should not, and cannot, be bloodshed among compatriots who are opposed to Japanese imperialism. We endured with tears in our eyes the grief of losing six of our comrades in Wangqingmen. Be cautious in everything and do not act on impulse."

After the Liuhe incident Kukmin-bu had split into two camps at an executive committee meeting and a conference of the Korean Revolutionary Party held in August, 1930. Hyon Muk Gwan, Yang Se Bong, Ko I Ho, Kim Mun Go, Yang Ha San and others persisted in their conservative policy, whereas Ko Won Am, Kim Sok Ha, Li Jin Tak, Li Ung, Hyon Ha Juk, Lee Gwan Rin and other young figures, opposing the implementation of this policy, had labeled the Korean Revolutionary Party as a fascist political party which opposed the people's views, and proposed a new, innovative principle that the party should be dissolved and that the proletariat should be made the vanguard of the class struggle so as to provide leadership for the Korean peasants in Manchuria.

Owing to their contradictory ideals, the two groups had fought to bring down and bury each other.

The Kukmin-bu group had, with the connivance of the Fengtian provincial administration, even bribed Chinese officials and the military police and enlisted them in purging the anti-Kukmin-bu group by terrorist means. They had assassinated five of their opponents, including Li Jin Tak. In retaliation the dissidents had raided Kukmin-bu headquarters and shot Kim Mun Go, the 4th company commander, to death. Later the dissidents had announced their secession and formed an anti-Kukmin-bu committee with the aim of toppling Kukmin-bu. My worries about the safety of Choe Chang Gol were founded on this political base. At a place not far from Sanyuanpu I gave the order to speed up the march. Our anxiety to see Choe as soon as possible spurred us on.

In Sanyuanpu we were struck dumb when we heard the news about him. The organization members there said that he had been killed. According to them, he had been arrested by the Right-wingers of Kukmin-bu while guiding the work of the Gushanzi branch of the YCLK and had disappeared. A young man called Park from the Gushanzi branch of the YCLK confirmed this story. He had come to us after hearing the news of the arrival of the AJPGA. He told us that the Kukmin-bu terrorists had lured Choe to Jiangjiadian in Jinchuan County and killed him, and had spread the rumor that they had executed him because he was a secret communist agent. Some said he had been killed while operating between Hailong and Qingyuan.

Anyway, it seemed that there was no doubt that he was dead. I was so furious that I could neither speak nor cry. How could he, one of the builders of the DIU who had at all times been passionate and considerate, leave us without a word of his death! This caused further overwhelming grief for us after our bitter experience on a nameless hill on the border between Antu and Fusong Counties. The death of such a loyal comrade-in-arms as Choe Chang Gol at the historic juncture when the armed struggle had started with the birth of the AJPGA and when the rumbling of its guns was heralding the advent of a new era over the vast area of Manchuria, was a heart-rending loss to our revolution.

Cha Gwang Su, sitting beside me on the grass that had withered under the scorching sun, was shedding copious tears.

I wanted to see the bereaved family of Choe Chang Gol, so I led the unit to Gushanzi. His wife, along with his son who could not yet even toddle and his younger brother, greeted us. The widow was a strong-hearted woman. She did not weep in front of us. On the contrary, she requested my permission to join the guerrilla army to fight against the Japanese imperialists with arms in hand and fulfill her husband's unfinished cause. We altered our schedule and stayed overnight with the bereaved family.

The next morning when we were leaving Gushanzi the widow accompanied us for a long way to see us off. I did not know how to console her; I held her son in my arms and stroked his cheeks. The boy, who had cut only two teeth, was the perfect image of his father. He said, "Papa!" "Papa!" as he touched my face. His mother shed tears for the first time at the sight of this. I also felt like crying and, pressing my cheek against his, I gazed quietly at Gushanzi village for a while.

"Madam, let us bring this boy up excellently so that he can succeed his father." I became too choked to say anything more.

When we had marched about two kilometers from Gushanzi, Kim Il Ryong, seeing me so depressed, proposed that we fire a volley in memory of Choe Chang Gol. He seemed to think that I might brighten up if a volley was fired for him. This was thoughtful of Kim Il Ryong, who had himself suffered manifold hardships and difficulties.

I said, "I don't want to believe the rumor that he was killed. How can we fire a volley for his death when we haven't seen his body?"

When we arrived at Liangjiangkou, after passing through Mengjiang, we received the astonishing news that about 20 Independence Army soldiers who had been hiding in the Fusong area, in cooperation with a Chinese armed unit of about 70 to 80, was plotting to raid our unit and disarm it. This plot had been hatched by the Independence Army under Kukmin-bu. They had discovered the route of the march of the AJPGA from Mengjiang in the direction of Liangjiangkou and then informed a Chinese nationalist army unit that our unit was the main force of the communist army. The Independence Army soldiers and the Chinese armed unit were waiting for us in the village we were to pass through.

Those who gave us this information were the Young Communist League members of Liangjiangkou. There were many organization members and young people there whom I knew. It was immediately upon our arrival in Liangjiangkou that they gave us this information. The guerrillas were furious, saying that we should annihilate the Kukmin-bu terrorists to avenge Choe Chang Gol's death. Even those comrades who had joined me in soothing the young people in Liuhe who were calling for taking revenge on the Kukmin-bu terrorists who had killed six of our comrades in the Huaimaoshan valley when the General Federation of the Korean Youth in South Manchuria was at conference and who had killed Choe Chang Gol, came to my headquarters and suggested that we fight a glorious battle to teach them a lesson, saying that there was a limit to our patience. It was easy to speak about teaching them a lesson, but it was not a problem that could be solved so easily. In the first place, the balance of forces favored them.

But what mattered was not their superior numbers. The most awkward thing was that our opponent was not our enemy. It would amount to foolishness that could only be produced in the chaos of the early 1930s for two armed forces that professed the common cause of anti-Japanese national salvation to exchange fire. It was ridiculous for the AJPGA and the Independence Army to commit fratricide, and it was just as absurd that the Chinese anti-Japanese armed unit and the Korean Independence Army in cooperation would attack the AJPGA. Needless to say, there would be an outcome if we fought. But in this sort of fight neither the winner nor the loser would escape moral condemnation. No one would crown the victor with laurels or cry over the death of the loser.

If by mistake we provoked the Chinese armed unit, a great obstacle might be laid to our activities. The allied front with the Chinese national salvation army formed through painstaking efforts would be broken, and we would have to retreat to the early days when ~ had been idling away the time cleaning our weapons in the back room of someone's house. Attacking the Independence Army unit would give rise to no less serious consequences. If the communist army attacked the Independence Army, the people would turn away from us; and the anti-communists would take advantage of it to slander the Communists.

That was not what we wanted. It was unimaginable for the AJPGA and the Independence Army to fight a bloody battle, leveling their guns at each other. Nevertheless, the Independence Army was preparing for a bloody battle on the other side of the River Songhuajiang. When I recollect the summer of 1932, I am reminded of the situation at that time before anything else. I spent a sleepless night racking my brains to find out a way to deal with the awkward situation, a solution that conformed with the principle of national unity and the great cause of anti-Japanese national salvation. I think I aged ten years because of this affair.

I myself could not repress my surging indignation at, and hatred for, the Kukmin-bu army which had not even fought a proper battle against the Japanese army, our common enemy, and which did not hesitate to commit bestial, shameful acts against us. All the commanders were unanimous in saying in a black rage that we should deal with the Kukmin-bu fascists severely.

Cha Gwang Su, with his eyes flashing with fury, said, "Let us teach them a lesson so that they do not provoke us again, a good lesson, even if it means their being killed, so that they stain their hands with no more of the blood of their fellow countrymen."

Cha went on to say that the time has now come to take revenge on Kukmin-bu for the death of our comrades at their hands. All the armed forces around us were our enemy. The Korean Independence Army, the Chinese national salvation army, the mounted bandits, the Red Spear Society, the Broad Sword Society - they were all our enemy. The AJPGA was in such adversity because we did not have Liu Bencao with us to testify that our unit was a special detachment of the national salvation army. We had succeeded in making our unit legitimate thanks to the good offices of Liu Ben-cao, but we were in danger of being attacked from all sides if we did not take such a powerful surety as Liu Ben-cao along with us.

During our campaign to Tonghua, Commander Yu's unit had withdrawn from Antu and, along with Wang De-lin's unit, retreated deep into Ningan County. Antu had become a free zone. The self-defense army units had surrendered to the Japanese army in succession without having fought a proper battle. Some of the units were already reactionary at that time, having abandoned their anti-Manchukuo, anti-Japanese principles, and had been dancing to the tune of advisers from the Japanese army. It was because it had become a reactionary armed unit commanded by the Japanese army that the Chinese anti-Japanese armed unit dared to think of destroying our unit, which was known as the main force of the communist army.

Blinded by the anti-communist propaganda of Kukmin-bu, the remnants of the Independence Army who were ignorant of our real intention were trying, in conspiracy with the reactionary elements of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist units, to challenge us. I thought the matter over and over again. Although they were a Right-wing military clique who had become bandits, we could not allow ourselves to retaliate or punish them by military means because they were our fellow countrymen and had been fighting to save the country. We had to dissuade them from their challenge by political means. Thus did we regard the anti-Japanese united front as absolute. So Park Hun and several other comrades under his command left for Erdaobaihe where the Independence Army soldiers were stationed.

"Comrade Park Hun, today your mouth, not your gun, is your weapon. You must persuade the Independence Army soldiers by Words, not bullets. You are an eloquent man of a pleasing character. So you will be perfectly able to dissuade them from committing fratricide. You must on no account resort to arms. Bear this in mind.

A gunshot now would mean the end of our united front with the nationalists. What do you think? Do you think you can do it, though it not seem a task that is suited to your character?" I asked. Park Hun scratched his head, smiling.

"It's a difficult task, but I will try."

After Park Hun left on his mission, I walked up and down the bank of the River Songhuajiang for a long time. I prayed silently that there should be no gunshot that night. Would Park Hun succeed in dissuading the Independence Army soldiers? I asked myself anxiously.

Of course, he was an able man, an able agitator. But the furious temper of the man who, if angry, would behave like a bear, paying no heed to the consequences, worried me. I knew his weakness, but I sent him on the mission to the camp of the Independence Army without hesitation because there was no abler man than he in my unit. Cha Gwang Su was his equal in this matter. Judging purely from the situation, Cha Gwang Su was the right man to meet the challenge. But he had been shaken by the news of the death of Choe Chang Gol.

I kept looking in the direction of Erdaobaihe, wishing Park Hun success. Fortunately, nothing tragic happened that night, no unhappy incident, to my relief. The Independence Army soldiers were moved by our comrades' earnest appeal for the unity of the patriotic forces. They confessed that they had been unhappy with the policy of their headquarters and had been dubious and hesitated over what to do. They resolved that they would hand over their weapons to the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army and fight in cooperation with them.

The high-ranking officers of the Independence Army refused to join us, but the rank-and-file soldiers felt the need to cooperate with us and joined hands with us. This was the beginning of their merger with us.

In this way we got over another crisis without difficulty. It was fortunate that we, young people in our twenties, could display such magnanimity and perseverance for the purpose of great national unity at a time when our hatred and spite for Kukmin-bu was surging after we had broken with Yang Se Bong and heard of the death of Choe Chang Gol. If we, thirsting for revenge, had destroyed Kukmin-bu or had an armed conflict with the Independence Army soldiers, we could not have faced the younger generation with a clear conscience as we do today, and we could not have witnessed the historic event of about 300 soldiers of Commander Yang Se Bong coming over in the dead of winter to the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, under the banner of cooperation.

No feeling in the world is greater, more ennobling and more sacred than patriotism. The spirit of national unity can be called the lifeblood and essence of patriotism. The Korean communists, since the first day they set sail for national liberation, have invariably been holding the idea of national unity dear at all times and in all places, and have not been sparing in their efforts to make the idea the reality.

6.6. Together with the National Salvation Army

When we were staying in Liuhe, I dispatched a liaison officer to the Panshi area to establish contact with Li Hong Gwang and Li Dong Gwang. At the time when we were returning from our south Manchurian expedition, they were waging a guerrilla war. The Armed Red Guard (another name for it was the dog-hunting troop) which they had formed after the September 18 incident in order to fight against the stooges of the "defending-people society" and other pro-Japanese organizations was reformed into the Panshi Worker-Peasant Volunteers in September 1932.

This volunteer unit was made up of young Koreans who had been tested and trained through mass struggles of different forms such as seizing food from the enemy, punishing stooges and capturing weapons, as well as through anti-Japanese uprisings. Since the summer of 1932 Li Hong Gwang and Li Dong Gwang had struggled to establish anti-Japanese guerrilla zones. They displayed great ability Particularly in the struggle to punish stooges, and were much talked about.

I wanted to meet them, not to pay a courtesy call on them, the masters of south Manchuria, and exchange greetings, but to discuss our views. Above all, I hoped we would swap fighting experience. My next concern was what view and attitude they had concerning the prospects for the Korean revolution. I wanted to inform them of my views and attitude on the immediate tasks facing the Korean communists and to hear their opinions.

What was most important was to discuss with them practical matters on how the Korean communists who had launched an armed struggle scattered across Manchuria should keep in contact, how they should effect coordination and how they should realize cooperation, concerted action and joint operations. I also wanted to discuss such matters with Kim Chaek, Choi Yong Kun, Li Hak Man, Li Gi Dong and Ho Hyong Sik in north Manchuria. The guerrilla units in south and north Manchuria flanked us. How to cooperate with them was an important factor that would greatly affect the development of the armed struggle as a whole.

The liaison officer who had been to Panshi returned to the unit when we were staying in Mengjiang after leaving Hailong. He reported to me that he had failed to meet Li Hong Gwang and Li Dong Gwang because they were away from their unit, conducting political work in the villages, and that he had left my letter with the underground organization there.

So I put off my meeting with them and concentrated on military and political activities in Mengjiang. The major objective of our operations in this area was to obtain weapons and expand our ranks. To this end, we had to launch military and diplomatic activities along with active political work.

Mengjiang was favourable in several aspects for us in achieving our aim. Many of the officials in Mengjiang were my schoolmates from Yuwen Middle School. They had been scholarly men who had buried themselves exclusively in studying without conducting any political activities, either Leftist or Rightist, but they now held the reins in Mengjiang. After leaving middle school they had worked in the County office of the Kuomintang and, when Japan invaded Manchuria, joined the self-defense army holding high-ranking posts.

There was staying in Mengjiang even the representative of the headquarters of the self-defense army led by Tang Ju-wu Which operated in the Tonghua area. So there was the Possibility of obtaining weapons by negotiating with the representative through the good offices of my schoolmates After taking stock of the situation i decided to keep in close touch with the self-defense army in Mengjiang.

At that time our commanding officers were not much interested in winning over the self-defense army. Most of them considered it an adventure to have contact with them. They said: The talks with Yang Se Bong broke down because we have different ideas, though he is a Korean as are we. So it will be totally impossible for us to obtain weapons from the self-defense army. What is worse, the self-defense army is now breaking up. We were told that some units had Japanese instructors in their command structures and were plotting with them to sweep away the communists. So we cannot agree that you, our commander, should walk into such a trap.

I replied to them, "We should not be afraid of Japanese Instructors who are entrenched in the self-defense army units. They put out feelers to discover communists, whereas we have courage with which to go into their units, deceiving the Japanese instructors and talk to the commanding officers of the self-defense army. The disrupted nature of the army may favor us in attaining our object. They will consider it better to hand over their weapons to us who are fighting against the Japanese than to the Japanese or bandits or throw them away. We succeeded in our negotiation<sup>5</sup> with even so obstinate a commander as Yu. So, why shouldn't we be able to win over the self-defense army?"

The commanding officers said earnestly: It was by a chance in a thousand that you, Comrade Commander, succeeded in your negotiations with Commander Yu. If Mr. Liu Ben-cai had not been there we would not have been successful. You would do well to think more .carefully about going to the self-defense army units.

So I retorted, "Saying that something is right or wrong, sitting in an isolated room without making an attempt, is not a characteristic of communists. True, we owed Mr. Liu a lot in making our guerrilla army legitimate. However, it is unscientific for us to consider our success at that time as mere chance. If we had not made positive efforts to remove the tension in our relations with the national salvation army, Mr. Liu could not have helped us. What is important is to work actively and with courage." With this I left for the headquarters of the self-defense army accompanied by an orderly.

The barracks of the self-defense army were full of soldiers and ox-or horse-drawn carts were frequently going in and out of the gate, carrying military supplies.

At the gate a sentry ordered us to halt and asked in the Shandong dialect, "What brings you here? Who are you?" He was scarcely interested in our faces, but gazed carefully at our guerrilla uniforms and five-pointed stars on our caps which were totally different from those of the self-defense army.

I replied in Chinese, imitating his Shandong dialect, saying, "We are a detachment of the national salvation army from Antu. I am detachment Commander Kim Il Sung. I have come here to meet your commander. Take me to him."

"Kim Il Sung? The Kim Il Sung detachment is a communist unit, isn't it?" Another sentry with pockmarks on his face looked at me suspiciously, muttering my name to himself. Apparently he had heard that Kim Il Sung's unit was a communist army.

"We are a detachment serving under Commander Yu. Don't you know Commander Yu?" I asked him. "Oh, Commander Yu! I know him. His soldiers captured a machine gun from the Japs in Nanhutou. He is a great man," said the sentry with pockmarks on his face proudly, giving us the thumbs up.

Anyhow, our mentioning Commander Yu produced a good result. His name was effective whenever we approached Chinese anti-Japanese troops. So when we were marching we always masqueraded under the cloak of "The Korean Detachment of the NSA," to avoid encounters with other anti-Japanese troops.

Then the sentry who spoke a Shandong dialect went to the barracks and returned with a man of noble bearing. In those days the NSA soldiers were dressed in old-style uniforms of the Zhang Xuehang army. But the officer who had just appeared with the sentry was wearing a short-sleeved shirt, breeches and canvas shoes. His hair was well-oiled and shining brightly.

"Hey! Aren't you the librarian Kim Sung Ju?"

It was my schoolmate Zhang from Yuwen Middle School who had been known as "tall Zhang." He called me the librarian because I had been in charge of the library at the school. At school Zhang had been kind to me, calling me "librarian Kim" or "librarian Sung Ju." Holding each other's hands in joy we reminisced about our school days for a good while. It was three years since we had last met. I regretted having left Jirin without saying goodbye to my schoolmates after my release from prison. But it had been unavoidable because I was terribly busy at that time running east and west with a determination to sacrifice all my private affairs for the revolution, but sometimes I felt a weight on my mind because I had been so disrespectful as to have failed to say farewell to the teachers and students at Jirin.

Meeting Zhang reminded me of various events in my days at Jirin Yuwen Middle School which I had almost forgotten, and of the romantism of the students in those days. I felt as if I were standing in the garden of Yuwen Middle School which was filled with the fragrant smell of lilac, not in the grounds of a barracks where the sound of military boots was heard. It seemed that, if I left the barracks together with Zhang, I would be at Mt. Beishan, enjoying the cool of the River Songhuajiang. This nostalgia made my heart tingle.

Zhang took my arm as he had done at school and guided me to his room laughing aloud frequently.

"I am sorry that your face does not appear in our graduation photograph from school."

As he talked he offered me a seat.

"When we had our photograph taken after the leaving ceremony, we talked about librarian Kim. If you had not left school early, you would have won the first prize. Was it that the revolution attracted you to such an extent that you left school early?"

I answered his question with a merry joke.

"Of course it did. You were also attracted by the revolution and became an officer in the self-defense army with a Mauser in your belt, I think."

Listening to me, Zhang blinked and patted the back of my hand.

"You are right. Before the September 18 incident we were stupid people who had lived with no knowledge of the world. Only when we saw the Japanese invading Manchuria did we awake from our sleep."

"That was natural. Do you remember what I said at that time? A man cannot live without politics."

"I didn't listen to you carefully. And I don't see why the situation is changing so radically. This Manchuria is a dreadful sight, a land swept away by a sudden puff of wind."

I thought that Zhang had analyzed the situation correctly. The tide of history flowing across Manchuria brought great changes which shook the world. The changes were so cruel as to cause many vicissitudes in the life of the people. A short time before, Zhang himself had had an ambition to study history at Beijing University. But after witnessing the invasion of Manchuria by Japanese troops he abandoned his ambition from his school days and volunteered for the self-defense army. And who could have imagined that Mr. Liu Ben-cai, who had been talked of as a scholar among scholars and who would gently explain the pastoral poems of Du Fu<sup>27</sup>, would become a chief of staff of the NSA and fight against the Japanese in the smoke of gunpowder?

"Look, librarian Kim. I have become a gallant man in uniform owing to the September 18 incident," said Zhang with a sad smile.

"It is not only you who are in military uniform. I, too, have become a soldier and reached Mengjiang. It is not only as schoolmates but also as soldiers that we are discussing the general situation. Isn't it a splendid work of fate?"

He said that it was a "benefit" granted us by the Japanese and that people had become somewhat clever owing to this "benefit." I learned that there were many of my schoolmates from Yuwen Middle School in the self-defense army in Mengjiang. I talked with them until late at night. In our school days they had broken with politics and dreamt only of their careers and fame, but they were now hotly denouncing Japan and branding Chiang Kaisek as the most terrible monster born of the Chinese nation. Such a change satisfied me.

We discussed joint action between the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army and the self-defense army until late at night. My schoolmates in the leadership of the self-defense army welcomed cooperation with our army. Thus I was able to get deep into the self-defense army and also had an opportunity to meet the representative of its headquarters in Mengjiang. One day, at the request of Zhang, I made a speech before the commanding officers of the self-defense army. The representative, too, attended the gathering.

I began by appealing to them, "Brothers, let's go together." And I continued my speech as follows:

"The self-defense army and the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army must make efforts to conduct joint action. Being hostile to the AJPGA, branding it as a communist army, is the way to obstruct the anti-Japanese struggle and help Japan.... The AJPGA and the SDA must help the units of the Korean Independence Army and form a united front with them. We must sharpen our vigilance against the plot of the Japanese who are trying to rule over us by driving a wedge between the Korean and Chinese peoples and using their conflict to weaken both of them....

"The SDA must persuade the Broad Sword Society, the Red Spear Society and other militia organizations, as well as the bandits, to refrain from murdering and robbing innocent Korean and Chinese peoples and must enlist them actively in the anti-Japanese struggle. All militia organizations, small and large, must unite into a national salvation force. Some of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units reveal such deviations as retreating to China proper or surrendering to the enemy, being cowed by the strength of the Japanese troops. We must all remember that surrendering and giving up is the way to self-destruction."

The commanding officers of the SDA responded heartily to my speech. Following my speech the representative of the general headquarters handed dozens of weapons over to us.

We stayed for about two months in Mengjiang, and during that time we were able to carry out propaganda work among the masses, conduct military exercises and expand our ranks with presentable Young men, under the protection of the SDA. When we left Antu, our unit had numbered only 40, but now it was 150. Many young men in Mengjiang and the surrounding area who had been told that Kim Sung Ju had formed a strong army and was now fighting, called on us every day and petitioned us to be allowed to join the guerrilla army. In Mengjiang we worked freely, as if we were in power there.

The liaison officer who had been to Antu said that the situation in east Manchuria was good. From a letter he brought me from Kim Jong Ryong I understood that the rest of our unit, that was staying there, was growing all the time and that a guerrilla unit of more than one hundred men had been formed in each of Wangqing, Yanji and Hunchun.

I decided to move the stage of our activity to the centre (Wangqing) of east Manchuria where the guerrilla war had begun to develop into a full-scale struggle, and to extend the armed struggle there by combining efforts with units in other counties. One important lesson we had drawn from the south Manchurian expedition was that, at the present stage when our strength was weak, it was favorable and efficient to occupy a certain base of activity and wage a struggle by relying on it. We went straight to Antu from Mengjiang without passing through Fusong. On the way our unit met some bandits and the remnants of the defeated Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist units several times. They tried to capture our new rifles because they were envious of them. So we were in danger many times.

At one such time a kind old man who had been connected with Chamui-bu suddenly appeared before us like a magician in a legend and guided us to Liangjiangkou, passing through the mountains. This march was training for us and made us ready for the long-protracted guerrilla war in the future.

When we were about to leave Liangjiangkou, the main force of a regiment under the command of Yu arrived. This regiment was known as Commander Meng's unit. Meng's secretary Chen Han-zhang had also come to Liangjiangkou, with his unit.

When he recognized me, Chen Han-zhang ran towards me shouting with joy, his arms open wide. "Sung Ju! It's been so long!"

He threw his arms around my shoulders and turned me round and round as if he were meeting me after dozens of years of separation. I was seeing him for the first time since I separated from him when I had held talks with Commander Yu in Antu. It was a meeting after only three months' separation. But he gazed at me with affection as if the three months had been three decades. This meeting seemed to me to be a miracle taking place after a long separation, so I could not control my swelling emotions. In a man's lifetime three months is a short span of time, but I felt as if a long part of my life had passed in 'those three months'. It is said that if one suffers many twists and turns one feels the time to be longer. I think this is true.

Chen introduced me to Commander Meng, and said:

"I didn't know where your unit was, so I asked many people about your whereabouts. I was told that you had gone to south Manchuria and back, but I couldn't find you. Fortunately a rumor reached our unit that a Korean communist unit started the merger with an Independence Army unit in Liangjiangkou."

"Thank you, Comrade Chen. I was also anxious to see you. By the way, what brought you here?"

"Wang De-lin ordered us to work in this area until next spring. What about you? Why don't you work together with us for a while in Liangjiangkou?"

Commander Meng, who was listening to Chen, supported his Suggestion. I accepted their suggestion gladly in the hope that if we Stayed there with them we could consolidate our common front with the national salvation army. Meng's unit was armed with modern weapons because it had deserted from Zhang Xue-liang's regular army. This unit had artillery as well as machine guns. It had an incomparably stronger combat ability than other NSA units which had only a few rifles, swords and spears as weapons. During our stay in Liangjiangkou, Meng's unit guarded the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army well.

In those days most of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist units collapsed or surrendered in the face of a strong attack by the Japanese troops, and were controlled by them. Only Wang De-lin's unit had not surrendered and remained as a great force among the NSA units. But even his unit was retreating to Dongning, on the eastern border of Manchuria, or into the Soviet Union where the Japanese gunfire did not reach.

The collapse of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units because of their own impotence caused distrust among our political and military cadres. Some of them said that it was useless to establish a joint front with them because we were in no position to remove the uncertainty and confusion prevailing among them, and others said that the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army should break its useless ties with them and fight on single-handed. Neither of these opinions could be tolerated.

Abandoning the anti-Japanese allied front meant surrendering a huge armed force to the enemy and falling in with the tactics of the Japanese imperialists to swallow the anti-Japanese nationalist armed units one by one.

The uncertainty and confusion of these units were attributed partly to the class limitation of their upper levels, but mainly to their fear of the enemy. In order to remove their uncertainty and prevent their destruction, it was necessary to work with them more actively and inspire them with confidence in victory by defeating the enemy.

From this pressing need, in Liangjiangkou we convened two meetings of the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee which consisted of Chen Han-zhang, Lee Gwang, Hu Jin-min and other political workers who had been active in the NSA units and military and political cadres from different counties of east Manchuria, and at the meetings we discussed the measures to deal with the problems arising in the work with the Chinese anti-Japanese units. At the meetings a report on the work in the NSA units was given first, experiences accumulated in this process were swapped and the trend in the anti-Japanese nationalist units was analysed.

The people attending the meetings decided to attack Dunhua county town and Emu county town in a joint operation with Wu Yicheng's unit and Commander Meng's unit in order to deal a heavy blow to the Japanese who were expanding their occupation without any resistance, with most of the anti-Japanese units having given up their resistance by retreating to safety or surrendering to the enemy and becoming a reactionary army, and thus to raise the morale of the patriotic soldiers and people.

Commander Meng welcomed our plan of action.

The two-thousand-strong NSA unit was divided into three groups each of which advanced in the directions of the Jirin-Dunhua railway and towards Yanji and Dunhua county town. Our unit, with Commander Meng's unit, arrived in the forest around Dahuanggou south of Dunhua having followed the road east of Fuerhe and the mountain pass east of Dapaoxihe. By dispatching a reconnaissance party to Dunhua county town we confirmed what Ko Jae Lim had told us about the enemy.

At that time there were stationed in Dunhua huge armed forces such as the Japanese garrison, the headquarters of the 3rd Jirin guard brigade of the Manchukuo army and its 4th regiment, 9th regiment and airport guards, the Japanese consulate police and Manchukuo police. The enemy's guard was very strict at every town gate and at the gate of the consulate branch building.

At three a.m., on the second of September, our allied forces launched an attack on Dunhua county town. Our unit attacked the south gate and the NSA unit led by Hu Jin-min dashed into the county town through the west and north gates. After breaking into the town our allied units raided the enemy's command post first, destroyed the brigade headquarters, the consulate branch and the police sub-station and dealt with the enemy's units under the brigade. Our forces held the initiative in the battle and the enemy fell into disorder.

To save themselves the enemy called up two planes to strafe and bomb our forces. This caused great confusion among the NSA soldiers. If day were to break while we were in this situation the battle would go badly for us and our forces would suffer a great loss. I explained the situation to Chen Han-zhang and Hu Jin-min and made the new tactical proposal that we withdraw from our present position and annihilate the enemy by luring them to somewhere favorable for us.

According to my proposal, our unit took up position on the height southwest of the county town and the NSA units on a hill south of Guantunji. There we totally destroyed the enemy in an ambush. Seeing the sudden change in the situation, which they had considered unfavorable, the NSA soldiers' morale improved and they chased the fleeing enemy. The publications in those days did not comment on this battle in particular, apparently because the control of the press by the Japanese authorities was strict. The people did not know that a battle was fought in Dunhua in the early autumn of the 22nd year since national ruin.

The assault on Dunhua county town was similar to the assault on Dongning county town in September 1933. As the former was fought in cooperation with the NSA, so the latter, too, was planned and resulted in success as a joint action with the main force of the NSA. These two assaults were similar in their scale, too. However, the assault on Dunhua county town was significant because it was the first battle of its kind in the history of the joint struggle of the Korean and Chinese peoples, in which the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army defeated the Japanese troops in a joint operation with the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army.

"The Chinese people totally lost heart in the face of the military power of Japan which had defeated two major powers, Qing and Russia. But today they are free from such old-fashioned thinking. They have achieved a mental release prior to the liberation of their territory," Chen shouted, embracing me. His tearful face at that time is still fresh in my memory. "Sung Ju, let's follow this road together for ever!" he said, grasping my hand. When he said this road he meant the joint struggle. Chen Han-zhang remained faithful to his word until he died in battle.

About a week after this battle we raided Emu county town together with the NSA units. Our force was victorious in this battle, too. Though this battle was not well known in the world, the sound of the gunfire rumbled for a long time.

6.7. Autumn in Xiaoshahe

---

When we returned to Liangjiangkou, we summoned those who had not taken part in the expedition to south Manchuria which had started from Xiaoshahe, and reviewed our work during the six months since the foundation of the guerrilla army. Of course, the main part of the review was related to the expedition to south Manchuria.

The guerrillas were unanimous in recognizing that our armed ranks had grown and developed rapidly over the six months and that, in the course of this, they had come to believe that they were able to defeat the Japanese imperialists through a guerrilla war. In order to take the guerrilla struggle onto a new stage, at the review meeting we set our unit the following tasks:

First, to move the base of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army to the area of Wangqing.

Secondly, to conduct in greater depth the work with the Chinese anti-Japanese national salvation army.

Thirdly, to give correct guidance to the guerrilla struggle which had started to expand rapidly in east Manchuria, and hasten the establishment of the revolutionary base and firmly defend it.

The matter most heatedly discussed of these three matters was that of moving the operational base of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army to Wangqing. We discussed this one question repeatedly over several consecutive days with the military and political cadres who had come from Antu, Yanji and Helong.

Those from Antu objected to moving the operational base to Wangqing. They expressed their disapproval by saying: "The guerrilla army which has been founded in Antu should remain in Antu. Why should it go to Wangqing? If the guerrilla army goes to Wangqing, what will happen to Antu?" This was naive obstinacy permeated with regional feelings.

On the other hand, those from Yanji and Helong said that for the Antu unit, the seed of the guerrilla army, to move to the center of Jiandao where Koreans were concentrated was natural and timely both from the strategic point of view and from geographical requirements. They asserted that if the Antu unit, which had the strongest fighting power, went to Wangqing, there would also be a great change in the activities of the guerrilla units in the neighboring counties such as Yanji, Hunchun and Helong.

All those from Antu also admitted that Wangqing was the best place geographically. Above all else, Wangqing was good because it was near the homeland. The area of the six towns on the other side of the river had been greatly influenced by Jirin. So this area would be a reliable source of manpower and material support for the guerrilla struggle in the future. With the area of the six towns as our foothold, we could lead the revolution in the homeland to an upsurge. The masses in the area of Wangqing had remarkable fighting ability and revolutionary spirit.

This they displayed to the full in the Battle of Qingshanli and the Battle of Fengwugou which can be regarded historically as the zenith of the armed struggle of the Independence Army. Wangqing was the base of operations for the political and military administration in northern area, and all the hundreds of the soldiers of the Independence Army and cadets who were operating there lived on food made of the grain grown by the people in the area.

But we could not move to Wangqing without making prior arrangements just because it was a good place. Therefore, day after day we deepened our discussion in two ways; whether we should establish the base in Antu County and conduct the guerrilla struggle by our own efforts, and whether we should continue our legitimate activities with the Chinese national salvation army, while surreptitiously building up the units of Koreans.

I considered that, although we would have to be somewhat restrained in our activities because of our joint action with the national salvation army, it was important to consolidate still further the legitimacy of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army which we had risked our lives to gain and show our Chinese brothers who regarded the Koreans in Manchuria as the second Japanese that our nation was neither the lackey nor the scout of the Japanese imperialists, and that the armed group of the Korean communists whom they regarded as being pro-Japanese were thoroughly anti-Japanese.

Finally we adopted the proposal that we should continue to defend the legitimacy of the guerrilla army at the same time as conducting activities together with the national salvation army for the time being and that we should also increase our armed ranks by expanding our influence through a practical struggle and then, after the ranks had expanded, unite them.

After we decided on this plan we selected people and sent them to various parts of east Manchuria. We sent them to Yanji, Helong, and Hunchun and also dispatched many able political workers to the units of the national salvation army in Luozigou. We also formed a flying squad and dispatched it to Wangqing. We left Kim Il Ryong in Antu. Our unit, which had amounted to well over a hundred people, was reduced to some 40 again.

As we frequently sent people from our unit to other counties like this, the cadres of the east Manchurian Ad hoc committee were pleased. On many occasions they had requested that, because ours was the main unit, we should choose good people from it and strengthen the guerrilla units in other areas.

Four months had passed since our unit left Xiaoshahe and started on its expedition to south Manchuria. The autumnal tints were growing richer and richer with each passing day in the rivers and streams, fields and mountains of Liangjiangkou. Fallen leaves lay everywhere and were covered with frost, warning of the approaching severe winter of the area. With the season changing and the weather getting cold, I was inwardly worried about my mother who was in her sickbed. But I only thought of her and did not dare to visit Xiaoshahe.

Although I eagerly desired to visit Tuqidian I continually put off meeting my mother. With the approach of the day of our departure for north Manchuria, Cha Gwang Su brought me a packet of herb medicines and advised me to visit Tuqidian, taking it with me. When I hesitated, he criticized me, saying that it was not like Kim Sung Ju to do so. He said that he would never again talk to me if I, their leader, neglected my mother.

So I left for Xiaoshahe.

Even as I walked with the package of herb medicines in my hand, I was anxious about one thing that my mother, upon seeing the medicines, might again reproach me for being concerned about unnecessary things. However, I thought that my mother would be delighted to hear that the medicines had been procured for her by Cha Gwang Su.

The one mal of hulled millet which I had bought for her when I was in Xiaoshahe must have run out a long time before. My mother being unable to work, I wondered how and with what money she was now maintaining the household. Saying that spiders do not weave a web in a living mouth, my mother had told me flatly not to think of my family and to assume that I had neither a mother nor any younger brothers. However, it was not so easy for a man to forget his mother who had given birth to him, and his younger brothers, and not to think of his family.

Walking towards my home with the packet of herb medicines, my steps for some reason gradually became heavier as I approached Xiaoshahe. It was true that I felt uneasy for fear that my mother's illness might have grown worse. However, what I felt most uncomfortable about was the fact that I had returned from south Manchuria without forming a united front with Commander Yang. I thought that my mother would be very sorry to learn of this.

Although my mother was gravely ill, she had urged me to go to south Manchuria. I think this was because she was pleased and satisfied over the fact that her son was going to collaborate with a man who had been his father's friend. My mother was not pleased with the fact that the young people were on bad terms with their seniors in the independence movement and found fault with their belief. The most important thing was what my mother's condition was like. When I was leaving home my mother could not digest even thin millet gruel like ordinary water. If she had not improved during my absence, she might be in a critical state by now and in greater pain than before. I could not know what had happened. Although I was quickening my pace, I could not dispel my anxiety. Even as I crossed the familiar log bridge in Tuqidian I could not rid myself of my uneasiness.

Each time I had crossed that bridge, my mother used to fling open the door of our home. My mother had a special sense by which she could tell which of her sons it was when she heard our footsteps. But, that day the door did not open, and no smoke was rising from the chimney, smoke indicating that my family was preparing supper; nor did I see my younger brothers going in and out of the kitchen with either firewood or a large bowl of dirty water.

Feeling such fear and tension that the blood in my heart seemed to freeze, I struggled to pull the door handle. No sooner had I opened the door than I almost fell down on the earthen verandah. My mother's bed was empty. The thought that I was too late flashed across my mind. Then, all of a sudden, Chol Ju came silently up to me and thumped me on the shoulder with all his might.

"Brother, why have you come only now?"

My younger brother was sobbing into my chest. He cried out bitterly in a hoarse voice, like a child.

Then Yong Ju, my youngest brother, appeared and took my left arm.

Dropping the packet of herb medicines on the earthen verandah, I hugged my two weeping brothers. Their sobs explained everything. So there was no need at all to ask whether my mother was alive or dead. I thought: "How can it be that this misfortune has happened during my absence? Couldn't our mother enjoy even the final happiness of seeing the face of her son at her last moment? My mother, who was born into a poor family and lived all her life in poverty! My mother who, at the thought of the misfortune of the ruined country, bit her lip and gulped down her tears even when her husband died! Our mother who has passed away after dedicating herself body and soul not for herself but for the happiness of others!"

My mother had always been afraid that her son would make a mistake in his great work, swayed by personal feelings. Possibly she had died so early for fear that she might be a burden to me in my making of the revolution.

Stroking with my hand the door post which my mother held when she had admonished me for the last time, I thought, how good it would be if I could see my mother once again in front of this door, even if I received a severer reprimand than that time.

"Chol Ju, didn't mother say anything at the last?"

To this question Mrs. Kim, who had entered the courtyard through the brushwood gate, answered instead of Chol Ju:

"This is what your mother said to me, '... if our son Sung Ju comes after my death, please treat him as I would have done. If he comes when the Japanese are still in our country and without having achieved Korea's independence, you must not allow him to open my grave. You should not even let him into the yard. It is not that I am boasting of my son, but Sung Ju will not return before the battle is won.' Having said this, she asked me to open the door. Then she gazed out at the log bridge over there for a long time."

What Mrs. Kim said seemed to echo from the distant "celestial country." But I could clearly understand the profound and touching meaning of each of her words, without missing anything.

Still holding my two younger brothers in my arms, I looked round at the log bridge. I tried to imagine my mother's longing for her son and how she had felt when she was passing away without being able to see her beloved son. But before I could pass through the gate of imagination, I burst out sobbing.

When I raised my head after weeping for a good while, I found Mrs. Kim looking up at my face with tearful eyes. The expression in her eyes was so tender and caring that I almost took her eyes for my mother's.

"Mrs. Kim, you must have had much trouble looking after my mother."

Thus I recovered from my heart-rending sorrow and pain to express my gratitude to Mrs. Kim for keeping my mother company during her last days.

Then Mrs. Kim began sobbing sorrowfully and said, "Don't mention it. I failed to come often. As I failed to look after her well she herself had to comb her hair back. Your younger brothers were away from home, being engaged in revolutionary work. One day your mother asked me to cut her hair short, like a boy's, saying that her scalp was itching.... But I did not dare to take scissors to her hair. How lovely and luxuriant her hair was! I said I could not do it. She entreated me to do as she asked. 'If my scalp did not itch, I would feel like flying high into the sky,' she said. So I cut her hair...." With this Mrs. Kim wept aloud.

It would have been better if I had not heard her story, I thought. I felt as if the story about her sad, last moments was tearing me apart inside. Mother had looked after her children all her life, but had they, who she had brought up in her lap, not the least filial piety to comb the hair of their mother in her death bed?

When I was living in Fusong, I saw a boy of my age carrying his sick mother on his back from Nandianzi to hospital in Xiaonanmen, perspiring profusely. When we saw him, we all said that he was a filial boy. Mrs. Kim's story for some reason reminded me of that boy dripping with perspiration.

I had nothing to say, even if I was to blame for being an undutiful son compared with that boy. What had I done for my mother until I was over the age of 20? As a child I invited mother to sit in the warmest part of the room and breathed on her cold hands when she returned from the well, to warm them. In the morning I used to feed the hens and fetch water in a pail to help mother.

I did nothing special for my mother after I embarked on the revolution. The old saying that there is no upward love even though there is downward love may have been meant for me. That there is no upward love is a truly wise remark. I have never heard of sons and daughters taking care of their parents with filial piety exceeding the love their parents showed them.

"Chol Ju, didn't mother leave any word with you?"

Thus I asked Chol Ju again, wondering what might have been the last words she left. Chol Ju replied in a husky voice, rubbing his eyelid with the palm of his hand, "She told us to help you, brother, well. If we help you well and become revolutionaries like you, she will rest peacefully in her grave, mother said."

This shows how she expended all her spiritual strength only for the revolution until her last moment.

My younger brothers and I visited mother's grave at once.

Mother's grave covered with pieces of grass was on a hillside with a lonely old elm.

I took off my army cap and, with my brothers, bowed before her grave.

I murmured, "Mother, I have come. Pardon your unfilial son. I called on you, mother, coming belatedly from south Manchuria."

As I knelt, murmuring, Chol Ju suddenly knelt down and picked up some pieces of turf. "What are you doing?" I said, looking blankly at my brother, a strange thought occurring to me. Then Chol Ju, weeping, silently buried in the grave the packet of medicines I had brought from Liangjiangkou.

His silent act finally touched off the sorrow smoldering in my heart. I wept sorrowfully for a longtime, kneeling down by the grave. I had become an ordinary man from a revolutionary. I felt as if all things in the world had been transformed into the grave and all matters had been compressed into a tragedy, the loss of my mother. But the blue autumn sky over our heads looked down merrily as normal. I wondered how the sky could remain so indifferent to our grief.

So I lost my dear mother. The tragic event happened in the dismal summer of 1932, twenty-two years after the loss of the country. If the country had not been ruined, she would have lived longer. Mother's illness was caused by the hardships in her life which followed in the wake of the ruin of the country.

Mother went to untold trouble for her sons. If the filial piety I showed mother was taken for ten, mother's love for me was more than ten thousand.

Once four or five members of the Young Communist League and I were surrounded by the enemy when I was conducting underground activities in Fusong. We had to leave the walled city, even if it meant fighting out of the encirclement, but we had no weapons. So I asked mother whether she could fetch some weapons from our comrades in Wanlihe.

She readily agreed, saying, "I can do that. I will fetch them."

She went and returned home safely with two pistols from our comrades in Wanline, who had loaded and cocked them as she had asked. Mother had boldly approached the gate of the walled town, carrying on her head a wooden basin containing the two pistols hidden in some ribs of beef. When the police standing by the gate pointed at the basin and asked her, "What's that?" she replied with composure, "It's beef." The police then only lifted up the sheet of paper covering the basin to see inside and let her pass through the gate. I was surprised to see the loaded and cocked guns.

"Mother, you might have got into serious trouble. Why did you have the guns loaded?" "I asked your comrades to load them. If the police had tried to search the basin, I would have fired at them. Two or three men at most would approach me, I supposed. I decided that if they came at me I would shoot at least one to death at the risk of my life."

Mother's remark was pervaded with a noble spirit which could not be fathomed by our experience and way of thinking. It was a manifestation of her courage and genuine love attended by an understanding of and sympathy with her son's undertaking.

At one time we were living in a rented room in Ma Chun Uk's house in Jiuantu. One day when our comrades were cleaning a pistol one of them fired it accidentally and wounded my mother in the leg. The bullet wound put her life in danger and required good treatment.

She was confined to bed. If someone asked, she told him that when she had gone out to throw away some dirty water she had fallen and had broken her leg. She did not show anyone her wound and laid in bed, covered by a quilt and being secretly nursed by uncle Hyong Gwon. But she did not think ill of us or show any sign of displeasure at the man who had accidentally fired the pistol.

The man who had fired it by accident felt so guilty that he even attempted to kill himself. On hearing of this she reproached him, saying, "That will not do. The accident happened because you are no good at handling a gun. But I was lucky. To think that a man attempts to kill himself because of such a trifle! Discard such an idea and think how you can keep the matter secret. If the secret leaks out, great trouble will befall you and this house. And you will fail in your cause.

More than the bullet wound in her leg, she feared the fact that we had guns might be made known to the police.

Ma Chun Uk's family, too, never spoke of the accidental shooting to others. Mother's noblest trait was that she loved my comrades like her own sons. Mother treated them like me. When they called at my house, she gave them funds for their work. She took this money from the money she earned by sewing and washing. The workers at a timber mill and seasonal laborers who went about to dig up ginseng often requested her to make clothes for them from some cotton cloth they had brought. She earned 70 or 80 fen a day making clothes for them. At times she even earned one yuan a day.

Although she found it difficult to live she was liberal with her money. Having set aside money for the purchase of provisions, travel expenses and house rent, she did not stint the money she earned. When my comrades came, she would buy several dishes of noodles and several kilogram's of pork for them and serve them with Chinese meat dumplings or soup with wheat flakes in it; she would also give them funds for their work.

When my comrades said, "Madam, your family, too, does not lead a comfortable life. If you give us all the money, how will you manage to get along?" she replied, "A man does not die because he hasn't money but because he is mortal."

Even when my comrades stayed at our home for several months, she was never displeased and she always treated them like her sons. So those who, while engaged in the youth movement in Manchuria, stayed at my home for several days did not call my mother "Sung Ju's mother" but "our mother."

It is no exaggeration to say that she cooked meals for revolutionaries all her life. When father was alive, she was always busy cooking for the patriots, never taking a holiday. When we were living in Linjiang, she prepared meals for our guests every night. When we were about to fall asleep under our quilts, father's friends would troop in, saying jokingly that it was no time to sleep peacefully and they slept in the front room. Then she would get up and again cook meals for them.

Mother herself took part in the revolution while looking after the revolutionaries. She started her revolutionary activities when we were living in Fusong. After joining the Paeksan regional branch of the South Manchurian Women's Education Federation, she conducted enlightenment work among women and children. She became engaged in the work of the Women's Association after father's death.

Mother's development into someone who conducted the revolution from someone who helped it is ascribable not only to my father's and my influence, but also to Lee Gwan Rin's influence to a great extent. When Lee Gwan Rin was living with us, she persuaded my mother to participate in the affairs of the South Manchurian Women's Education Federation.

If mother had shown me only maternal affection, I would have failed to recall her with such warm affection. The love she showed me was not simply motherly love. It was true revolutionary affection with which she regarded me as the son of the nation rather than her own son and awakened me to the need to give priority to loyalty to the country over filial piety towards my parents. Her whole life served as a textbook for me in implanting in me a true view on life and on the revolution.

If my father could be compared to a teacher who implanted in me the indomitable revolutionary spirit of fighting through the generations and achieving national liberation, my mother was a kind teacher who taught me that a man who has embarked on the revolution should strive to the end to achieve his set aim without being swayed by temporary sentiments or whims.

If love between a parent and child is blind, it cannot be called solid love. Only when the spirit underlying the love is sound and noble can love be eternal and sacred. The spirit which underlay the love between my mother and I and my filial piety towards her in the days of the nation's ruin was patriotism. For the sake of this patriotism she renounced her right to call on her sons to practise their filial duties towards her.

I left Tuquidian valley without even setting up a tombstone by mother's grave. It was after liberation that a tombstone inscribed with my mother's name was set up by the grave. The people of Antu County set up a tombstone in her memory and inscribed the names of her three sons on it.

My mother's remains, together with those of my father, were brought to and buried in Mangyongdae in accordance with their wishes after the liberation of the country. I failed to see to the graves of my parents for a long time, even after my triumphal return home, the situation in the country being complicated and giving me too much work to do. In the mountains and fields of Manchuria in which we had spent our entire youth there were buried not only my parents but also numerous comrades-in-arms who fell in action going through the flames of the revolution together with me. In addition their bereaved children were there. I decided that I would not move the remains of my parents before I had found the remains of my late comrades-in-arms and brought them and their bereaved children to the liberated homeland.

Chang Chol Ho came to me and asked me to have the remains of my parents brought to the homeland.

He advised me to choose a suitable place for their graves in Mangyongdae, saying that he would move their graves. Among those who knew my family in my days in Manchuria, Chang Chol Ho was the only one who knew where my parents' graves were. He must have gone to a lot of trouble to move the remains of my parents.

While I was waging the armed struggle, the enemy searched persistently for the graves of my parents to exhume them. But the people in Fusong and Antu deceived the enemy and defended and tended the graves of my parents until the day of national liberation. Twice a year, on the 105th day after the winter solstice and on Harvest Moon Day, Kang Je Ha, my teacher from Whasung Uisuk School, and his family visited my father's grave in Yangdicun, taking an offering of food with them, held a memorial service and cut the grass on the grave.

After mother's death I became the guardian of my two younger brothers and the head of the family. But the revolution did not allow me to play the part of a guardian and head of family. I left with a heavy heart for desolate north Manchuria, leaving my younger brothers weeping in sorrow in Xiaoshahe where the reeds swayed plaintively in the wind, giving them no promise to return.

6.8. On the Heights of Luozigou

---

The entry of the Japanese troops into the town of Antu was close at hand. The pro-Japanese landlords had prepared flags to welcome the Japanese. The national salvation army could no longer stay in Liangjiangkou. Regiment Commander Meng was ordered to retreat in the direction of the Luozigou and Wangqing areas, where there were grasslands surrounded by mountains.

In view of the rapidly changing situation we decided to leave Antu with the national salvation army troops. This decision was taken at a meeting of the committee for work with soldiers convened at Liangjiangkou. Our general plan was to shift our operational base to Wangqing, but we decided for the time being to encamp in Luozigou where the retreating national salvation army units were assembling and continue our work with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units. The troops of Commander Yu, too, withdrew from Antu to Luozigou.

While we were busy preparing for our departure for north Manchuria, my brother Chol Ju came to see me in Liangjiangkou.

"Brother, I would like to go with your unit. Without you I cannot live in Tuqidian any more," he said before I could ask him why he had come.

I could understand what he meant when he said he wanted to go with our unit. It must have been unbearable for a sensitive boy of his age to be living off someone else in a remote village in Xiaoshahe after the death of his mother.

"If you leave Tuqidian, what will become of Yong Ju? The boy won't be able to bear it alone."

"The embarrassment is too much for me to endure. I feel that the two of us are hangers-on. If only Yong Ju stays with the villagers, it will be better, I think."

While I thought that he was right in what he said, I could not agree to his request. He was 16, so he might come with the unit and serve as a soldier, provided he had a gun. He was big and sturdy for his age. But still he was no more than a boy and might be a burden to the guerrilla unit. Moreover, he was shouldering a heavy responsibility in improving the work of the Young Communist League in the Antu area.

"If you ask again in two or three years' time, I will readily agree. But I cannot allow it now. Even if your situation is difficult and you feel lonely, endure it for a few years more. While working as a farm-hand or doing seasonal labor, work hard to promote the work of the Young Communist League. Underground work is no less important than the armed struggle, so you mustn't neglect it. Look to the Young Communist League and then, when it is time, join the revolutionary army."

I soothed and humored him to convince him. Then I took him to an inn by a pond. We entered a room. It was bleak in the room with the paper flaps at the edges of the window frames making dreary sounds in the cold draught of air. I ordered wine and some food. We were served with two plates of frozen bean curd and a bottle of wine. Seeing them, my brother's eyes filled with tears. Knowing that I was sober in my habits, he seemed to realize the significance of drink.

"Chol Ju, forgive me for refusing your request. Do you think that I don't want to take you along? Because I must leave you behind, I feel my heart is breaking. But Chol Ju, we must part here, though it is sad."

I said this under the influence of the wine; I could hardly have said it otherwise. But I could not suppress the tears welling up in my eyes. I got up to leave, fearing that Chol Ju might see my tears, but he rose from the table, too, leaving his half-finished drink behind.

"Brother, I understand."

With this, he came up to me from behind and silently took my hands in his for a moment. That was how I parted with my brother, never to see him again. Whenever I recollect the dismal and dreary autumn by the pond, I deeply regret that I did not hold his hands longer and more warmly that day when he quietly took my hands for a moment before leaving. Looking back now, it was too sad a parting. If I had granted his request at that time, my brother might not have died so young, before reaching 20. His life was but a flicker of light.

As soon as he reached ten years of age, Chol Ju began to follow the revolutionary organizations. In Fusong he was in charge of the propaganda work of the Saenal Children's Union, and after going to Xiaoshahe he worked as the secretary of the district committee of the Young Communist League. After parting with me in Liangjiangkou, he trained many Young Communist League members and sent them to join the Korean People's Revolutionary Army.

He took on the difficult task of working with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units of his own free will. He took part in the assault on the town of Dadianzi with the soldiers of a Chinese anti-Japanese unit. The Chinese anti-Japanese unit under the command of Du Yi-shun with which my brother had established contact fought well against the Jiandao punitive detachment of the Japanese army, it was reported.

After that Chol Ju assumed the heavy responsibility of working as the revolutionary organization's operational chief for work with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units in Antu and worked with the anti-Japanese unit commanded by Xu Kui-wu which was stationed at Lupai, Zhangzaicun in Fuyandong, Yanji County. Xu Kui-wu was a perverse and stiff-necked leader who proclaimed himself to be an anti-Japanese champion but was hostile to all the Korean communists.

At first, he had been on friendly terms with Koreans. But after the members of the Anti-Japanese Women's Association in Fuyandong had rescued a Korean girl, a member of the Young Communist League, who had been detained by him as a concubine, he began to turn away from the Korean communists. She had been detained when she went to his unit with a group of entertainers to give a propaganda performance. Once she was captured by the man, no woman could get off unhurt unless she satisfied his desires. Xu Kui-wu had often used such means to change his women.

After the girl member of the Young Communist League had been rescued by the Women's Association, the Koreans could no longer maintain contact with his unit. Even those who had been on good terms with him would not go near him. Xu Kui-wu, maddened because of his unsatisfied lust, made his men maltreat and suppress Koreans. Then my brother Chol Ju visited the unit of Xu Kui-wu, accompanied by Comrade Lim Chun Chu, a licensed herb doctor.

"I've heard, sir, that you are seriously ill, so I've come to inquire after your health," said Chol Ju courteously in fluent Chinese. But Xu Kui-wu did not deign to look at him. He hated the sight of Koreans and did not want to talk to them.

"I've come with an able doctor to cure your illness. Please allow him to treat you." When Chol Ju said this, he became more interested and said that he would try it if the doctor was skilled. After a few days' acupuncture treatment by Comrade Lim Chun Chu, he said with great delight that he had been suffering from migraine, but doctor Lim had driven the motley ghosts out of his head.

Chol Ju took the opportunity to stay on in the unit of Xu and work openly with the Chinese anti-Japanese soldiers. In later days Xu Kui-wu, having joined our route army, was appointed commander of the tenth regiment and fought courageously to the end. Previously he had led a decadent life saying that he could not live even for a single day without opium and women. But after joining the revolutionary army, he was even admitted to the Communist Party.

When I, on behalf of the unit, congratulated him on his admission to the party, he said, "Comrade Commander, today I am thinking of your brother. But for Chol Ju, I would never have seen this day." Then he told me of how Chol Ju had come to him with Comrade Lim Chun Chu and cured him of his illness and how he had persevered in leading him back onto the path of the anti-Japanese struggle.

In June 1935 Chol Ju died heroically in the battle around Chechangzi. I was at Lake Jingbohu when I received word of his death. That is probably why even now whenever I see a large river or lake, I think of my brother. After Chol Ju was killed in battle, my youngest brother, Young Ju, was completely without family. After the family of Kim Jong Ryong had gone to the Chechangzi guerrilla base, he wandered from place to place earning a living by baby-sitting and running errands for other people.

The Kwangtung Army was taking into custody anyone related to me in order to use them to bring me to "allegiance," so my brother had to roam aimlessly, under a false name and by concealing his identity, about cities and villages all over the three provinces of Manchuria and even in China proper. He once stayed in Beijing for a while. After liberation I saw some documentary material concerning the search for my brother in the archives left behind by the Japanese police.

When he was working at the Xinjing brewery, he became so homesick that he returned to the homeland and spent about three months there. He turned up in Mangyongdae wearing a black suit and white shoes. His appearance was so dashing that our grandfather even wondered if his youngest grandson had got a high public post and made his fortune.

My brother wanted to set the minds of his grandparents at rest, so he told them he was attending university in Changchun. Since the police had a dragnet cast for him, and photographs of him had been distributed, he could not stay at Mangyongdae but stopped with my aunt. Then he returned to Manchuria.

After leaving Liangjiangkou, the 40 men of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army moved northward in the direction of Nanhutou along mountain ridges, via Dunhua and Emu. On the way we stopped at Fuerhe where I had spent my days as a "farmhand" and conducted political enlightenment work among the inhabitants. Also, our unit fought a fierce battle with a convoy of the Japanese army that was constructing the Dunhua-Tumen railway near Haerbaling, Dunhua County.

After that battle I met Ko Jae Bong at Toudaoliangzi in the same county. He had left Sidaohuanggou where the enemy was riding roughshod over the people and come to Toudaoliangzi, where he was teaching at the peasants' school run by the underground organization. It was only 7 miles from Toudaoliangzi to the county town of Dunhua. At Toudaoliangzi I met his mother, too.

We distributed to all the houses there the flour we had captured in the battle with the Japanese army convoy. Then we prepared some food with it and had a meal with the people. The cotton cloth we had captured was handed over to the peasants' school to make uniforms for the pupils. Leaving Toudaoliangzi, our unit went farther north and conducted enlightenment work with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units near Guandi and in the Nanhutou area.

Then we moved into the Wangqing area, where we studied the activities of the party and Young Communist League bodies and mass organizations and made the acquaintance of people from all walks of life. This might well be called foundation work for establishing an operational base in Wangqing.

In Wangqing, too, we did not relax the work with the Chinese anti-Japanese units. I went to Lishugou to meet Guan Bao-quan's unit which had been attacked by a special detachment led by Lee Gwang for a few rifles. But Guan Bao-quan had abandoned the anti-Japanese cause and gone away.

Frankly speaking, I had decided that, when I met Battalion Commander Guan, I would apologize to him on behalf of our comrades in Wangqing and discuss ways to conduct a joint struggle with him and thereby resolve the temporary discord and antagonism that had been created between the Korean and Chinese armed units.

Although Guan Bao-quan had disappeared, I sent a message in the hope of meeting the other people who remained behind. Some 100 men of the Chinese unit came to us to see what kind of a unit was the Kim Il Sung unit which had smashed the Japanese troops at Dunhua county town. I admitted to them that it had been an unfriendly deed on the part of our Wangqing special detachment to have acted so outrageously against the soldiers of the unit of Commander Guan for the purpose of obtaining weapons, and spoke frankly about the joint struggle of the Korean and Chinese peoples and the mission of the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units. My speech was received well by the men of the Chinese unit.

A commanding officer named Kao Shan said after my speech that he had been thinking of abandoning the anti-Japanese struggle like Guan Bao-quan, but that he would follow the right path from then. After that he fought well on the anti-Japanese front as he had pledged to. Our relations with the Chinese anti-Japanese unit in Wangqing, which had been a great headache, were settled amicably in this way.

With the object of eliminating the Left deviation revealed in the work with the Chinese anti-Japanese units and bringing more of these units into the anti-Japanese united front, we called a meeting of the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee in Luozigou. At that time the national salvation army units concentrated in Dongning county town were preparing to retreat to China proper through the Soviet Union.

We decided that the national salvation army must by all means be stopped from fleeing across the border and that they should join us in the anti-Japanese front, otherwise, our guerrilla struggle might face grave difficulties; the enemy's "punitive" forces that were scattered everywhere to destroy the Chinese anti-Japanese units would be concentrated on our guerrilla force that was no more than a few hundred strong and might destroy at a stroke our armed force that was still in its cradle.

The balance of forces could turn decisively in favor of the enemy. At the time the Japanese army was stepping up its offensive against the anti-Japanese armed forces everywhere with the intention of occupying all the small towns in Manchuria. They even sought to seize all the county towns.

The meeting was attended by some 40 people, including me and Lee Gwang, Chen Han-zhang, Wang Run-cheng, Hu Jin-min and Zhou Bao-zhong. Lee Gwang and I represented our country and Chen Hanzhang, Wang Run-cheng, Hu Jin-min and Zhou Bao-zhong, China. The main item on the agenda concerned the measures to stop the desertion of the national salvation army and strengthen the anti-Japanese united front.

The meeting first discussed the mistake of the Wangqing guerrilla unit. The mistake had resulted from the Kim Myong San incident, which had happened in the Wangqing unit. Kim Myong San was a Korean who had served in the "guard corps" in the days of the Zhang Xue-liang army before defecting to the Wangqing guerrilla unit with six Chinese soldiers after the September 18 incident. Originally a master hunter, he was a good combatant. When he defected to them, the comrades of the Wangqing unit were overjoyed, welcoming his arrival as an unexpected fortune.

But once one of the six Chinese men was sent on a scouting mission to an enemy-controlled area. He ate a plate of fried buns in a cook shop at Dakanzi without paying for it, having no money. After returning to the unit, he reported the fact honestly. The Left elements in the leadership of the county party committee labeled the Chinese soldier as an evil man who brought disgrace on the guerrilla unit and shot him to death. The number of Chinese guerrillas executed in Wangqing on the decision of the military department of the county party committee was more than ten.

Frightened by the atmosphere of terror, the other Chinese men who had defected with Kim Myong San deserted from the unit and joined the unit of Guan Bao-quan stationed near Macun. They spread the rumor that the guerrillas were killing Chinese at random. Alarmed at this, Guan Bao-quan moved his unit to a deep mountain recess a long way from the area where the guerrilla unit was stationed and watched for an opportunity to kill Korean communists. On the anniversary of the October Revolution, the people of Wangqing gathered to celebrate with primitive weapons such as spears and sticks in their hands. They carried such crude weapons in order to create a festive atmosphere.

Thinking wrongly that the people were gathering to attack his unit, Guan Bao-quan flared up and had many Koreans shot to death. Among the dead were Kim Un Sik who, as chief of staff under Guan Bao-quan, had been enlightening the national salvation army men and promoting the united front movement, and other political workers including Hong Hae Il and Won Hong Gwon who had been dispatched from the guerrilla unit. It was a counterattack which, as the saying goes, "Sow the wind and reap the whirlwind."

Afterwards, Guan Bao-quan's men who had renounced their struggle, began to go by twos and threes to the area under enemy rule. The Wangqing guerrilla unit, on the pretext of stopping the surrender of the men of Guan's unit, disarmed them. Then, finally, they killed a few of the unit who had surrendered on the ground that they refused to give up their arms meekly.

With this incident as the start the members of Guan's unit went on a war of vengeance against Korean communists without discrimination. Whenever they met young Koreans who they imagined were involved in the communist movement, they caught them and shot them. The Wangqing guerrilla unit, which was only a few months old, suffered a great loss after being surrounded by the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese unit.

The tactlessness and indiscretion they revealed in their relations with the Chinese anti-Japanese unit rapidly undermined Korea-China relations and created an insurmountable pit in the way of the Korean revolution.

The people attending the meeting mercilessly criticized the commanders of the Wangqing guerrilla unit who had spoilt relations with the Chinese anti-Japanese units without being aware of the grave nature of their mistake and who were still insisting on taking reprisals. After a long debate they reached a common understanding on the principles and rules of action to be abided by in the work with the national salvation army.

The next question we discussed at the meeting concerned how to keep the national salvation army in Manchuria and induce it to continue with the anti-Japanese struggle.

At the time this army was tens of thousands strong, and yet they considered themselves incapable of standing up to the Japanese army. Taking at face value the story of the "invincibility" of the Japanese army spread by the Japanese themselves, they believed there was no force on earth which could match Japan and no army equal to the Japanese army, and they virtually gave up fighting. All they cared about was how to avoid being killed or captured by the Japanese troops and how to escape to safety beyond Shanhaiguan where there was as yet no spark of war.

The Japanese army intended to concentrate its attack on the forces of Wang De-lin in Jiandao. Once their attack started, it seemed that Luozigou would fall into their hands sooner or later.

Even steel, when it is rusted, is useless. Man is not steel; he is weaker and more liable to change. But it can be said that man is much stronger than steel. Steel cannot stop itself from rusting on its own, but man is capable of controlling and adjusting changes in his thoughts by himself. The question lies not in wavering but in how the wavering is overcome. Man is called the lord of all creation precisely because he has the unique ability to adjust, and revolutionaries are looked upon as great people because they are strong-willed, creative and selfless people who are capable of producing the things they need from nothing and turning an adverse tide to their advantage.

I was quite at a loss what to do. Even if the sky should fall and the earth cave in, the armed struggle had to be continued. But the men who remained with me were all rosy-cheeked youths of under 20. It could be said that I myself was still a greenhorn. When we were moving about in Jirin, writing leaflets and making speeches, we had all been heroes and great men. But here in this place we were all beginners. When we were conducting underground work, we had had many devices to resort to.

But in a deserted place without our tens of thousands of allied troops and where there were only the remnants of a defeated army, finding a way out for the 18 men was a tough problem. The stragglers in the upper house were going to become bandits, but that was something we could never do. Some countermeasure could have been worked out if we had only gone somewhere where the masses were organized, but it was about 50 miles to a Korean settlement and every valley on the way was infested with Japanese troops, so we were told.

The revolution is tough! I thought to myself. We had expected that our revolution would succeed in only two or three years, so why was it now at the edge of such a precipice? Would our ranks that had started from Antu in proud array with a flourish of bugles end their advance here on these desolate hills?

How many meals I had missed and how many sleepless nights I had passed to form this unit! Hadn't I been absent from the bedside of my mother at the hour of her death and hadn't I parted with my beloved brothers with a broken heart for the sake of forming this unit? Hadn't Cha Gwang Su and Choe Chang Gol laid down their young lives for these ranks? Cha Gwang Su had been killed while out on a scouting mission in Dunhua. Looking back on the path behind me and thinking of the path ahead, I felt my heart as heavy as if it was weighed down by the whole mass of the Earth.

I was sitting in front of the fireplace with my mind assailed by a thousand thoughts when old man Ma came up to me and asked quietly:

"Are you the person in charge?"

"Yes."

"So why are you in tears, Commander?"

"I think it's because I've come in the face of the snow and wind," I answered vaguely, to avoid an explanation. In fact, I was weeping from my anxiety about our future, not because of the snow and wind.

The old man stroked his long beard, his eyes fixed on me for a while.

"You seem to be worried about those ruffians in the upper house, but don't be disheartened. I'll take you to a good place tonight. Rest there for a few days. Study and eat there for about 20 days, and you'll find yourselves as bright as Zhu-ge Liang, I assure you." In the dead of night when we were fast asleep, old man Ma awoke us all and fed us with meat dumplings he had prepared for New Year's Day. Then he guided us to a mountain hut all of 12 miles away. The hut was located in dense forest and was invisible even to airplanes. Its only room was barely wide enough to spread a reed mat, and there was a shed attached to it. In the shed we found frozen roe deer and hares the old man had caught, food grain such as wheat and maize, and a hand mill.

"The room is rather small, but spread it with straw and it'll be good enough for you to get through your difficulties, though it might be a little uncomfortable. Shelter here and recover your strength. I'll come and tell you the news from the outside world once every few days. When you want to leave here, I'll act as your guide."

The old man said this as he made a fire to heat the room, and we all wept, feeling a lump in our throats out of our gratitude. We were lucky to have met such a kind and warmhearted man as old Ma on the bleak and deserted heights. All our men jested that "Heaven" was keeping its eye on us. We stayed in the mountain hut for over a fortnight, resting, studying and hunting roe deer.

There were many books of the old man's in the hut. They were stories, political books and biographies of great men. Although the old man earned a living by hunting in the mountains, he was a man of great learning. We vied with each other to read the books, and all the books eventually became tattered. We made it a rule to relate our impressions or hold a debate on a set subject after reading a book. We all became enthusiastic in our arguments, quoting propositions from Marx and Lenin.

We learned by heart several propositions of the founders of Marxism and some excellent passages from famous writers. In those days, whenever young people got together, they even criticized Sun Yat-sen. It was the fashion of the day to worship someone and also to criticize a great man who was held in high esteem by all. Everyone was his own master. Everyone thought of himself as a genius, a hero and a great man. In that hut we held earnest discussions about our future course of action, too. Should we break up and go home? Should we go to the Korean villages in Wangqing and gather the special detachments there, so that we could expand our unit with them and continue the struggle?

We all resolved to continue our struggle, except for a comrade from Hailong who said that he did not think he would be able to continue the armed struggle with us because he was weak. It was true, he was not strong enough physically to engage in the guerrilla struggle. We did not cavil at his candid confession or call it into question.

"If you cannot go, it is better that you say so outright. No one can be forced to make the revolution. The revolution is something which a man cannot be made to do by coercion or threat. Therefore, if you wish to go, you may go, and if you would like to continue with the revolution, you should stay on and fight," I told the men, making clear my view as the commander of the unit. I gave them all time to decide for themselves. A few days later we sat together again to hear their decision. Of our unit 16 men pledged to go on with the revolution, even if it might cost them their lives.

But the other two asked for permission to leave the unit. The comrade from Hailong wanted to be sent back home, being too weak to continue the armed struggle. But he asked us not to regard him as a coward for all that. Because he could not go with us on account of his physical frailty, we could not ignore his request. I told him: if you find it hard to follow us, then go home. We won't blame you for that. But you must not go looking as you do now. Your clothes are in tatters and you look like a beggar. You cannot go home to your parents looking so dreadful, can you? You may go, but go first to a Korean settlement to obtain travel expenses and get yourself some decent clothes.

The other comrade said he wanted to go to the Soviet Union and get some education. I told him:

"If you go to the Soviet Union without any sponsor, you cannot tell if they will send you to school or make you work. You may as well go to Wangqing and work there for a while, and then when you have made contact with the other side, leave with a warrant from an organization. Isn't that wiser?"

The two accepted my advice and said they would do as I had said.

After that we left the Luozigou heights safely guided by the old man Ma. He took us up to Zhuanjiaolou in Wangqing County. He really was a kind, considerate and tenderhearted old man. A few years later, at the height of the guerrilla struggle when we were striking out mercilessly at the enemy from the guerrilla bases, I visited the Luozigou heights with some cloth and provisions. But the old man Ma was already dead and gone.

Even now the image of old Ma remains in my memory as vividly as it did 60 years ago. Once I told our writers to create an opera or a play about the old man. The story of the old man is a good subject matter for an opera or a play.

It could be called a miracle of all miracles that we escaped death from hunger and the cold and were not killed by bullets in the remote mountain recess of Luozigou that winter. Still now I often ask myself what was the force that made us rise to our feet at that time, what was the force that kept us from being defeated or dropping out of the fighting ranks and made us continue to uphold the banner of the anti-Japanese struggle until we were victorious.

Every time I answer my own question full of pride, "It was a sense of responsibility for the revolution." If it were not for that sense of responsibility, we would have remained cowering in the snow, never to rise again. At that time I was conscious that if we should be frustrated, Korea could never rise from the dead. If I had thought there would be people to save Korea after we had died, we would have been buried under the snow on the heights of Luozigou, never to rise again.

7.1. The Home Base

In mid-February of 1933, guided by old man Ma, we marched towards the Wangqing guerrilla zone. When they reached the road, the 18 guerrillas, who had spent the long tedious hours of the last 20 days in the mountain hut in constant discussions of political affairs, lengthened their stride in high spirits. Although the traces of the winter-long trials they had undergone still lingered about them, the marching column was lively and moved at a brisk pace.

It is said that the inhabitants of Wangqing, if asked nowadays what are the distinctive features of their district, will remark wittily that the place is noted for the long speeches made by their county chief, the long primary school buildings, and the long valleys. This comment must be the brainchild of a local humorist fond of cracking jokes to express his feeling of attachment to the place.

If such a witty phrase had occurred to me at the time in 1933 when my comrades-in-arms asked me what Wangqing was like, I could have given them a chance to laugh following their terrible hardships. But I merely replied that it was a place where many exiles had settled. By exiles I meant revolutionaries.

In Wangqing the anti-Japanese independence struggle had raged more fiercely than in the other counties of the Jiandao area, even from the early years. It was in this county that Hong Bom Do, a famous veteran commander of the volunteers army, dealt a crushing blow to the Japanese "punitive" forces, and it was here too that Korea's independence Army under the northern political and military administration headed by So Il, Kim Jwa Jin and Lee Porn Sok had established its base. It was in this county that Lee Tong Hwi set about the training of cadres for the Independence Army.

The vigorous activity of the Independence Army and the frequent appearance of independence fighters in this area had awoken the inhabitants' national consciousness and stimulated them to fight for their country against the Japanese.

As the tide of the Independence Army movement receded and the independence fighters withdrew into the Maritime Province of Siberia and Soviet-Manchurian border districts, the leadership of the national liberation struggle in the Wangqing area gradually passed into the hands of the communists, and the main trend of the struggle shifted from nationalism to communist movement. On the patriotic soil which had been fertilized by the blood of the nationalists, the forerunners of a new ideological trend developed the communist movement.

For all this, the motive force of the struggle remained basically unchanged. The Overwhelming majority of the nationalists became converts to the communist movement. The ranks of the communist movement thus included not only those who had, from the outset, taken the communist path, but also those nationalists who had gradually come to accept communism. It would have been impossible to launch the communist movement if it had been restricted to people free of all political taint. This is the principle of inheritance and innovation, one of the principles which have guided us in the development of the revolution. Communist ideology is the acme of human thought, and the communist movement is the highest stage of the revolutionary movements, but it would be a mistake to think, for this reason, that the communist movement starts and develops from a tabula rasa.

In any case, Wangqing was famous for its long record of anti-Japanese struggle, for the favorable mood among its masses and its firm political footing. It was also located near the six towns in the northern frontier region of Korea, and adjacent to Yanji and Longjing, which were the centers of the patriotic cultural enlightenment movement in the Jiandao area. These circumstances presented various advantages. The saying has it that deep pools attract fish, and this place naturally attracted many revolutionaries.

In those days people used to say; those who wish to work their way through university should go to Japan, those who wish to eat bread should go to the Soviet Union, and those who wish to work for the revolution should go to Jiandao. This reflected the thinking of the young people of Korea in those years, when they regarded east Manchuria as the theatre of battle for national liberation and aspired to join the struggle there.

Going to Jiandao was as dangerous as approaching the opening of a pillbox, but we marched straight towards the pillbox without hesitation in order to forward the triumph of the revolution.

We marched with light steps towards the guerrilla zone, not because a sumptuous meal or comfortable beds awaited us, but because there we would find the comrades and people with whom we would share life and death, the ground which we would tread with the step of freedom, and a land of our own, which defied the ordinances of the Japanese Emperor and the decrees of the governor-general.

By February 1933, when we advanced towards Zhuanjiaolou under the guidance of old man Ma, the work of developing guerrilla bases in many parts of east Manchuria had been almost finished, and they had begun to demonstrate the effect they could have.

To establish the guerrilla bases and use them as a source of strength to launch a powerful armed struggle was one of the major policies adopted by the Korean communists at their winter meeting at Mingyuegou. At this meeting we had stated that in order to launch a campaign of armed resistance we must establish our positions, which was simply an expression of our intention to develop guerrilla bases.

At the meeting at Xiaoshahe in the spring of 1932 we raised the matter again, as a separate item on the agenda, and discussed seriously how we could develop the guerrilla bases in the form of liberated areas - a matter which had already been discussed at the Mingyuegou meeting the previous winter. After the meeting at Xiaoshahe, we sent able leaders to different parts of the Jiandao area and increased the tempo of revolutionary training for the rural villages. This was the first stage in our work of establishing the guerrilla bases.

The revolutionized rural areas had served as temporary bases for the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army pending the establishment of the guerrilla zones, and they provided the ground on which to develop the guerrilla bases. One guerrilla base after another had been developed in the places we had selected as most suitable at the Mingyuegou meeting in winter, that is, in the mountainous areas around Antu, Yanji, Wangqing, Helong and Wangougou, Hailangou, Shirengou, Sandaowan, Xiaowangqing, Gayahe, Yaoyinggou, Yulangcun, Dahuanggou and Yantonglazi. All this was achieved through the titanic efforts of the Korean communists and at the cost of their blood in a fierce struggle against the enemy.

The blood spilt and the efforts dedicated to the establishment of these guerrilla bases in the area along the Tuman River by the Korean communists Yang Song Ryong, Lee Kwang, Jang Ryong San, Choe Chun Guk, Ju Jin, Park Tong Gun, Park Kil, Kim Li Hwan, Cha Ryong Dok, Kang Sok Liwan, An Kil, Lee Kuk Jin, Lee Pong Su and others will be long remembered in history. Prominent figures of the time were quick to assemble in the guerrilla bases in the Jiandao area, traveling from the homeland and abroad.

Many people came to the Wangqing area, including Kim Paek Ryong, Jo Tong Uk, Choe Song Suk, Jon Mun Jin and other communists of north Manchuria, who settled at Xiaowangqing. The new inhabitants of Xiaowangqing also included communists and independence fighters who had been operating in the Maritime Province of Siberia, as well as the people who, after many years of underground activity in the enemy-held area, had moved here because their identity had been exposed, and patriots and Marxists who, on hearing that Jiandao was the center of the Korean revolution, had crossed the border from the homeland.

The guerrilla bases in east Manchuria thus became the assembly area for the elite who were firmly resolved to work for the revolution, or already tempered by experience of the practical struggle. Therefore, the political character of the population was as transparent as the limpid water of the River Dawangqing. In terms of their morale and determination, each of them was a match for a hundred.

Exploiting the favorable conditions created by the establishment of this strategic center of the revolution, the Korean communists expanded the ranks of the guerrillas, established party and Young Communist League organizations, the Anti-Imperialist Union, the Peasants' Association, the Anti-Japanese Women's Association, the Children's Corps, the Red Guards and the Children's Vanguard, i.e., organizations uniting various sections of the population or paramilitary organizations, in preparation for resistance struggle involving the entire people. Organs of the revolutionary government were established in every district of the guerrilla zones. They set about building homes for the people, and providing them with genuine democratic rights and freedoms which their ancestors had never experienced.

They were true champions of the people's interests. The revolutionary government distributed land among the people, guaranteed them the rights to work, free education and free medical care, and thus built a society in which, for the first time in history, everyone enjoyed equality, and everyone supported and led each other forward, a society in which the noble morality of mutual respect prevailed. In the guerrilla zone there were neither rich people who threw their weight about nor poor people who were weighed down by the heavy burden of debts and taxes.

The guerrilla bases were vibrant with a rapturous enthusiasm which no suffering or hardship could ever dampen. It was the optimistic enthusiasm of people who, completely free from the fetters of social oppression, were building an independent new life. The happiness of the peasants, who danced to the beat of gongs as they drove in the stakes to mark off their plots of the land distributed by the people's revolutionary government, heralded the approach of the greatest event of the century, that sweeping transformation of the world which was first effected by the Korean communists in the wilderness of Jiandao. Their life went on amid continued trials such as had already cost constant bloodshed and sacrifice, but the people's dreams of a bright future gave them hope and inspired their songs.

The guerrilla bases in the Jiandao area, a tall citadel in one corner of the East, were writing a magnificent new chapter in the history of national liberation in defiance of the enemy's constant attacks. They became a symbol of future happiness winning the adoring admiration of people in the homeland. Wherever they lived, and whatever their ideals, the Korean people regarded this citadel, built by the communists at the cost of their own blood, as their only beacon-light and gave it heartfelt support and encouragement. In short, the guerrilla zones inspired the people with hope, optimism and joy; they were the land of promise, the promise of the happiness dreamed of by the people since time immemorial.

The guerrilla bases became a source of constant headaches for the top brass of the imperial headquarters in Tokyo. Having guerrilla zones located just across the Tuman River, on the northeastern boundary of Korea, was a sore point for the enemy. Takagi Takeo' once aptly described the Jiandao area as the "centre of resistance against Manchukuo and Japan as well as a communist artery that runs from the north to Japan through Korea."

Japanese militarists called the guerrilla bases in east Manchuria a "cancer destructive to Oriental peace," an expression which clearly reflected their fear of the guerrilla zone. The Japanese imperialists feared the zone, not because the area was particularly extensive, or because a large communist force capable of overpowering their Kwangtung Army was encamped there, or because there was any possibility of a shell launched from Jiandao falling upon the roof of the royal palace or the imperial headquarters in Tokyo. They dreaded it because Koreans who harbored a bitter hatred for the Japanese made up the vast majority of the population in that region, and most of these Koreans were committed to the revolution strongly enough to give their lives without hesitation in the battle against Japanese domination.

The fact that more than 90 per cent of the communists and Young Communist League members in that region were Koreans is sufficient to explain why the rulers of Japan were so concerned by the guerrilla zone, regarding it as the greatest obstacle to their effective rule of Manchuria. Both the valorous generals of the Righteous Volunteers' Army, who had fought for over a decade in the homeland and in the wilderness of Manchuria against the "Ulsa Treaty" (the protectorate treaty concluded in 1905?Tr.) and the "annexation of Korea by Japan" forged by the Japanese militarists, and the surviving forces of the Independence Army, equipped as they were with matchlock rifles, were still operating in that region against the Japanese army and police.

The example of indissoluble fraternal ties between the Korean and Chinese communists was established there, and spread throughout Manchuria and China proper. The guerrilla zone in Jiandao was not a "cancer destructive to Oriental peace," but the very beacon-light of that peace.

Our efforts to fulfill our strategic task of establishing guerrilla bases for our revolution suffered a severe test when the Japanese militarist forces launched a wholesale "punitive" operation intended to smother the anti-Japanese armed struggle in its cradle. The result of their scorched-earth operations, however, was to speed up the establishment of guerrilla bases in Jiandao.

In the spring of 1932, the Japanese Kwangtung Army in Manchuria and their army forces in Korea discussed measures for dealing with what they called the Jiandao affair. The scheme was to dispatch a task force from their army in Korea to Jiandao in order to put down the revolutionary movement there. Accordingly a Jiandao task force composed of a regiment from the Japanese army division in Ranam, Korea, reinforced by the troops of the Kyongwon garrison, a cavalry troop, a field artillery battery and an air-force company, set out on an expedition to the four counties in east Manchuria where the flames of rebellion had raged during the harvest season and the seasonal spring food-shortage. The task force wrought havoc in the villages and towns, massacring and burning down the homes of those who rose in revolt for their country's freedom. for a life of independence.

The enemy's atrocities began with his assault on Dakanzi in the early part of April 1932 and drowned the fields and mountains of Wangqing in a bloodbath. Dakanzi was the village where Lee Kwang, RI Ung Gol and Kim Yong Bom had led the harvest-time struggle and where Kim Chol, Yang Song Ryong, Kim Un Sik, Lee Ung Man, Lee Won Sop and other comrades had captured weapons by raiding the public security office. As the large force of the Ranam 19th Division pressed forward under cover of artillery fire, machineguns and aircraft, the national salvation army unit under the command of Wang De-lin, which was stationed in the village, withdrew in haste across Mt. Mopan to Xidapo, and the defense corps of the village surrendered to the "punitive" force.

Having occupied Dakanzi, the Japanese bombed the streets of Wangqing, and then attacked the town, killing its inhabitants, setting fire to houses and plundering them of property. Even the house of Li Hengzhong, the richest man in Wangqing, who owned the largest estate in the district, was burnt down by the occupation force.

There followed the destruction of the villages of Deyuanli and Shangqingli. The atrocities were so cruel and violent that the inhabitants of Wangqing composed a song about them;

On the sixth of April, 1932, Dakanzi was attacked by the Japanese, Shells bursting, roaring across the hills all around. Under the rain of bullets and shrapnel And bombs dropped from aircraft The poor people were massacred. Flames from Daduchuan soared into the sky The village of Deyuanli was reduced to ashes. Innocent people were killed all over the fields And the fields of Wangqing became deserted. Proletarian masses of Manchuria, rise in unity And fight the enemy. Boiling blood drives us out to take the field And raise the flag of victory.

Throngs of people who had lost their homes and families in this barbarous "punitive" operation, surged into the valleys of Xiaowangqing and Dawangqing. The Japanese aircraft even bombed the defenseless refugees. The crystal-clear water of rivers in Wangqing was suddenly stained red with blood. The guts of dead people drifted down the rivers. The village of Zhuanjiaolou, to which we were guided by old man Ma, had suffered heavily from the atrocities perpetrated by the Jiandao task force. The barbarous beasts who fell upon the defenseless village had locked up scores of young people, women and children in a house and burnt them to death. The village had been instantly reduced to ashes. The fact that many counties in east Manchuria circulated a written protest, "An Appeal to Our Fellow Countrymen in Protest against the Massacre at Zhuanjiaolou!" indicates just how extensive and how brutal the "punitive" action was.

Zhuanjiaolou which is located near Luozigou and Xiaowangqing, one of the major bases of the revolution in Jiandao, had been under the powerful revolutionary influence of the anti-Japanese struggle from the early years. The valley, which was home to thousands of peasants, rafts-men and lumbermen, provided fine ground for the activities of vanguard organizations such as the party, the Young Communist League and the revolutionary organizations of various sections of the population. During the spring struggle, these organizations had mobilized the masses in the destruction of the defense corps which had been entrenched in the village.

The members of the defense corps, frightened by this mass uprising, had fled into the mountains and become bandits.

The struggle had been successful, but 13 people were killed.

The heated vortex of these struggles transformed Zhuanjiaolou into a breeding-ground for stalwart revolutionaries. Jang Ryong San, who was the commander of the 3rd company of the Wangqing guerrilla unit, had worked as a rafts man between Zhuanjiaolou and Shanchakou. Hamatang, where Lee Kwang had worked in the guise of a headman of a hundred households, was only several miles from Zhuanjiaolou.

The enemy did not hesitate to destroy a whole village in order to kill one communist: they even had a motto, "Kill a hundred people to destroy one communist." The three-point policy of killing everyone, burning everything, and plundering everything, which was applied in the attack launched on the liberated area in north China by Okamura Yasuji, commander of the Japanese forces in north China, during the Sino-Japanese war had, in fact, been applied earlier in the "punitive" expedition to Jiandao in the 1920s, and had culminated in a scorched-earth policy when the guerrilla zones throughout east Manchuria were destroyed in the early 1930s.

The three-point policy and the so-called village-concentration policy, which had been adopted by the Japanese imperialists in Korea and Manchuria for the purpose of "severing the people from the bandits," were applied by the French colonialists in military operations to put down the Algerian resistance forces and were perfected by the Americans in Vietnam.

Sandaowan, Hailangou, Longjing, Fenglindong and all the other renowned revolutionary villages in Yanji County were littered with dead bodies. In Sanhanli and in its surrounding area in Hunchun County more than 1,600 houses were burnt down. The number of people massacred in Yanji County alone amounted to ten thousand. No words could be strong enough to condemn all the crimes committed by the Jiandao task force.

The Japanese even destroyed simple kitchen utensils, in addition to killing the inhabitants of Jiandao and plundering their property. They destroyed cooking pots and overturned under-floor heating facilities. They pulled down the houses remaining and carried off the structural elements to the town of Daduchuan. The refugees had to sleep in improvised grass huts and cook on hot stones, without cooking pots.

The villagers who were unable to flee were threatened with death if they would not allow themselves to be dragged to the towns of Dakanzi or Daduchuan.

The "punitive" force made no exceptions for landlords in applying their forced evacuation orders. It was no secret that a considerable portion of the food supplies and other goods needed for the anti-Japanese guerrillas had come from landlords and propertied people. The enemy therefore attempted to cut off the source of these supplies and stifle the revolutionary army, already suffering from constant shortages of food and clothing. Harassed by the enemy's tenacious pursuits the revolutionary masses roamed the mountains, without eating regular meals. But the mountains did not always provide safe shelter. Even the deepest of the valleys had dead ends, where the refugees had to hide in the forest. In such situation a baby's cry meant death for everyone.

When the "punitive" troops were searching close to one group's hiding people, a woman gave breast to her baby and hugged it hard to prevent it crying and bringing destruction on the revolutionary masses. When the "punitive" troops withdrew, the woman found her baby was dead. Similar tragedies took place in every village and every valley of Jiandao. To avoid such accidents, some women used to doze their babies with opium to keep them fast asleep. Unable to endure the ceaseless atrocities perpetrated by the "punitive" troops, some women even gave their beloved babies to strangers.

The women of this country suffered heart-rending trials for the sake of the revolutionary masses and their comrades-in-arms, for the sake of the anti-Japanese struggle which was dearer to them than their own lives.

Bourgeois humanists may mock at the maternal love of communists, asking how a woman could be so cruel towards her baby or be so irresponsible with its life. But they must not hold these women responsible for the deaths of their infants. If they knew how many bitter tears were shed as these women buried the soft bodies of their babies in dry leaves and left their babies in the care of strangers, and if they knew what deep scars were left in the hearts of these women, they would condemn and hate the Japanese imperialists who sent their human butchers to Jiandao. The crime of trampling upon the maternal love of this country's women was committed by none other than the fiends of Japanese militarism.

If she is to make amends for her past, Japan must repent of these crimes. Remorse for past crimes cannot, of course, be a pleasant feeling, but no matter how bitter or shameful such remorse may be, it will be much easier to bear than the heart-rending agony that our mothers and sisters felt as they were compelled to leave their own flesh and blood behind in the shadow of strangers' fences, or as they thrust lumps of opium down the throats of their babies. In demanding evidence of their past crimes, the rulers of Japan continue to mock the memory of millions of Koreans who were slaughtered by their army.

The revolutionary masses faced the alternative of being dragged down to urban communities by the Japanese or going deeper into mountains to live there and continue the fight. How many of these Koreans who had abandoned their fertile paddy fields to come to Jiandao would obey the enemy's orders to move to towns which were under the rule of the Japanese army?

Most of the inhabitants of Jiandao were poor peasants who had been deprived of their livelihood by the Japanese colonialists, and left their home districts in pursuit of the promised land like Ryultoguk. Although bled white by the local officials and landlords, the poor peasants had reclaimed steep hill slopes and valleys in the mountain ranges of Laoyeling and Haerbaling, removing the stones and pulling up tree roots by dint of Herculean efforts. Exhausting as slash-and-burn farming was, and poor as they remained, these peasants had been contented with their lot simply because they were free of molestation by the Japanese. Which of them would ever obey the Japanese orders to follow them to towns, leaving behind homes and lands which they had made fertile with their own sweat and blood? This was the test set for the people of Wangqing who had experienced the massacre.

A few people, terrified into submission by the enemy's atrocities, began to move down to the towns. But the overwhelming majority, who yearned to see a new world, moved deeper into the mountains in spite of the menace of the enemy. People who only yesterday had shared joy and sorrow in one mind for the revolution in the same village were now parting with each other, some going to towns and others to mountains.

The people who chose the mountains moved to the great forests of Xiaowangqing and Dawangqing, 25 miles away from the Wangqing county town (Baicaogou). It was around this time that the family of Lee Chi Baek moved from Zhongqingli to Macun.

The Wangqing county party committee and other county-level organs had established their bases in Xiaowangqing. The east Manchuria ad hoc committee which had been operating by moving between Xilinhe in Yanji County, Taipinggou, Wangougou and Beidong finally settled in the spring of 1933 in the valley of Lishugou at Xiaowangqing, which became the revolution's centre and capital in Jiandao. The tide of history brought ourselves and the Chinese party, our revolution and the Chinese revolution, together, and we came to share a single pulse.

The Wangqing guerrilla base consisted of five organized revolutionary districts, including district No. 1, which included Yaoyinggou under its jurisdiction, and district No. 2, which had Macun and Shiliping under its control.

In those days the Wangqing guerrillas were grouped into three companies; their prominent commanders and leaders were Lee Kwang, Yang Song Ryong, Kim Chol, Jang Ryong San, Choe Chun Guk and Lee Ung Man.

That was what I learned on my arrival in Wangqing, from a briefing given by Yang Song Ryong, one of the founders of the Wangqing guerrilla force, and Lee Yong Guk, secretary of the county party committee. These comrades had shown me around the Wangqing guerrilla base when I visited the place to acquaint myself with the situation there in the autumn of 1932. At that time, as I made the rounds of the guerrilla zones in the Wangqing County I had given guidance to the work of the primary party organizations, the Anti-Japanese Association, the Anti-Japanese Women's Association and other mass organizations. I had also received reports from the political workers operating in the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units.

Also around this time we had given a short training course on explosive weapons for workers from the munitions factories in different counties of east Manchuria and for the commanders of the guerrilla army.

In those days the leaders of Wangqing County were racking their brains in the search for solutions to the food problem. More than one thousand people had thronged into the narrow valley at Xiaowangqing, where there were only a few dozen houses. The food reserves were too small to feed them all. Now and then the guerrillas had attacked the enemy and captured food, but the amounts were not enough to satisfy the hunger of the many people in the bases. The contribution of the harvest from the small plots of arid land in the guerrilla zone was also negligible.

In these circumstances, it was suggested that the food problem could be solved for the moment by harvesting the crops in no-man's land. By no-man's land I mean the deserted farm lands between the guerrilla bases and the enemy-ruled areas.

There were deserted villages near Xiaowangqing and Dawangqing Unable to endure the atrocities perpetrated by the barbarous "punitive" force, the villagers had fled, some of them to the enemy area, and others to the guerrilla zone, leaving their crops unharvested. Some of the crops belonged to the landlords and reactionaries who had fled to the enemy area, and some of them belonged to the peasants whom the Japanese had forced at bayonet-point to move to Baicaogou and Daduchuan.

The abandoned crops were also coveted by those who had fled to the enemy area. The landlords and reactionaries came every day with horse-drawn carts and other vehicles under the escort of armed self-defense corps men, harvested the crops and carried them away. Sometimes they even approached the guerrillas' threshing floor and opened fire.

In view of this. we decided to form harvesting teams in all the guerrilla districts and mobilize all the people in the base to gather the crops in no-man's land without delay. We informed the Wangqing people of the decision and discussed the measures required for its implementation with them.

The harvesting team began reaping the crops at the entrance of Xiaowangqing and advanced towards Daduchuan. The grain was threshed as soon as it was reaped, then it was stored for distribution to the inhabitants of the guerrilla zone. Harvesters working in the fields below the village of thirteen households had to be protected by the Red Guards against the self-defense corps, which was equipped with rifles capable of taking five cartridges at a time. There were occasionally fierce engagements between the two sides, who fired over the heads of the harvesters. We were deeply moved by the heroism of the Wangqing people who worked day and night to gather the crops at the risk of their lives.

Arduous as the struggle was, I was satisfied, as I left Xiaowangqing, that everything in the base was being done as we had intended.

On my way back to the guerrilla base, I set myself two major tasks. The first was to achieve a large-scale expansion of the ranks of the guerrillas and the second was to intensify the efforts of the united front to rally the patriotic forces of all social strata in line with the new situation, in which the theatre of our operations was shifting to the area of the Tuman River. We also needed to work with the anti-Japanese units of the Chinese nationalists.

Having guided us as far as Zhuanjiaolou, old man Ma returned to Luozigou. The jovial fellow, whom the Anti-Japanese Association provided as our guide in place of old man Ma, told us an interesting story about the small units of the Wangqing guerrillas, and how they had defeated the Japanese "punitive" troops that had invaded Yaoyinggou and Sishuiping.

The following day, we marched into the guerrilla zone of Yaoyinggou, the center of Wangqing district No. 1, with the flag of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army flying and bugles blowing at the head of our advancing column.

Hong Yong Hwa, a woman whose nephew Choe Kum San was my orderly in later years before he was killed in battle, came running up to the roadside with about 20 members of the Children's Corps, and they welcomed us, waving their hands. She was in charge of the work with women under the party committee of Wangqing district No. 1. She was highly respected by the soldiers and the people for her devoted work for the guerrillas and the Chinese anti-Japanese units.

That day the people of Yaoyinggou prepared millet cakes and buck wheat noodles for us. In the evening they invited us to a performance given by the Children's Corps.

Lee Ung Gol, head of the organizational section of the Wangqing district No. 1 party committee, watched the soldiers and people enjoy their party together with tears in his eyes. "General Kim Il Sung," he said, "we have been hearing news of your unit for many months. We heard that, after your expedition to south Manchuria, you attacked Dunhua and Emu in north Manchuria. The people here have been waiting for your unit for a long time. Now our hearts feel strong. "I left the celebration and followed him to the office of the district party committee. We spent hours in discussion of the work of the guerrilla zone. Our attention was focused on how we should go about expanding the party and the other revolutionary organizations in places like Zhuanjiaolou, and how we should arm all the people in the guerrilla zone.

When we were elaborating measures for the defense of the guerrilla zone, a messenger came to us with a secret note from the enemy-ruled area. The note stated briefly that the Japanese garrison troops at Daxinggou would attack the guerrilla zone the next day.

"They must be coming to avenge themselves on the guerrillas who attacked them in December last year," Lee Ung Gol remarked with a wry smile, as if he were responsible for the enemy's attempt to attack Yaoyinggou. "Those devils can't even show proper respect for guests who have made a journey of hundreds of miles. We were planning to give your unit a few days' good rest before you left. What an unfortunate coincidence!"

"Oh no!" I said. "It's a happy coincidence. The men's hands have been itching after all these months without a fight. It seems the moment has come for the enemy to pay for the blood spilt by our people at Dakanzi, Zhuanjiaolou, Deyuanli and Sanhanli." I sent a messenger to Lee Kwang, telling him to transfer his unit to Yaoyinggou in a hurry.

Lee Ung Gol puffed at his hand-rolled cigarette in agitation for a while, then stood up to go to the party and summon the commander of the Red Guards. It was clear from his expression that he had decided to give orders for a general mobilization. Smiling, I took him by the sleeve and pulled him back into his seat.

"Comrade Ung Gol, you are going to tell the Red Guards that the enemy is coming, aren't you? The party seems to be at its height at the moment. So don't disturb them, please. Send them all home in an hour and let them sleep well until early next morning. And I, too, will send my men for a sound sleep early tonight."

It might seem contrary to normal military practice to allow the men and the people to enjoy themselves, instead of alerting them, when we knew that the enemy was going to attack us very soon. It was quite natural that the head of the organizational section of the district party committee, who was also in charge of military affairs, should glance at me uneasily. Nonetheless, we kept the message about the enemy's intentions to ourselves. The men were sent to their beds as I had suggested. I did not wish to excite them when they were still tired from the march. I knew quite well that no stout-hearted man could sleep when his spirits had been aroused by combat orders.

"At least tonight I must not let their sleep be disturbed. How many sleepless nights they have already spent during the last winter!" This was the thought uppermost in my mind that night. Perhaps it was a case of indulgence inappropriate for a guerrilla commander. In any case, the men were fast asleep by eleven o'clock.

Our guide from Zhuanjiaolou and the messenger from the enemy-held area could not get to sleep until midnight, probably because they did not feel sure that my decision was correct. Lee Ung Gol, head of the organizational section, too, tossed and turned in his bed. "On our march I found the hills at the entrance to Yaoyinggou fascinating. What about giving battle there?" I suggested in whisper. "There's a motor road running along the foot of the hills, isn't there?"

Lee Ung Gol responded to my words by sitting up. "You mean the hills west of Dabeigou? They are a natural fortress."

We were still discussing this question at about four o'clock in the morning.

Not long afterwards we climbed the hills, which were the gate to Yaoyinggou, so to speak. The commander of the Red Guards and the member of the Anti-Japanese Association from Zhuanjiaolou accompanied us. The southern sides of the hills were craggy cliffs, along the bottom of which ran a vehicular road. Parallel to the road flowed a river called the Yiaotongou. The hills were full of rocks which provided natural shelters for the guerrillas.

We built up piles of stones between crags and then called together all the men of the Red Guards from Yaoyinggou and my unit and some members of the special detachment and took them to the hills. I told them to dig themselves in on the frozen ground and gave them combat orders, which concluded with an encouraging speech to the following effect:

Our ancestors used to describe such features of the terrain as impregnable. Highly advantageous to the defenders, and disadvantageous to the attackers! An impregnable fortress is a fine thing, but I have more confidence in your combat efficiency. Comrades, sing the song of tragedy no more, but let the enemy pay dearly today for the blood shed by our people. Blood for blood!

That day, more than 80 Japanese troops who were advancing on four trucks into the valley of Yaoyinggou, were caught in our ambush and scores of them were killed or wounded. The next day, the Japanese garrison troops at Daxinggou launched an all-out attack on Yaoyinggou again, only to suffer heavy casualties before they fled.

That was the first battle we fought in a guerrilla zone in Jiandao. It was probably named the defensive battle of the Yaoyinggou guerrilla zone by the historians.

On the evening of the following day the inhabitants of Yaoyinggou celebrated the victory in the village of Dabeigou. I still remember the event. The representatives of the various organizations delivered speeches of passionate congratulation, waving their fists in the air. Of course, I also made an impassioned speech that night.

I think it was during that winter or the previous autumn that I met O Jin U at Yaoyinggou. On that occasion the villagers of Xiaobeigou held a welcome meeting in our honor at the Children's Corps school where O Jin U was working as an instructor. He occasionally looks back with deep emotion upon our first meeting, saying that he was strongly impressed by me as I spoke then, holding a Model 38 rifle in my hand, with the butt resting on the ground. He was then fifteen or sixteen years old, and he would follow at my heels, toying with the Mauser that hung on my waist. He seemed to be very envious of it. We were all equipped with Model 38 rifles or with the most modern pistols.

I asked O Jin U if he wished to join the guerrilla army. He said he had applied, but had not been accepted because he was too young. We accepted him into the 4th Wangqing company the following year or the year after, and took him on an expedition to north Manchuria. While we were preparing to leave for Xiaowangqing after having repulsed the enemy and acquainted ourselves with the work of the party and mass organizations, a messenger arrived with a summons for us to go to Macun to discuss an important military matter. We left Yaoyinggou immediately.

On our arrival at Xiaowangqing we were received by Wang Runcheng, alias Ma Ying, and two other men. He was more often known by another nickname - Wang danaodai - which meant a man with an unusually large head.

Dagezi and some other personnel of the guerrilla zone guided me to the foot of the hill at the back of Macun and the house of old man Lee Chi Baek where I stayed and where I met the representatives of the east Manchuria party committee. Dagezi is Lee Yong Guk's nickname, it means a long fellow. He was the secretary of the Wangqing county party committee at the time. There was a bachelors' quarters which had been made into a "travelers' home," but I was persuaded to stay at the old man's house because the "travelers' home" was crowded and noisy. Lee Chi Baek was Kim Jung Gwon's father-in-law, and the name of the old man's wife was So Song Nyo.

Lee Chi Baek's family were all patriots and revolutionaries.

In his house I dressed in dabushanzi (a Chinese gown?Tr.) for talks with Wang Run-cheng and his company.

"Congratulations upon your arrival in Wangqing!" Wang Danaodai greeted me.

"I am glad to see you again," I replied, shaking his hands.

I was lucky to meet a revolutionary who was an old acquaintance of mine in Wangqing, where I was a stranger. I had first met him at Antu, when I was concentrating on work with the anti-Japanese units of the Chinese nationalists, following my return from the campaign in south Manchuria. In those days he and Chen Hanzhang had been working with the soldiers of Commander Meng's regiment of the national salvation army.

Commander Meng's regiment had moved from north Manchuria to the Antu area in order to make contact with Tang Ju-wu's units of the self-defence army in the Liaoning area and enter into cooperation with them. The Chinese communists who were working with Wu Yi-cheng in his national salvation army unit had been trying to extend the anti-Japanese struggle throughout Manchuria by arranging an alliance of the anti-Japanese forces in north and south Manchuria.

Commander Meng's regiment had been sent to Antu by Wu Yicheng on another mission to obtain opium needed to raise funds for military purposes. The Antu area was a major source of opium and ginseng (ginseng?Tr.). Tang Ju-wu had also sent his men to Antu with a view to establishing a monopoly of the opium trade in that area. In those days opium was used in place of currency.

"Comrade Kim Il Sung," Wang Run-cheng said half-jokingly at a meeting of the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee held at Lee Kwang's house, "the success of the national salvation army units in cooperation with your unit in the attack on Dunhua and Emu can be attributed to opium. The large amount of opium that was obtained in Antu and distributed among my men had strengthened their morale."

We were familiar enough with each other to speak our minds frankly on such matters. Wang helped us a great deal in the course of our work in Antu. He used to carry messages to maintain contact between myself and Hu Jinmin or Zhou Bao-zhong. Since he was in charge of propaganda in the national salvation army, he had had free access to the commander's headquarters, to say nothing of regimental, battalion and company headquarters. He was a good messenger for me and for the communists who had been posted to the national salvation army.

As was usually the case with intellectuals who had been trained in a normal school, Wang, though a man of large build, was gentle and good-natured. He had taken up the revolutionary cause during his normal School days at Ningan, under the influence of schoolmates who had studied in large cities like Beijing, Nanjing and Tianjin. His final commitment to the revolutionary cause was due especially to the influence of Comrade Pan, who was on the provincial party committee.

"Comrade Kim Il Sung," Wang said. "The revolution is raging fiercely in east Manchuria now, and in this situation we expect a great deal from you. We are very glad of your arrival in Wangqing at a time when the revolution in east Manchuria needs able strategists to develop party work, guerrilla activities, and work with the national salvation army.

He analyzed the developments in north and east Manchuria in considerable detail, and we had a frank exchange of views concerning the tasks facing the party organizations in east Manchuria at that time. The most urgent task we discussed was the establishment of a system of unified command over the companies that had so far been operating autonomously in the different guerrilla zones, and also the increasing of our military forces and the improvement of their quality. This matter was also later discussed in detail with Tong Chang-rong.

As a result, the guerrilla companies in Wangqing were brought under the unified command of their battalion headquarters.

This was followed by a regrouping of the companies in other counties in east Manchuria into battalions, and by the reappointment of their commanders. These were preparations for the full-scale development of guerrilla warfare.

These were the impressive events that marked our arrival in Wangqing. We soon became used to the new surroundings. The sense of exotic newness we usually felt whenever we changed our theatre of activity soon gave way to an attachment to the new place and curiosity about it.

By 1933 I had lost nearly all the people dearest to me. The death of my mother had orphaned her three sons, and the sweet home of these three boys at the village of Xiaoshahe among the field of reeds had been left deserted and filled with cobwebs. All that remained with me were my two younger brothers, who were in the charitable care of strangers, and my grandparents who had given their beloved sons to the country, and were now living in isolation at my old home in Mangyongdae, for which I felt a bitter nostalgia. My feelings of filial devotion to them could not reach out to the hearth of the home, and my desire to take loving care of my brothers was a source of futile worry.

The only place where the tender feelings of my heart could produce any effect was the guerrilla zone in which I was to fight. The people here would become as dear to me as my own grandparents, my own parents and my own brothers. In the personality of the mistress of the house, So Song Nyo, I rediscovered the warm character of my own mother, her love and benevolence.

Because of the enemy's constant blockade and "punitive" assaults, the guerrilla bases in east Manchuria faced numerous trials from the outset. In this historic land of Wangqing which is fixed for ever in my memory, many battles were fought, much blood was spilt, and we endured great agonies. Sometimes scores of people were killed, or scores of houses and barracks burnt down, in a single day. The hospitals were crowded with wounded soldiers and sick people. Food-shortages throughout the guerrilla zone and recurrent famine caused innumerable deaths. Sometimes an epidemic threatened the entire population of Jiandao with extinction.

In that part of the world there were neither shops, nor markets, nor merchants, nor any money in circulation. Here the law of value had no effect. Shoes and clothing for the population were obtained by capturing the enemy's supplies. From time to time Leftist deviation shook the guerrilla zone and plunged it into apprehension.

Nonetheless, all these difficulties by no means dominated life there. A new way of living in freedom and happiness - although in a somewhat limited and relative sense-together with the optimistic spirit of a people who had been liberated from the tyranny of the enemy, defined the main line of development in the guerrilla zone. The difficulties were enormous, but the morale of the soldiers and civilians was high. In this isolated region, beyond the reach of the administrative power and Japan, the Korean communists created a culture and a morality which were more progressive and revolutionary than those in any other part of the world.

For this reason we treasured the guerrilla base with all our hearts.

The heroic action of our nation to defend the guerrilla base was displayed daily throughout the whole of east Manchuria.

The remote valley of northern Jiandao, where the day dawned in battle and the sun set in battle, the guerrilla base where a new way of life and a new ethics were beginning to thrive even amidst the thunder of bursting shells - this became my dear home.

7.2. The Enemy's Ground by Day; Our Ground by Night

---

On arrival at Macun, we were again accorded a hearty welcome, which I thought was more than we deserved. The news of our success in the battle at Yaoyinggou had quickly spread throughout Jiandao, and the inhabitants of Xiaowangqing greeted us with wild enthusiasm. Life in the guerrilla zone, which was completely free from the enemy's rule, fascinated us. However, not everything that happened in this new world was to my liking. We were not always pleased by the attitude to work and the way of thinking of some of the people at the helm of the revolution in Jiandao.

What surprised me most was the Leftist tendency that was spreading like an epidemic among revolutionaries in east Manchuria. This tendency was especially conspicuous in the work of consolidating the guerrilla base. When discussing the establishment of the guerrilla bases at meetings held at Mingyuegou and Xiaoshahe we had agreed on the definitions of three types of bases - a full-scale guerrilla zone, a semi-guerrilla zone, and a base of activity - and on the need to ensure a reasonable balance among them.

Some communists in east Manchuria, however, expressed enthusiasm only for the development of a full-scale guerrilla zone in the form of a liberated area, and paid insufficient attention to the establishment of the semi-guerrilla zone and the base of activity. In the early days, efforts in Wangqing were also limited to the establishment of liberated areas. The Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone, for instance, was made into a Soviet district in the form of a liberated area which was as large as a county in our country today. This district was under the control of the revolutionary forces. In those days a full-scale guerrilla zone was also called a Soviet district.

Having the Soviet flag that symbolized a worker-peasant government over this wide territory, the cadres busied themselves with nothing in particular, simply creating a lot of fuss amid shouting "Revolution! Revolution!" They seldom fought outside the guerrilla zone, but spent day after day mouthing empty slogans about establishing a proletarian dictatorship and building a society for the proletariat. On public holidays they assembled in the yard of the soldiers' barracks or in a children's playground to dance Russian dances or sing the May Day. Sometimes cadres from the east Manchuria ad hoc committee and from the county would get together and have a heated argument about something or other.

We, too, spent the spring season in this atmosphere, unable to concentrate on anything. By degrees, however, we came to recognize this Left-wing communist mistake for what it was and seek ways of correcting it. The guerrilla zone was crowded with people. During its formation thousands of refugees and exiles had flocked to the Wangqing base alone. The situation was similar in Hunchun, Yanji and Helong.

Such large numbers of people in a mountain valley with a very limited area of arable land posed the problem of food supplies. Everyone had to eat bean gruel. The beans were ground with a millstone and cooked, together with a pinch of grain, into a gruel. When this gruel was available, people might complain about it, but when these supplies ran out, we had to eat cakes made of pine bark which was first boiled in caustic soda water and then pounded, or else we were compelled to allay our hunger with boiled bracken, the shoots of Atractylodes, and the roots of broad bellflower, Codonopsis lanceolata or Solomon's seal. In spite of this, we sang revolutionary songs and made speeches, waving our fists in the air and calling on the people to overthrow imperialism, the pro-Japanese elements and the coterie of parasites. That was the way things were done in the early days of our life in the guerrilla base.

Of course, we engaged in a number of small battles, such as raids on police stations, attacks on the enemy's supply convoys, and counterattacks on enemy forces which had invaded the guerrilla zone and from which we captured weapons. When we returned from triumphant battles, the people shouted hurrah, and waved flags, but there were not many major battles, and we spent most of our time on standing guard on hilltops and protecting refugees. The territory under our control was large, but there were not many rifles or armed troops. A few rifles were allotted to each of the groups of soldiers, mostly in order to guard the base.

When we tried to increase the ranks of our armed soldiers, we were obstructed by weak-kneed secretaries or committee-members, who whined that the revolutionary army was not a united-front army, and that therefore, it must recruit only the most stalwart of the workers and peasants, not taking just anybody, in case it should become a rabble. In those days the anti-Japanese guerrillas in the Soviet area were called the worker-peasant guerrillas. The defense of a territory that covered thousands of square kilometers was overtaxing the strength of a few companies. Since there were many gaps in the defense structure, the "punitive" forces could easily penetrate deep into our defenses, and then thousands of the local inhabitants had to pack up their things and seek refuge. Such situations caused panic among the population almost every day.

The Leftist leaders, who regarded the size of our liberated territory as the decisive factor in the triumph of the revolution, were bent on maintaining a large territory without any scientific assessment of the balance of hostile and friendly forces and were motivated only by their subjective desires. They even demarcated the guerrilla zone and the enemy-ruled area in an artificial manner, by calling the former "Red territory" and the latter the "White territory". They labeled the inhabitants of the enemy-held area as "reactionaries" and those in the intermediate zone as "doublefaced" and suspected or rejected them for no reason. The people from the homeland were also treated as "reactionaries" and that was the most serious problem.

The women in the "Red territory" had their hair bobbed in order to distinguish themselves from those in the "White territory". A "Red" style of written and spoken language, songs, schools, education and media differed from the "White" style. People traveling to the Red territory from the "White territory" were strictly checked and even after interrogation, they were not allowed to go home immediately. Orders to deal with the "White" people who came to the "Red territory" as enemy spies were issued from the top of the hierarchy down to the Children's Corps organizations. Some of the members of the Wangqing county party committee harbored continuous ill feelings towards the people who had moved from the Xiaowangqing valley to the towns.

Some men of the Red Guards who had been posted as long-range look-outs at Dongricun once detained a peasant from Daduchuan who had come to buy an ox in the guerrilla zone. A Leftist element on the county party committee informed of the interrogation of the unidentified peasant, told the investigators to press the suspect person to reveal his identity even by torturing him, saying that he might possibly be a spy. No matter how severely they tortured him, the peasant insisted that he was not a spy. In fact, the peasant was neither a spy nor an agent of the enemy. But the Leftist wronged this innocent man and ordered his money to be confiscated.

Recollecting the undisclosed abuses perpetrated by the Leftists in the guerrilla zone in those days, Choe Pong Song, who worked for the Young Communist League in Wangqing for many years, said:

"The mere mention of the Leftist deviation always reminds me of events in the guerrilla zone in the early days. The Leftist abuses in Jiandao were really shocking. Once we guerrillas captured a cart-load of salt from the Japanese on the Wangqing Pass and took it to Xiaowangqing. This was probably at the time when you, Mr. President, were operating in south Manchuria. The carter was a Korean who led a hand-to-mouth existence in the lower depths of society. The Leftist elements labeled him as one of the 'double-faced' people and dealt with him as a criminal. They said he was a traitor because he had carried supplies for the Japanese. So naturally the people outside the guerrilla zone did not view the 'Red territory' in a favorable light. It was disgusting."

Such abuses as the punishment even of innocent people, without discriminating friend from foe, were also frequent in the guerrilla zones in other counties as well. The problem was very serious, because all these cursed acts were committed unhesitatingly in the noble name of the revolution, and they forced a large number of revolutionary people who were opposed to the Japanese to move across to the "White territory".

The Leftists went so far as to arrest the relatives of old man Lee Chi Baek, when they came from Onsong to Shangqingli to attend the memorial ceremony for their parents who had been killed in a "punitive" action by the enemy. The Leftists regarded them as "reactionary" people. Whenever I saw cases of such injustice, I felt thoroughly ashamed. If a man who professes to be a communist punishes an innocent person by labeling him a reactionary, he is no longer a communist, but the worst of criminals.

Even after our arrival in Wangqing, these criminals continued to throw their weight about, behaving like "privileged revolutionaries" that no one could ever touch, and lording it over the masses.

Some people regarded the Soviet as everything, and this viewpoint was a serious problem to us. We came to the conclusion that if we were to preserve the base and develop the revolution, we must overcome the tendency of isolation and extend the theatre of our operations. In other words, it was imperative to abandon the shortsighted practice of clinging only to the defense of the guerrilla zone, and to form large elite forces so as to launch active military and political operations with freedom of mobility.

If the army was to launch full-scale operations, it had to be relieved of the burden of defending the base. We found a solution to this problem in creating and expanding many semi-guerrilla zones in the vast territory surrounding the full-scale guerrilla zone, and in getting them to support it. We sought our breakthrough to fresh victory in the creation of semi-guerrilla zones.

I met and talked with Tong Chang-rong on many occasions in order to learn the experience of guerrilla zones established in China proper.

In the autumn of 1931, a Chinese Soviet Provisional Government was proclaimed in Ruijin, Jiangxi Province, and a Soviet zone was established. According to Tong Chang-rong, the central Soviet zone, in which the headquarters of the Chinese revolution was located, covered a very large area with millions of inhabitants and the military forces of several armies. Tong Chang-rong himself had experience of establishing a Soviet zone in Henan Province.

In those days the Red Army under the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party numbered more than a hundred thousand, and controlled a vast area extending from the southern part of Jiangxi Province to the northern area of Guangdong Province.

My interview with Tong Chang-rong convinced me that the experience of the establishment of the Chinese Soviet zone, which was equivalent to a sizable independent state in terms of territory and population, could not be applied to our efforts in the area on the Tuman River, and that establishing semi-guerrilla zones in the area that surrounded the full-scale guerrilla zone and in the northern region of Korea was the only way for the Korean communists active in the base of Jiandao to defend their revolutionary headquarters and launch a guerrilla war on a large scale.

The need for a semi-guerrilla zone became ever more pressing in the course of the practical armed struggle. The overwhelming task of defending a large area with a small force made it imperative to work out a fresh solution as soon as possible. If we had tried to formulate a theory at our desks by merely analyzing classical theory or drawing on the experiences of Russian Bolsheviks or the Chinese in Ruijin, we might merely have recognized the need for the guerrilla base of a new type, different from the type of the liberated area, but failed to press forward at speed with its establishment in a correct understanding of the pressing nature of this question.

The question of the semi-guerrilla zone was not taken up as a matter simply of the form of the base. The discussion reflected the ideological question of whether to establish the principle of Juche in the revolution by overcoming dogmatism and the worship of the great powers; it concerned the view to be taken of the masses and the need to overcome the Leftist error and accept as the motive force of the revolution the broad masses of the people who had been rejected as the "double-faced"; this was a serious question of direct relevance to the formation of the revolutionary forces, the question of whether or not to rally them in an anti-Japanese national united front.

By a semi-guerrilla zone we meant an area which would be partly under our own control and also partly under the control of the enemy, an area which would be under the enemy's formal territorial rule, but effectively, under our control, which would provide support for the anti-Japanese guerrilla army, train revolutionary forces, including reserve forces for the guerrilla army, and play the role of a liaison between the guerrilla zone and the enemy-ruled area. Figuratively speaking, it would be governed by the enemy during daylight, but would come under our control at night.

The semi-guerrilla zone was suited to our struggle to build a revolutionary base. We found no significant examples of this type of guerrilla zone in the foreign experiences of guerrilla warfare. It was the development of our revolution that posed the establishment of the semi-guerrilla zone as a pressing task.

In mid-March 1933, we advanced to the area around Mt. Wangjae, Onsong County, North Hamgyong Province, in order to extend the armed struggle to the homeland and bring about a rapid acceleration of the Korean revolution as a whole, centering on the anti-Japanese armed struggle. The strategic objective we had maintained since we began fighting the Japanese was to spread the armed struggle to the homeland and liberate the country, an idea which nothing could ever erase from our minds. Creating a semi-guerrilla zone in the area of the six towns and the surrounding area of the northern part of Korea was a prerequisite for extending the armed struggle to the homeland. A firmly-structured semi-guerrilla zone would contribute to the elimination of various Leftist practices in the development of the guerrilla zones.

We had formed a detachment consisting of 40 men from the 2nd company of the Wangqing battalion, who had been operating from their base at Sancidao, and ten commanding officers and political workers who had been selected from the companies, a detachment to be sent to the homeland. We then sent an advance party of several men under the command of platoon leader Park Thae Hwa to the Onsong area.

Certain people, who were influential in the east Manchuria party organization at the time were very displeased with our plan of operations in the homeland, and obstructed its implementation in every possible way. They warned us that the Korean communists in China were demonstrating a nationalist tendency to "extend the revolution to Korea" by fighting for the Korean revolution, and that we should abandon the idea of operations in the homeland because it was contrary to the principle of one party in one country.

I rejected their objection and continued to prepare for the operations, being convinced that loyalty to my national duty meant loyalty to my internationalist duty, and that the Korean revolutionaries had an inviolable right to fight for the liberation of Korea. At about this time, I was incensed by an incident that cast a shadow over the anti-Japanese guerrillas' advance to the homeland. A man from the 2nd company who had been to Onsong of the homeland on a liaison mission was arrested on his return by a man named Kim Song Do and taken to the east Manchuria ad hoc committee.

The 2nd company commander An Ki Ho and its political instructor Choe Chun Guk hurried to see me at Macun and complained furiously of Kim Song Do's abuse of power, denouncing the arrest of this man without his commanders' knowledge.

Choe Chun Guk, who used to be as gentle as a newly-wed bride and so well-mannered that he seldom spoke ill of anybody, even went so far in his abuse of Kim Song Do as to call him by his nickname "one-eyed Wang." I simply listened in silence, for I was not acquainted with Kim Song Do. All that I knew of him was that he had been the head of the propaganda department of the east Manchuria ad hoc committee of the Young Communist League, had recently been appointed to the east Manchuria party ad hoc committee, and was now inspecting different counties in east Manchuria. In the east Manchuria party organizations, those cadres from higher structures who traveled around and gave guidance to their subordinate organizations were called inspectors.

I rebuked Choe Chun Guk sternly for his indecent manner of speech. "Comrade Chun Guk, when did you get into the bad habit of calling people by indecent nicknames? True, Kim Song Do has ignored us and gone too far, but can't you have the magnanimity to respect his person?" Choe Chun Guk was very tolerant of criticism. "I am sorry," he apologized with a serious expression. "Forgive me if I was indecent or rude."

"The guerrilla zone is a place where people live close together, so people may well have nicknames. But 'one-eyed' is too rude a nickname.

At that moment, I was more offended by the Wangqing people who called Kim Song Do "one-eyed Wang" than by his arrest of the 2nd company man.

I asked why Kim was called Wang. Choe Chun Guk answered that the inhabitants of Jiandao had probably nicknamed him Wang because Kim Song Do, a Korean, smelt like a Chinese and groveled too much to his superiors.

On my way to the east Manchuria ad hoc committee, I dropped in at the county party committee and discovered that there, too, Kim Song Do was known by the name of "one-eyed Wang."

From Lee Yong Guk in the office of the county party committee, I learned that Kim Song Do was a veteran party member who was admitted to the Korean Communist Party as early as 1927, and worked as a member of a party cell committee under the Manchurian general bureau of the Tuesday group before being arrested by the Japanese consulate police and imprisoned and beaten. After his release from prison, he quickly transferred to the Chinese party and was promoted to a post at ad hoc committee level. He wore dark glasses, probably in order to disguise his ruined eye, and went about in dabushanzi.

Lee Yong Guk described Kim Song Do as a "man not only eloquent but also tactful enough to slip socks onto the feet of a flying crow".

I had interviewed Kim Song Do for about three hours in the office of the east Manchuria ad hoc committee.

As I sat face to face with him, my intention of accusing him of an abuse of power gave way to a feeling of pity for him. The eye that had withered away and his darkish complexion gave him an exhausted look that aroused pity in me. How praiseworthy and moving it was that despite the physical handicap of the loss of one eye, this man was trekking across steep mountains in Jiandao in the service of the revolutionary cause!

"Comrade Inspector," I addressed him, trying to be courteous and refraining from raising my voice. "Why did you arrest the man at his workplace, without so much as discussing his case with us?"

Kim Song Do gazed at me over his glasses. His look seemed to express displeasure with me and question how I dared to ask such an insolent question of an inspector of the ad hoc committee.

"It is strange that you should ask me such a question. You know quite well that this man's act in crossing the border is an expression of nationalism, which contradicts proletarian internationalism.... We consider him to be a member of the 'Minsaengdan.' "On what grounds?"

"His journey to and from Korea is an expression of nationalism, and this nationalistic error has made him a member of the 'Minsaengdan.' Can he be anything else?" "Is this your own view?"

"Yes. And my superior's also."

After this answer, I was tongue-tied for a short while, because I felt more pity than repugnance for him.

It was strange that I should feel a certain sympathy for him, not contempt, at that moment. I should have been angered by the tomfool and shattered his nonsense with cogent argument. His totally absurd prejudice and childish way of thinking, so much out of keeping with this illustrious position of inspector on the east Manchuria ad hoc committee, must have aroused this sense of pity for him in me.

"How miserable that he should be mentally crippled in addition to his physical handicap!" I thought to myself. "Of course, the stamina with which he devotes himself to the revolution, even wearing dark glasses to conceal his withered eye that could be noticed by secret agents is laudable. How good it would be if this mettle were reinforced with a sound intellect! How can a man suffer from such miserable mental disorder?"

"You seem to be identifying nationalism with the 'Minsaengdan,' I said in a quieter tone of voice. "How can you dare to weigh them on the same balance? Is it not too fallacious a syllogism to tar the two with the same brush because a few nationalists like Park Sok Yun, Jo Pyong Sang and Jon Song Ho have suggested the formation of the 'Minsaengdan'? As far as I know, you, too, first belonged to an organization which was under nationalist leadership, and then later you joined the communist movement. Would you accept it if for this reason you were labeled a 'Minsaengdan' member? Answer me.

"How could I ..." he mumbled.

I gave him a few minutes to reflect, and then resumed my forceful argument, "I presume you had Tong Chang-rong in mind when you mentioned a superior of yours. But I don't think he is such a narrow-minded man. If Secretary Tong Chang-rong had made such a decision out of minor prejudice or misunderstanding, without being fully informed of the actual state of affairs, you comrades, who are familiar with the Korean situation, should have advised him in every possible way so that he had a correct understanding, shouldn't you?"

Kim Song Do was silent.

On my way back to my headquarters, taking with me the arrested comrade, I could still hardly rid myself of a feeling of pity for him.

To be candid, I always felt sympathy for him through all the many conflicts we had during debates on theoretical matters, until he directed the purge of revolutionaries, dancing to the tune of others.

But I ceased to sympathize with him then, when I saw him murdering many staunch revolutionaries under the pretext of purging the "Minsaengdan." Later, he himself was executed on a charge of being a "Minsaengdan" member. My experience over decades of turbulent events showed me that terrorists fell at the hands of terrorists, that Leftists were tried and executed by Leftists, and that self-destruction was the fate in store for those who lacked the guts to stick with their own conviction and tried to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds.

The detachment to the homeland that had left Macun early in March, arrived on this side of the Tuman River opposite Thamakgol, Onsong County. It billeted itself on the village of Solgol and during the week while it awaited the arrival of the advance party that had infiltrated the Onsong area, it set about the work of revolutionizing the village and its surrounding area to build a semi-guerrilla zone. During daylight, we had combat training at the western foot of Mt. Songdong and at night we visited the villagers, establishing underground organizations among them.

At that time, we also worked among the chiefs of ten households and a hundred households, who were at the bottom of the administrative hierarchy of the puppet state of Manchukuo. Because we respected the interests of the people and established our relations with the local inhabitants in accordance with the code of conduct of the revolutionary army, we left an excellent impression on the people. While staying at the village of Solgol the guerrillas gave the peasants a helping hand with many jobs. Some of us brought bush clover down from the mountain and even mended the fences of the villagers with whom we were billeted.

The story of an axe, well-known from the reminiscences of Park Yong Sun, occurred during our stay in the village.

One day, with a view to helping my Chinese host, I took an axe and a water pail to the Tuman River. In winter the villagers used to fetch drinking water from the river. The water was drawn from a hole made by breaking the ice with an axe or a pickaxe.

When I had nearly finished breaking a hole in the ice, the sharp head of the tool slipped from the handle and fell into the hole. I raked about for hours with a long pole with hooked prongs on its end, but it was in vain.

I offered a generous price to the master of the house, apologizing to him sincerely for my carelessness. The old man would not accept the money, saying that, although he was too old to help the revolutionary army, he was grateful to me for my helping hand every morning. I insisted on his taking the money, saying that if I were to leave the place without making good his loss, I, the commander, would be violating the discipline of the revolutionary army.

Although I had paid generously for the axe, I was still haunted by the thought of it. No amount of money would be able to make up for the old man's loss of his cherished tool. In the spring of 1959, I asked a group of visitors to old battlefields of the anti-Japanese armed struggle in northeast China to apologize once again for me to the old man in the village of Liangshuiquanzi.

To our regret, however, when the group arrived at the village, the old man was no longer in this world.

We crossed the Tuman River, and then, guided by the advance party, climbed Mt. Wangjae at about four or five o'clock one afternoon.

The heads of the revolutionary organizations in the region of the six towns and the political workers, who had been in hiding among the larches on the ridge, came out to meet us.

On the summit of the mountain, which was densely covered with young oak trees, I surveyed the scenery for a long time. There is a saying that a decade changes the world, but this part of the country had been changed in less than three years. The slag heaps from a coal-mine were a new sight that had not existed when we were forming the homeland party organization on Turn Hill, and so was the train that was running along the Onsong-Unggi (Sonbong) line, one small piece of the new Onsong, which had not been there in the autumn of 1930 or in the spring of 1931.

Along with the mountains and the rivers, the people and the revolution had grown and advanced. Since we were here last, new anti-Japanese revolutionary organizations had been created one after another and begun their activity.

The fighters in the six towns and surrounding areas had been enveloping the enemy's administrative machine in an immense steely network of revolutionary organizations in the northern frontier zone of Korea, where the heads of the Japanese military and police structures in charge of keeping the peace boasted of perfect security on the border. Our armed struggle, too, had grown. The guerrilla forces in east Manchuria, for instance, had developed into battalions. The battalions in different counties were to develop into regiments and then into divisions before very long. The armed guerrilla forces of the Korean communists were active in south and north Manchuria as well. The day when our divisions and corps would advance in force into the homeland and As I stood, lost in these thoughts, I recalled a piece of poetry composed in Chinese characters by General Nam I, which I had learnt at Changdok School from my maternal grandfather. I chanted it in a calm voice:

Grinding my sword wears down Mt. Paektu's rock: My horse gulps and dries the Tuman River. Should a man at twenty fail to subdue the land, Who will in later years call him a man of caliber?

My grandfather had explained to me that General Nam distinguished himself in the battle against invaders from the north and was promoted to the post of minister of the army at the age of twenty. My grandfather encouraged me to become a general or a commander of the vanguard when I was grown up, and to fight the Japanese invaders. Hearing that General Nam was executed on the basis of a false accusation against him by a treacherous subject, I had lamented his death. I resolved to grow up to stand in the van of the war, repulse invaders and fight for the security of my country and my fellow people just as General Nam had done. On the summit of Mt. Wangjae I pledged to myself: "As General Nam repelled the invaders from the north by fighting on the strong basis of the six forts on the northeastern frontier, so we will spread the armed struggle deep into the homeland by drawing on the support of the semi-guerrilla zone created around the six towns, and will trap the Japanese imperialists and destroy them!"

The political workers and heads of revolutionary organizations who assembled on the mountain reported to me the situation in the homeland and the activities they had conducted.

I spoke words of encouragement to them, telling them that the work of laying the mass foundations for the anti-Japanese revolution was proceeding without a hitch in the northern frontier. I also set them the task of developing the armed struggle and extending it into the homeland.

In this question, I laid special emphasis on the task of establishing the semi-guerrilla zone. We intended to establish semi-guerrilla zones in the Onsong area and many other regions of the homeland, secret rendezvous points and other bases for our activities in the dense forests, and thus lay the cornerstone of the armed struggle in the homeland. The meeting on Mt. Wangjae discussed the task of rallying the whole nation as a single political force under the banner of an anti-Japanese national united front on the basis of a worker-peasant alliance, as well as the task of the revolutionary organizations in the homeland in speeding up the development of the mass movement and the preparations for founding the party.

The guerrillas' advance to the Onsong area was a prelude to the spreading of the anti-Japanese armed struggle to the homeland, and it marked a new milestone in the development of the national liberation struggle. It demonstrated at home and abroad our unshakable conviction in the view that the Korean communists had an inalienable and inviolable right to fight for the Korean revolution.

The advance of the anti-Japanese guerrillas to the Onsong area and the meeting on Mt. Wangjae proved the correctness of our policy of establishing semi-guerrilla zones around full-scale guerrilla zones and in the homeland, and that the subjective and objective conditions for the establishment of semi-guerrilla zones in Jiandao and in the area of the six towns on the northern frontier of Korea were mature.

After this meeting, we visited Ryuda Islet and Paksokgol in Kyongwon (Saeppyol), and Kumsan Hill at Sinhung village in Jongsong County and many other places in the homeland, where we held meetings, gave short courses and conducted political work, mainly for the purpose of teaching the political workers and heads of revolutionary organizations in the homeland the principles and methods of the underground revolutionary struggle.

In the homeland we frequently met with revolutionaries in order to instill in them the Juche-oriented revolutionary line and working methods, and help them to guide the complex practical struggle with due care. The proper political and practical training of the leaders of the revolutionary organizations and their hardcore elements in the homeland was a prerequisite for success in the creation of the semi-guerrilla zones.

The elites who had been sent on the mission of guiding the revolutionary struggle in the homeland became active within the very fabric of the country, in trade unions and peasants' associations, which were concentrating their efforts on the resistance against the Japanese, and they formed revolutionary mass organizations in many parts of the country. These political workers extended the network of their activity to Seoul and other parts of southern Korea.

The party organizations formed in the area on the Tuman River played a decisive role in establishing durable semi-guerrilla zones around the six towns and in pushing forward the revolutionary movement in the homeland.

Following this, the cadres in east Manchuria adopted our policy on the establishment of semi-guerrilla zones, and set out to implement this policy themselves. Some people denied the correctness of our proposal and called it a Rightist deviation, but they were refuted on the spot.

From the spring of 1933, strenuous efforts were made to establish semi-guerrilla zones in the Soviet districts of east Manchuria. Semi-guerrilla zones were established in wide areas?in Luozigou, Dahuang wai, Zhuanjiaolou and Liangshuiquanzi in Wangqing County, in Yanji, Hunchun, Antu and Helong. They made a great contribution to the development of the anti-Japanese armed struggle. Some full-scale guerrilla zones which were unsuitable for defense were reorganized into semi-guerrilla zones.

Many of the village heads who had been appointed by the puppet state of Manchukuo sympathized with us and supported us. The area surrounding Luozigou, for instance, was completely under our control, and nearly all of its inhabitants took our side. The experience of the development of semi-guerrilla zones proved valuable for the activities of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army in the Mt. Paektu area in the subsequent years, and the validity of the policy was fully demonstrated through these activities.

The semi-guerrilla zone had proved very effective, so when we established our bases in the Mt. Paektu area on the Yalu River in the latter half of the 1930s, we built secret camps only in the places where the revolutionary army units were stationed, and established semi-guerrilla zones elsewhere.

We formed revolutionary organizations among the masses, without defining them as either "Red" or "White," and we sent political workers to them. We did not remain in one spot, but moved from place to place, so as to prevent the enemy from discovering the base of our operations. The semi-guerrilla zones produced many patriots such as Jong Tong Chol, Lee Hun, Lee Ju Ik (Lee Chwi) and many others from among the district heads, the heads of a hundred households or ten households, sub-county chiefs, policemen and self-defense corps men. In those days we planted clever men as our operatives in the lowest administrative organs of the enemy.

We also won over many other junior officials, so that they supported the revolution. During daylight, they pretended to work enthusiastically for Manchukuo; at night, they helped us, guiding the revolutionary army on the march, meeting operatives from the revolutionary army to hand over information they had collected during the day, and collecting goods to be sent to support the revolutionary army.

The semi-guerrilla zones established in east Manchuria and Korea became reliable satellites which protected the army and the people in the liberated areas and the people's government established there, as well as the achievements of the struggle for democracy. Drawing on the support of the full-scale guerrilla zones and the semi-guerrilla zones which had been established in the vast area surrounding the former, the anti-Japanese guerrillas penetrated deep into the enemy-ruled area, revolutionized the masses, and expanded the mass organizations as well as the vanguard organizations of the party and Young Communist League.

They were thus able to strengthen the mass foundations of the anti-Japanese armed struggle and switch from the defensive to the offensive. As we went over to the offensive in the war against the Japanese, we were able to break the enemy's tight economic blockade and find easier solutions to the problem of food, the greatest headache in the life of the guerrilla zone.

The semi-guerrilla zones enabled us to overcome the Leftist deviation that had discriminated between "Red" and "White" territories and driven a large number of people over to the enemy side, and also to rally broad sections of the population into a single political force under the banner of the anti-Japanese national united front. They also contributed greatly to the elimination of flunkeyism and dogmatism, and the establishment of the principle of Juche in the development of the Korean revolution. Luozigou and Liangshuiquanzi were the most exemplary of all the semi-guerrilla zones in the Wangqing area.

Lee Kwang rendered distinguished service in transforming Luozigou into a semi-guerrilla zone. When he was dispatched there, he built up strong footholds for us by working among the soldiers of the anti-Japanese army of Chinese nationalists as well as among people from the Independence Army.

Luozigou had been made a major base of the independence movement led by Lee Tong Hwi and his group since the beginning of the 1920s. The old people who had joined him in the Independence Army movement had great influence in the area. Under the auspices of these people, Lee Kwang was able to educate and organize the inhabitants on revolutionary lines. Many able political workers were sent to Luozigou to help transform it into a semi-guerrilla zone. Some of them laid down their lives. Choe Jong Hwa, who contributed greatly to the work of revolutionizing Luozigou, was one who died there.

Park Ku Song, an able detachment commander of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, and Choe Kwang were working underground at Luozigou in those days.

The enemy formed reactionary organizations such as the concord society or cooperative society in that area and made frantic efforts to stamp out the revolutionary forces, whereas we formed large mass organizations like the Anti-Japanese Association and united all the patriots. Luozigou also served as food-supply base for the revolutionary masses of people in Wangqing.

Whenever there was a food crisis in the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone, messengers were sent to a revolutionary organization in Luozigou to fetch emergency supplies. The members of the revolutionary organization in Luozigou would carry loads of cereal on their backs as far as Shimen at Shiliping and deliver them to the people from Wangqing. Even after Luozigou was occupied by the enemy, food was still carried from there to liberated areas.

It would be no exaggeration to say that, from the latter half of 1935, when the guerrilla zone was disbanded and the main force of the KPRA left on its expedition to north Manchuria, the revolutionaries in Wangqing County survived by eating food from Luozigou. Some of the revolutionary masses who took refuge from the enemy's "punitive" operations on the hill to the west of Luozigou also ate the food from Luozigou during the autumn and winter of 1935 as did the soldiers of the 3rd company of Wangqing.

Luozigou became such an excellent source of food supplies for the a natural revolutionaries in Wangqing partly because the place was nary surrounded by fertile land, where even passing beggars were welcomed to share meals of millet, but more especially because many revolutionary organizations had taken root there and given the inhabitants a good education.

Kim Ryong Un, a head of a hundred households in Luozigou, a grassroots civil-servant who enjoyed the confidence of the Manchukuo authorities, was a member of our organization. He took advantage of his official position in order to help us revolutionaries a great deal. In order to prevent the guerrilla operatives from infiltrating into the walled town and the people from maintaining secret contact with the revolutionary army, the enemy strictly controlled the flow of people going in and out of the town by posting young men on guard at all times, while at the same time taking stringent measures against the smuggling of food and consumer goods out of the town. The guards were each equipped with a club, which served as a sort of credential issued by the puppet state of Manchukuo.

When soldiers of the revolution army went to Luozigou to obtain food, Kim Ryong Un used to select only young men under our influence for guard duty. When the soldiers who had come for food reached the town, the guards would hand over their clubs to them, then run back to the head of a hundred households. Under his direction they collected food and delivered it to the provisions detail.

Members of revolutionary organizations in Luozigou would coax soldiers of the puppet Manchukuo army into selling their ammunition to them. One shop in the town was run by a veteran of the Young Communist League. In order to obtain goods to assist the revolutionary army, he swore an oath of brotherhood with soldiers of the puppet Manchukuo army. One puppet army soldier, who desperately loved money, would buy things at low prices in various places and then ask the shopkeeper to sell them for him at a high price.

The soldier did this because, if he were discovered selling things himself, he would be punished. He swore brotherhood with the shopkeeper and even sold him ammunition. The shopkeeper bought it at 25 fen a piece and sent it on to the revolutionary army. As many as five thousand cartridges were obtained in this way.

This is merely one simple instance proving the validity and effectiveness of the semi-guerrilla zone.

The semi-guerrilla zone established around the village of Liangshuiquanzi in the southern tip of the Wangqing area gave a great support to the revolutionary army. The revolutionary organizations in that village sent food and goods to the liberated area on dozens of occasions.

In those years, we obtained much of our cereals, clothing, matches, drugs, explosives, salt and other essentials required for the guerrilla zone from the revolutionary organizations in Onsong and Liangshuiquanzi.

Salt was the scarcest commodity in the guerrilla zone. Things were so hard that we had to satisfy our craving for salt by putting a tiny grain of it into our mouths after eating every five spoonfuls of gruel. In order to make life impossible in the guerrilla zone, the enemy used every conceivable means to stop food and salt finding its way there. In autumn, the peasants were forced to bring all their harvests into the stores of the concentration villages under the enemy's control, and then receive daily rations based on the number of mouths in each household. The enemy knew that any surplus food would find its way across into the guerrilla zone.

The enemy even went so far as to form anti-contraband squads, the salt police, and have them make surprise searches of the peasants' houses. Any surplus of soy sauce and bean paste was taxed, and the owners of the surplus were whipped with triangular wooden sticks. In the autumn of 1934, we sent a large group of peoples including 30 men from the 2nd company with horses, and even some children, to Liangshuiquanzi to obtain salt. It was 50 miles to the village and back from Wangqing.

Notified in advance of the salt operations the revolutionary organization of the village made piles of salt near the bank of the Tuman River with the salt that they had obtained from the underground revolutionary organizations in Onsong and the Namyang shipping agency. They met the salt convoy near the river.

The convoy loaded two to three sacks of salt on each of the horses and carried them to Sancidao safely. The remainder was transported to the guerrilla base, 20 to 30 kilograms on each man's back. Some of the salt was exchanged for flour at Luozigou.

Most of the supplies which the organization of Liangshuiquanzi sent to us came from the six towns including Onsong on the northern frontier of the homeland. The people there also obtained many of the goods they sent to the guerrilla base from Tumen and Longjing, because it was impossible to procure large amounts of consumer goods in the homeland, which was under the the strict surveillance and control. People in the organizations in the homeland would cross the river in secret and travel to commercial centres like Tumen and Longjing to buy essentials which were later sent to anti-Japanese guerrilla bases through the appropriate channels.

Tumen and Longjing were in effect our reliable sources of supplies. For this reason, we seldom attacked such places as Tumen, Longjing and Baicaogou, where many of our revolutionary organizations were working underground. Once in the early days of our guerrilla war, our comrades attacked Baicaogou. Immediately after the raid, Lee twang's father informed us of the adverse effect the battle had on the rich people whom he had intended to draw into the united front. He said they had been frightened by the attack. From then on, we refrained from attacking such places. The semi-guerrilla zones in the six towns rendered historical and highly meritorious services to the survival of the soldiers and civilians in Wangqing and other liberated areas.

We established a large number of concealed bases of activity in the enemy-ruled areas, in addition to the full-scale guerrilla zones and semi-guerrilla zones. These bases supported the military actions and political activities of the guerrillas as well as providing liaison links. The combination of underground revolutionary organizations and liaison points provided a type of temporary and mobile base, which was established in many large cities such as Longjing, Hunchun, Tumen, Laotougou, and Baicaogou and along the railways in the enemy area.

Whenever I recall the unforgettable days when the semi-guerrilla zones were being established in Jiandao and in the homeland, I remember Oh Jung Hwa, a man who made a most powerful impression on me.

On his release from the Sodaemun prison in Seoul, Oh Jung Hwa took a train bound for the north, stopped at his wife's family home in the vicinity of Huimudong for a few days to recuperate, and then immediately returned to Shixian and came to see me.

His release and his reappearance in Wangqing were a great joy and consolation to me at the time when I had just arrived in the guerrilla zone from my expeditions to south and north Manchuria.

The first thing he asked for in the interview with me was a major assignment. Judging from his unhealthy complexion, I thought he needed a few months of convalescence, but since he insisted on having something to do, I told him to establish a semi-guerrilla zone in some part of the area around Gayahe.

District No. 5, in which he worked was adjacent to Liangshuiquanzi, Tumen, Yanji, Baicaogou, Daduchuan and other major bases of the enemy's "punitive" forces, and in Gayahe there was a substation of the Japanese consulate police. Liucaigou was raided by the enemy early in January 1933, and later Sishuiping was attacked twice by the “punitive” forces. Though he had been released from prison, Oh Jung Hwa himself was being shadowed by an enemy agent. But he could not conceal his joy at the assignment he had received.

I gave him the assignment of establishing a semi-guerrilla zone near Gayahe because the area was so close to the enemy's bases and also because the area was a frequent target of enemy attack. The assignment was difficult and dangerous, but I had every confidence in Oh Jung Hwa.

He had already made a strong impression upon me when I first met him in the autumn of 1930, an impression that gave me confidence in him. At that time I had a serious talk with him in his own house. When I came out after the conversation, I found several sturdy young men standing alertly on watch outside the fence. Similar young men were also on guard at the entrance to the village. These arrangements demonstrated his working ability and his revolutionary attitude to me in a very powerful way.

His revolutionary prowess found brilliant expression in rallying the masses to action. As the first step towards giving the village a revolutionary training, he obtained a pair of hair-clippers and formed a scissors association which enlisted all the villagers. In those days, ordinary barbers' shops charged 15 fen for a haircut but Oh Jung Hwa charged only five fen. He bought books with the money he earned in this manner, and taught the members of the association how to read and write. Interested in being able to read as well as in a cheap haircut, people participated in the work of the association with great enthusiasm. In this way Oh Jung Hwa educated the villagers.

After providing them with the basics of enlightenment he formed the Lingdong Friendship Association by merging the old boys' association, schoolmates' association and friendship association. The new friendship association was a legal organization of young people and students in Dunhua and Yanji, Hunchun, Helong and Wangqing?the localities situated to the east of Haerbaling.

Oh Jung Hwa frequently prepared and produced dramatic performances in order to give the villagers a revolutionary training. When he wrote a script himself, his cousins, of whom there were very many, would divide the parts among themselves, make the scenery, direct their own performances and stage a perfect show.

After inspiring the people with revolutionary enthusiasm in this manner, Oh Jung Hwa first accepted his own family and relations into the revolutionary organization, and then enlisted all the villagers. Both before and after the winter meeting at Mingyuegou, he and Kang Sang Jun, Jo Chang Dok and Yu Se Ryong helped with the procurement of weapons, a fundamental task in the preparations for the formation of the anti-Japanese guerrilla army.

The weapons they had captured from the enemy at the risk of their lives were a significant contribution to the equipment of the special detachment whose members included Choe In Jun, Han Hung Gwon, Kang Sang Jun and Kim Un Sik. Just as we intended, Oh Jung Hwa established an excellent semi-guerrilla zone in part of district No. 5, the district which was first in the line of the enemy's attack. He also carried out in good faith the task of establishing bases for activity in the enemy-held area. The Chonil Printing Works in Tumen, which he transformed into a major base for our activity, became the eyes and ears of the revolutionary army.

The enemy regarded Oh Jung Hwa and his family as a thorn in his side, and was watching for a chance to eliminate them. In the spring of 1933, a small guerrilla army group captured a secret letter from the Japanese consulate in Longjing to their police station in Shixian. It contained a directive ordering the killing of the Os.

As soon as we learned of the secret instructions, we sent guerrillas to save the family. The guerrillas swiftly evacuated all 31 of the Os to Shiliping.

In the summer of 1933, Oh Jung Hwa, who had fought undauntedly and tirelessly every minute of all his life, always racing about at the speed of a short-distance runner, was unfortunately arrested by the enemy at a secret rendezvous in Beifengwudong. He was murdered on the spot immediately he was captured. We have no way of knowing what his last moments were like or how he faced his death. The enemy agents who murdered him and his comrades disappeared leaving their vile deed as an eternally unsolvable mystery.

When old man O Thae Hui came rushing to the scene of the murder in furious haste from Shiliping, his son was lying, bloody and battered, his eyes open~ near the rendezvous. The eyeballs, in which the spark of life still lingered, reflected the blue sky of the guerrilla zone on which he used to gaze with such fondness when alive.

But the mouth was closed more tightly than in his life. From the sight of it the old man knew that his son had not betrayed the secret of the organization in order to save his life. The heroism of this death only grieved the old man all the more. "You have lived a life of only 34 years, but it was an honorable life. A long life does not always mean happiness. But you have left me too soon! How heart-rending your death will be to General Kim Il Sung, who treasured you so much!" The old man thought as he held his dead son in his arms.

I could not believe that he was dead. How could it be that a man who had talked and walked so much, and achieved 50 much in his work, living like a blazing fire, should die so quietly?

No one was with him at the moment of his death. He was left lying there on the ground, leaving not a single word of behest. If he had had something to tell me what would it have been? He might well have asked me to give him another assignment, since the semi-guerrilla zone was already established.

If he had lived, I would have entrusted him with greater responsibility. According to the revolutionary ethics, entrusting a man with many assignments is an expression of the greatest love and the greatest possible confidence in him.

Our revolution had lost yet another distinguished organizer and propagandist, a man who was loved by everyone in Jiandao, another loyal and stalwart pillar and support, who had inspired the people with pride and struck terror into the heart of the enemy. It was a heart-rending blow struck just at the moment when our revolution was surging ahead in east Manchuria.

Oh Jung Hwa had awakened the revolutionary consciousness of the masses and roused them to action by sacrificing himself. Though he was gone, new heroes sprang up like bamboo shoots after the rain in the soil of the semi-guerrilla zones where his blood had been spilt, heroes who would carry the great war against the Japanese imperialists to ever greater heights.

7.3. The Choice between the Soviet and the People's Revolutionary Government

With the establishment of guerrilla bases in the Jiandao area, the type of political power to be established became the subject of wide-scale discussion. In order to maintain and administer those guerrilla zones which were liberated areas, it was necessary to set up a government which would organize the economic activities of the people, educate them and develop culture in the area under its jurisdiction. Without establishing a government in the guerrilla zones, which were the embryo of a state, it would be impossible to provide the people with a livelihood and mobilize them in the struggle.

From the autumn of 1932, therefore, the communists in east Manchuria undertook the historic task of establishing the government in the guerrilla zones. On the occasion of the anniversary of the October Revolution in the same year, a mass meeting was held in Gayahe, Wangqing County, and the establishment of a Soviet government was proclaimed. Almost simultaneously, Soviet power was established in Wangougou and Sandaowan in Yanji County. The establishment of the revolutionary government in the guerrilla zones must be regarded as a significant step towards realizing the people's cherished desire.

In its initial stage, I, too, was pleased at the establishment of Soviet power in the guerrilla zones. I considered that the name of the government was not important as long as the government championed the people's interests.

In those days "Soviet enthusiasm" was sweeping throughout east Manchuria. The establishment of Soviet power was recognized as a historical trend by revolutionaries and progressive people in all countries which aspired to socialism and communism. This hot wind swept through Europe and Asia. The establishment of the Chinese Soviet in Ruijin and of the Nghe Tinh Soviet in Vietnam are clear examples.

Even those who regarded the Korean revolution as a bourgeois democratic revolution spoke about a worker-peasant Soviet government.

The "Action Program of the Communist Party of Korea" which had been drafted by Choe Song U, a Korean, and other people working at the Comintern headquarters, in cooperation with the officials in charge of the Oriental Department of the Executive Committee of the Comintern (Kuusinen, Magyar and Okano), proposed the immediate task of "establishing a Soviet state of workers and peasants," along with the complete independence of Korea.

Unconditional support and acceptance of the Soviet line in revolutionary practice was a matter of common sense beyond dispute in the international communist movement and was regarded as a criterion for distinguishing between the stances of communist revolution and opportunism. The establishment of a Soviet government was regarded as the most important task by the communist parties and communist organizations in capitalist countries, to say nothing of the colonies and semi-colonial countries. In fact, Soviet power became the ideal of the entire world proletariat.

The Soviet idea was so very influential because it was recognized as the only type of government capable of putting an end to all manner of exploitation and oppression and building a welfare society that would regard the interests of the working masses as absolute. A free and peaceful new world without exploitation and oppression was the age-long dream and ideal of humanity.

The newborn Soviet government in Russia had proved its unprecedented effectiveness in suppressing the insurrection of the overthrown exploiting class, defending the country from the invasion of allied imperialist forces, rehabilitating the economy, and pressing forward with the building of socialism. The triumphant advance of Soviet socialism aroused an admiration among the people which was little short of belief in an illusion.

It was by no means unreasonable for mankind to regard the Soviet Union as a beacon-light and accept the Soviet as the best and most advanced of all forms of government. It was natural that the people of Jiandao, which was adjacent to the Soviet Union and subject to its influence in many ways, should be swayed by illusions about Soviet power. On my return to Wangqing from the campaigns in south and north Manchuria, I was dumbfounded at the complaints against the Soviet policy that could be heard in all parts of the guerrilla zone. These complaints indicated serious problems that we could not overlook.

I saw instantly that the rumors spread by disgruntled people contained some truth. As I traveled around the guerrilla zone, I learned about the people's attitude towards Soviet power in greater detail. My constant contacts and candid conversations with hundreds of people gave me a full picture of the consequences of Leftist Soviet policy.

The inhabitants of the guerrilla zone began to be disillusioned by Soviet power from the time when the government, following the slogan of the immediate introduction of socialism, proclaimed the abolition of private property, and brought all personal property and real estate under communal ownership. Everything was communalized, from land and provisions to the farming tools and implements such as sickles, hoes and pitchforks that had belonged to individual peasants. After this sweeping introduction of communal ownership, the Soviet government subjected all the inhabitants of the guerrilla zone - men and women, young and old - to the new order of communal life, communal labor and communal distribution. This was the life of the cartel proclaimed by the Soviet radicals.

This policy amounted to sending kindergarten children to university without giving them primary and secondary education. The Soviet government also expropriated, without compensation, all the rich farmers and landowners, regardless of whether they were large landowners, small landowners, pro-Japanese landowners or anti-Japanese landowners, and even confiscated their cattle, horses and provisions.

Those landowners who remained in the guerrilla zone even after the land of east Manchuria had been divided into "Red territory" and "White territory," were in general patriotic and strongly opposed to the Japanese. They gave enthusiastic support to the guerrilla army when the communists were raising an army in Wangqing.

One of those progressive landowners was a Chinese named Zhang Shi-ming. At the time of its large-scale "punitive" invasion, in the spring of 1932, the Japanese Jiandao task force even burnt down his grain store. Even though the "punitive" forces ordered a forced evacuation at bayonet-point, Zhang Shi-ming remained in the guerrilla zone, instead of moving to Daduchuan. His previous grievances against the Japanese were augmented that spring. Landowner though he was, he had given unstinting material and moral support to the people in the guerrilla zone.

"Officers and men from the guerrilla army," he would say to the guerrillas who came to him for contributions. "I am remaining here in this valley because I hate to see the Japanese. Please at least drive them away from Daduchuan!"

The people in the guerrilla zone were on good terms with him. But the Soviet government drove even this landowner away to the enemy-ruled area. He pleaded with the Soviet government for permission to live in the guerrilla zone, but the Soviet rejected his request.

"The Soviet government has decided to expropriate the property of all landowners," the Soviet informed him. "It is true that your anti-Japanese spirit is strong and you have given generous support to the work of the guerrilla zone, but you are a member of the exploiting class, and we are obliged to eliminate you. Leave this place quickly."

All the property of this landowner who had given wholehearted support to the revolution was confiscated there and then and put into a storehouse which was at the disposal of the Soviet government. The beggared landowner left in tears to go to Daduchuan, where the Japanese forces were stationed.

Those who obeyed the order to carry out a purge at that time even took the children's flower-patterned shoes from the chests at landowners' houses. The Chinese people had an interesting custom according to which, when a female baby was born to them, they prepared the shoes for the children the female baby would have when she grew and married. Such shoes were called "flower-patterned shoes." They used to make shoes of various sizes for babies younger than one year, for one-year olds, two-year olds and so on upwards, and then store them in chests. The chests contained some shoes as small as thimbles.

Having meekly allowed even these shoes to be taken away, what thoughts would these landlords carry with them as they left the guerrilla zone?

The valley of Xiaowangqing was crowded with cattle and horses that had been confiscated from propertied people. There were more than enough of them to stock a sizable farm, and every young person in the guerrilla zone went about on horseback. It was what one might call a fashion under Soviet rule.

The Leftist elements even regarded Chinese women's customs of wearing earrings and wrapping their feet tight to check their growth as evils to be combated. During the first half of the 1930s, Leftist abuses were rampant in east Manchuria, and this Leftist tyranny subjected the sacred revolutionary principles to a severe test. How did this Leftist wind come to sweep the whole of east Manchuria? Were all the revolutionaries in the guerrilla zones in Jiandao hooligans or lunatics?

No. The overwhelming majority of the communists who were administering the guerrilla zone were good people with noble revolutionary ideals and warm hearts. They loved people and nourished the aspiration to justice more warmly than others. How was it, then, that these sympathetic and discreet people committed the irretrievable error of advocating and implementing this Leftist policy?

We identified the cause in the policy itself and in the ideological immaturity of the people who had determined the line. These absurdities in revolutionary practice were produced by the unrealistic directives issued by people at the top of the hierarchy who, in ignorance of specific circumstances, aped the ill-digested principles of the classics and lessons of earlier experience.

In those years, the blind rejection of people, indiscriminate elimination, overthrow and ostracism were considered to be in keeping with a thoroughgoing class approach, the qualities of the most advanced revolutionaries.

The instance of a widow who lent at a small rate of interest the money she had earned by weaving cloth by hand was labeled as a usurer, so that her promissory note was thrown into fire and even her capital confiscated by some peasants in Wangqing, shows what a sacred cow this Leftist practice had become. Unless they were misled by some of their leaders, the simple peasants could not have resorted to such absurdities.

Once I was surprised to hear how a company commander, Lee Ung Man, had joined the guerrilla army in Wangqing.

In the early days of recruiting, only people from the working class, poor peasantry and hired farm hands were admitted to the armed ranks. Lee Ung Man's father had owned a little more than three hectares of sterile hillside land, so he had not been considered a poor peasant. He had applied to join the ranks more than once, but his earnest requests had been turned down because he came from an undesirable family. He had been told that a man with more than three hectares was a middle peasant.

After many days of mental torture, he had sold his father's land without his parents' knowledge, bought a box of Browning pistols, and taken it to the armed group, begging to be admitted. Only then had he been accepted. He was glad that he had become a guerrilla, but his family was at a loss, left without any means of livelihood.

My resolve to combat Leftist evils grew still firmer after I moved to Jiandao. I have been combating them all my life ever since. My experience in those days has been of great help in my postliberation struggle to counter Leftist evils and eliminate bureaucratic tendencies.

Under the cloak of slick revolutionary phrases and ultra-party slogans, the Leftists continually mock the masses, abuse and deceive them, in pursuit of their own glory and advancement. From these selfish motives, they depict themselves as tanks or armored vehicles advancing in the forefront of struggle. Thus counterrevolutionaries make use of the cloak of Leftism. So all communists must always be highly vigilant and not allow the Leftists to get a foothold in their camp.

The Leftist Soviet policy plunged the guerrilla bases into a state of vacillation and confusion which was difficult to rectify. A large number of families, disillusioned and discontented with the Soviet policy, departed for enemy-ruled territory.

One night, on our way to Sancidao where Choe Chun Guk, the political instructor of the 2nd company, was working, my men and I met a middle-aged man and his family who were fleeing from the guerrilla zone. The man was leaving by night for fear of being labeled a counterrevolutionary if he was caught traveling in daylight. The five members of his family were carrying a few bundles or almost empty-handed. The three children were helped by their parents as they hobbled along.

The man, who looked about 50, trembled at the sight of our armed group. He seemed struck with dismay at having been discovered by a guerrilla commander. "Have you done anything wrong?" I asked in a gentle voice, drawing the three shivering children to me one by one.

"No, nothing."

"Why, then, are you leaving the guerrilla zone?"

"It is too hard to live here...."

"Where are you going, then? Things will be even worse in the enemy area, won't they?"

"We have been living here because we couldn't endure the Japanese atrocities, so why should we go back to them? We are going deeper into the mountains to live by slashing and burning the land where no one will disturb our peace.

At his words my heart felt weary with oppression. I wondered if they could find the peace of mind they sought in a deeper recess of the mountain than Macun, a recess which offered no guarantee of a livelihood in the days to come.

"The thaw has not yet set in, have you food enough to last until it does?" I asked. "No. We shall live as long as we can, and we may die.... That's all there is to it. My very life is a nuisance to me now.

As she listened to him, the sobs of the man's wife shook her shoulders. The three children who were in my arms also burst into tears.

I fought back my own tears as I was standing blankly in the darkness. If all the people left one by one in this manner, on whom could we rely in making the revolution? Why had our revolution entered this dead end? The consequences of the reckless Soviet policy had been too destructive.

"Things will be put to rights soon. So don't feel too discouraged. Let's wait till things are smoothed over."

I sent him and his family back home with an escort of my men. I changed my plan of staying overnight in the barracks of the 2nd company and called on old man Choe Ja Ik at Xidapo. The heart-rending incident of the miserable family prompted me to try to dig into the depths of the people's minds. Choe Ja Ik was the father of Choe In Jun, who, after joining the Wangqing special detachment, had been promoted to company commander and then to regimental commander of an independent brigade before he fell in battle. Whenever I visited Sancidao, I had paid a call on Choe Ja Ik.

Being a well-informed man, he had even served as secretary of the northern political and military administration headed by So Il. Moreover, he was open-minded and candid, and told me many instructive things whenever I met him.

"Old man, how are you getting along these days?" I greeted him.

"I think I am living just because I am alive," he said bluntly in reply to my greetings. Believing that his intonation expressed the people's mind, I asked again, "Is your life in the guerrilla zone so hard?"

At this question, the old man flew into a rage and began to grumble, saying:

"I put up with the Soviet government when it took away my work animals and farm implements. I guessed that we were following the example of collective farming in Russia, for which the Russians had collected such things. But when I saw the people from the Soviet collecting spoons and chopsticks a few days ago for what they called a communal eating house, I spat at them.

I said, 'Shall we old people leave our under-floor-heated rooms and walk to and from the public eating house in the cold weather three times every day? I cannot live in this manner any longer. If you are going to create a hell and call it a commune or cartel, do it yourselves, young men. We are already out of breath and can't keep up with you any longer.' And then there was what they called the purge of feudalism, when old people were subjected to criticism by their daughters-in-law at mass meetings. Has anything so ridiculous ever happened in the five-thousand-year-long history of our country? And still, my son, In Jun, told me not to slander the Soviet. So I was going to break his back."

If the father of a commander of the guerrilla army could spat on Soviet policy, there was clearly no need to probe the attitude of other people any further.

Later, during the terrible days of the ultra-Leftist struggle against the “Minsaengdan,” and during the sad days when the soldiers and the people were bidding a tearful farewell to one another prior to the break-up of the guerrilla zones, I often recalled the old man lamenting over the things that were happening, pounding his breast with his fists, at the time when I met him.

Less than half a year after the establishment of the Soviet government, the relations between the Korean and Chinese peoples had deteriorated again. Most of the landowners who had been expropriated were Chinese, so it was natural that a situation similar to one at the time of the May 30 Uprising should recur. The Chinese nationalist army, which was opposed to the Japanese, once again became hostile to the Korean communists. The national salvation army and Chinese landowners were now our enemies, in addition to the Japanese and Manchukuo armies.

The anti-Japanese guerrilla army found itself once again in the restricted circumstances of the days of its establishment, when its small units had to hide in the back-rooms of other people's houses. The guerrillas once again had to be billeted cautiously on Korean settlements. It was quite impossible to rename ourselves as Chinese special detachments. Whenever they met us, the national salvation army units would attack us, calling us "gaolibangzi" (a Chinese derogatory term for the Koreans). Guerrilla activity was effectively reduced to a semi-underground struggle.

Everything that had been built up by our year-long struggle was being brought to naught. Our comrades began to develop divergent opinions of Soviet policy. Some of them said that, since things had come to this, we should go to Russia to learn the methods of revolution and then make a fresh start; some of them insisted that, since the way the people in Jiandao were doing things would make a mess of the revolution, we should return to our own ground and fight in our own way; and another man let slip that it would be better to go home and fulfill his filial duty to his parents than to fight for something which was not much like a revolution. The Chinese comrade who wished to go home was allowed to do so, and another Chinese comrade who wished to study in the Soviet Union was sent there. Even in this state of affairs, the people in charge of the guerrilla zone could not bring themselves to change their policy. The east Manchuria ad hoc committee which was in a position of leadership had no defined line of its own with which to amend the policy of the Coin-intern.

Somebody had to smooth over this chaotic situation and save the guerrilla zone from collapse, even at the risk of being stigmatized as a Rightist. This task required determination and the formulation of new theses capable of countering the Leftist Soviet line. It was about this time that I wrote a thesis on eliminating factionalism and strengthening the unity of the revolutionary ranks and published it in a pamphlet.

I had made up my mind to take issue with Tong Chang-rong at Macun over the type of government to be established. However, county party secretary Lee Yong Guk and a few others dissuaded me from doing so. They said it would be useless to argue with him because the "Decision of the East Manchuria ad hoc Committee on the Great Program of Building the Soviet" had already been issued to its subordinate units and a Soviet government had been established at Sishuiping. They even warned me that if the argument went the wrong way, I might be punished. Lee Yong Guk told me briefly how Kim Paek Ryong had been charged as a Rightist because of his careless criticism of the Soviet.

Kim Paek Ryong was working as a member of a county party committee in north Manchuria. At the time when propaganda was at its height prior to the formation of the Soviet in Jiandao, he came, by way of the east Manchuria ad hoc committee, to Wangqing district No. 5, which had been selected as the first demonstration unit for the establishment of the Soviet government.

When he heard that a Soviet government was going to be set up in the district, he said that it was premature to have it in east Manchuria. Because of this single statement, he had been stigmatized as a Right opportunist and became the target of active measures. The incident ended with his escape to north Manchuria.

In the winter of 1934, two years after I heard the story of his case from Lee Yong Guk, I met Kim Paek Ryong at Badaohezi, Ningan County. At the time he was the secretary of the district party committee.

He recollected with sadness the incident in the autumn of 1932 in which he had been branded as a Rightist capitulator because of his statement that a Soviet government was premature. By the time I met him, the Leftist Soviet policy had been rectified, and the people's revolutionary government had long been administering the guerrilla zone, so he did not hesitate to criticize the proponents of the reckless, Leftist Soviet line. In my talk with him I found him an extremely intelligent and upright man.

I asked him why he had said that it was premature to establish the Soviet.

"The reason is simple," Kim Paek Ryong replied. "When I was in Gayahe, I talked with a lot of peasants and found that they did not even know the meaning of the word Soviet. So I said it was premature to create a Soviet which was beyond the people's comprehension."

In fact, the people in those days did not understand the meaning of the word, and this fact indicated their lack of preparedness.

The old people in Gayahe who participated in the election to the district Soviet took the word "Soviet" to mean automatic gun.

"I watched the platform after the election," one of them remarked, "for I had been expecting automatic guns from the Soviet, the guns that would kill many Japanese. But it produced only a red flag."

Some of the people from Macun, who attended the ceremony for the establishment of the Soviet at Wangqing district No. 2, mistook the word "Soviet" for soebochi (tin pail). Another villager was said to have asked voters to take a close look at the Soviet and see whether it was large or small. Some other villagers were said to have gone out with baskets to gather wild vegetables, because they had nothing special to offer the Soviet, an important guest.

These subjective interpretations of the meaning of the word or comical mistakes were due, of course, to the people's ignorance, and in particular to ineffective propaganda on the part of their leaders. The titles of public lectures, for instance, were full of loanwords such as Soviet, kolkhoz and commune which were beyond the people's comprehension. As for the Soviet itself, the propagandists themselves had no clear idea of what it was.

After the establishment of Soviet power everywhere, the radical elements who had been poisoned with Leftist ideas swaggered about, shouting loudly about the dictatorship of the working class, poor peasants and hired farm hands, as if the revolution had already been carried through.

In spite of the advice of the comrades at Wangqing, I did challenge Tong Chang-rong to a debate about the appropriate form of government.

"The birth of the revolutionary government in Jiandao and its proclamation is an event to rejoice at. But, Comrade Tong Chang-rong, I cannot remain a silent onlooker when our policy of the united front is being encroached upon by the Soviet line." Tong Chang-rong looked at me in surprise.

"It is being encroached upon? What do you mean by that?" he asked.

"As I told you at Mingyuegou, we have adopted the line of rallying all the patriotic, anti-Japanese forces, who are interested in our revolution, into a strong political force, and we have striven to implement this line at the cost of our blood in the homeland and Manchuria over the past years. In the course of this struggle, we have united many people, including patriotic believers, shopkeepers and manufacturers, junior officials and even landowners. But the Soviet policy has rejected them all indiscriminately. Until yesterday, they supported or sympathized with the revolution, but now they turn away from it or are opposed to it. The relations between the Korean and Chinese peoples have been aggravated once again."

Tong Chang-rong smiled, patting me on the wrist.

"That is quite possible, but it is not a matter of great importance. What is important is that the Soviet government has met all the requirements of the people. The revolution is triumphing. The workers and peasants, the vast majority of the masses, are following the Soviet government. What is there to be afraid of? I believe that, with the support of the workers and peasants, we can carry out whatever revolution we need. We have to be prepared to lose a minority, don't we?"

"I admit that there may be losses. But why should we reject people who can be won over? Our general strategy is to isolate the enemy as far as possible and win over as many people as possible. That is why we have risked our lives working among the anti-Japanese nationalist forces over the past year. We communists have managed to recover the prestige that was damaged by the May 30 Uprising, and we have resolved the discord between the Korean and Chinese peoples by dint of painstaking effort. But now there is the danger again that the results of these great efforts may be brought to nothing overnight."

"Comrade Kim Il Sung, surely you are too pessimistic?"

"No. I am in the habit of always looking on the bright side. The revolution will, of course, continue its victorious advance. But, Comrade Tong Chang-rong, I cannot help being deeply worried about the negative consequences of the Leftist policy in east Manchuria. I believe that the party in east Manchuria must give prudent consideration to this matter." "So you mean that the policy should be reconsidered?"

"Yes, the policy should be reconsidered as well as the form of government that shapes the policy."

Tong Chang-rong frowned disapprovingly and then said, "Comrade Kim Il Sung, there may indeed be errors in the policy of the Soviet government, but the form of the government is inviolable. The policy concerning the establishment of Soviet power comes from the center." The argument continued.

He persisted in his opinion, describing the Soviet as an absolute. He was a man of moderate character and kind heart, but a die-hard. He was well-informed, but dogmatic in his thinking and practice.

We resumed the argument on another day, when the point at issue was whether to maintain the Soviet or abandon it, and if it was to be discarded, what form of a new government should be adopted.

I said that, since life had proved that the Soviet was not suited to the guerrilla zone in east Manchuria where the task of anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution should be addressed, the Korean and Chinese communists must resolutely change the form of government, and adopt a policy capable of meeting the requirements of the people in order to calm down the chaotic situation.

In reply to my cogent argument, Tong Chang-rong said, "I, too, admit that the Soviet does not suit the specific situation of east Manchuria and that some of its political measures have resulted in losses to the revolution. I now understand why the other day you expressed your apprehension concerning the united-front line being encroached upon by the Soviet line. Comrade Kim Il Sung, the grave developments in east Manchuria in recent months have compelled me to give serious consideration to your warning. To our regret, however, we have not yet decided on a form of government that can replace the Soviet."

I was pleased by this change in the opinion of the secretary of the ad hoc committee. He was no longer the same die-hard who had insisted that the Soviet was the only type of government for the communists at the high tide of revolution when the masses were in buoyant spirits.

"The Commune and the Soviet are the only forms of working-class government that mankind has ever discovered, aren't they?" Tong Chang-rong asked, and gazed at me. His eyes seemed to suggest that, if I had a form that might convince him, he would not choose to object to it. "If that is so, then let us make up a suitable one for ourselves," I said.

"For ourselves? I'm afraid that I'm not such a great genius. How can we make up things that are not mentioned in Marx's classic works?"

I could not agree with this view or attitude which regarded things as immutable and absolute, from which one could not deviate.

"Comrade Tong Chang-rong, did the French working class refer to any classics when they created the Commune? Was the Russian Soviet proposed by the founders of Marxism in their classic works? How can you regard the Soviet as the brainchild of a genius? If the people had not required it, if the Russian situation had not required it, I think the Soviet would not have emerged in the arena of history."

Without giving any sign of what he thought, Tong Chang-rong produced a large tobacco pouch from his pocket, filled his pipe and set it between his lips, then offered the pouch to me. He used to carry the tobacco pouch and the pipe in his hand while inspecting the guerrilla zone. When he met a peasant on the way he would fill the pipe and then offer it to the peasant. He was a man of peculiar character, and this simplicity of his won him love and respect from the people in the guerrilla zone. In winter he went about in a fur cap like those worn by local peasants.

His silence vexed me, but the fact that he refrained from further argument was a good omen. Following my conversation with him, I met Lee Yong Guk, Kim Myong Gyun, Jo Chang Dok and some other military and political cadres, and discussed with them the question of replacing the Soviet with a new revolutionary government. We debated the matter seriously for several days.

For purposes of a smooth discussion, we emphasized the importance of a criterion for defining the form of the government.

I asserted that we must not make the criterion too complicated, and that, since we were all fighting for the people and were their faithful servants, determined to dedicate all our lives to their cause, we must draw the criterion from the character of our revolution at that stage, laying emphasis on whether the government we were going to establish would be able to champion the interests of all sections of the population and whether it would enjoy their enthusiastic support.

On hearing this, my comrades cheered, saying that everything was now clear to them, that a government which was to champion the interests of all sections of the population must be a united-front government, since the term "all sections of the population" would mean not only the workers and poor or hired peasants, but other broad sections of the people, that a united-front government would suit the character of the anti-imperialist, anti-feudal democratic revolution, and that they would welcome such a government with open arms.

I again emphasized that the united-front government must be a people's revolutionary government based on a worker-peasant alliance. Nowadays, this is known in the history books as the line on the establishment of the people's revolutionary government.

There is no need to mention the result of our vote, for they believed that the form of people's revolutionary government we chose suited to east Manchuria, where Koreans were the overwhelming majority of the inhabitants, was ideally suited to the character of the Korean revolution which was directed at democracy and against imperialism and feudalism, and that it met the requirements of the people. We discovered the criterion for the form of government in the people's requirements and in a means of championing and representing the people's interests.

After deciding on the form of government, we agreed to set an example in one district and, if the result was accepted as good, to extend the example to other revolutionary districts. District No. 5 was chosen as the unit in which to set an example.

Lee Yong Guk, Kim Myong Gyun and I visited Wangqing district No. 5 and attended the meeting to elect the district committee of the people's revolutionary government. The meeting was held at the village of Xiamudan, two and half a miles away from Sishuiping. The day was the anniversary of the MOPR, a Russian acronym for the International Organization for Assisting Revolutionaries. The Executive Committee of the Comintern decided in 1923 to establish this organization for the purpose of assisting the families of revolutionary martyrs, and set March 18 as the international anniversary of the MOPR.

Jo Chang Dok, chairman of the fifth district Soviet government, showed us into the office of the Soviet, where I talked to about 20 peasants from Gayahe.

"We have decided to set up a new government to replace the Soviet government. It must represent your will. What kind of government would you like to set up?" I asked. An old man rose and answered, "If the government to be set up will make our life easier, we'll ask for nothing more."

I declared excitedly that a people's revolutionary government would be established in place of the Soviet government, and that the new government would be the first genuine people's government in the world history of political power.

"This government will represent and champion the interests of all the people who love their country and their fellow people. It will fulfill their most cherished desires. What are your cherished desires? The people's revolutionary government will fulfill all of your desires to own land, to have the right to work, to educate your children, and to have equality for all."

The people from Gayahe fully supported the line of the people's revolutionary government which I explained to them.

Prior to the ceremony to proclaim the establishment of the people's revolutionary government, we saw to it that all expropriated private property was returned to the former owners. In order to compensate for what had been damaged or consumed after expropriation, Yang Song Ryong even organized an armed raid on a lumber station. The cattle and horses captured from the enemy in that battle were used by the peasants to cultivate the land distributed to them in the spring of that year.

At the meeting I made a speech to the effect that the people's revolutionary government was truly a people's government, and then the government's ten-point program was announced. This program was later incorporated almost without amendment into the Ten-point Program of the Association for the Restoration of the Fatherland.

Still vivid in my memory is the image of the county party secretary, RI Yong Guk, during the meeting at the village in Sishuiping. While everyone was enjoying themselves dancing together, he sat in a corner, shedding tears. I slipped away from the dancing party and walked over to him.

"Comrade Secretary, why are you sad when everyone is dancing?"

Without even attempting to dry the tears trickling down his cheeks, Lee Yong Guk heaved a deep sigh.

"I can't see why these people do not spit at me. The Wangqing people have suffered from Leftist evils entirely because of me. But they thanked me. Commander Kim, you are the man who should receive thanks from them."

"Our people are generous and good-natured. The fact that instead of settling accounts with you the people thanked you, Secretary, means that they have accepted the line of the people's revolutionary government wholeheartedly. From now onwards, let us give our minds only to the future."

"I have not been living in my right mind, but in some other man's. You have opened my eyes to a truth of genuine value. Let us live for the people! What profound meaning there is in this simple motto! I will remember it all my life," Lee Yong Guk firmly resolved, squeezing my hand.

He was not able to live up to his pledge, for the east Manchuria ad hoc committee dismissed him from his post of secretary of the county party committee. The ad hoc committee said that Lee Yong Guk was dismissed because he had belonged to the M-L group and the Wangqing county party committee was guilty of an ultra-Leftist error in implementing the Soviet line. It also said that he was suspected of having been involved in the case of the "Minsaengdan."

The charge that Lee Yong Guk had belonged to the M-L group was not true. When involved in youth work at Xilinhe he had been recommended for the post of secretary of the Young Communist League under the east Manchuria ad hoc committee by a man who had been involved in the M-L group. That was all. It was unreasonable and immoral that the secretary of the county party committee was alone held responsible for all the evils resulting from the ultra-Leftist Soviet line. If Lee Yong Guk had deserved the punishment of dismissal, then what punishment should have been meted out to the people who had imposed the Soviet line upon their subordinates and the men who had forced him to implement the line?

The charge that Lee Yong Guk had been a "Minsaengdan" member was totally unfounded.

I stated on several occasions that he had been neither a factionalist nor a "Minsaengdan" member.

However, while I was in Luozigou for negotiation with Wu Yicheng, Lee Yong Guk was executed on a false charge of being a "counterrevolutionary." His records contained no evidence to prove him to be a "Minsaengdan" member. He had once taken refuge in the Maritime Province of Siberia from the wholesale arrest and he could have lived there in peace as an exile for the rest of his life. Nevertheless, he had returned to Jiandao and plunged into the tempest in order to serve the cause of the revolution.

I still do not understand why it was necessary to label such a faithful and honest man a "Minsaengdan" member.

Not long after the establishment of the people's revolutionary government in the district No. 5, Tong Chang-rong came to me and said, with a pleasant smile on his face, "Comrade Kim Il Sung, we are going to discuss the matter of a change in the political line before long, with the participation of a man sent from the Comintern. I hope that you, Comrade Kim Il Sung, will make the keynote speech, since you have the experience of having established the people's revolutionary government in the district No. 5."

In the summer of that year, an important meeting was held to discuss the change in the political line. The meeting was attended by a man who had been sent to east Manchuria from the Comintern, who brought with him a document concerning the change in the line.

At the meeting I proposed the line of a people's revolutionary government as a united-front government based on a worker-peasant alliance, and explained once again the draft of the government's policy, which included land reform and other democratic measures to be implemented by the government in the fields of the economy, education, culture, public health and military affairs. Our policy was in agreement with the new line formulated by the Comintern. The man from the Comintern expressed his full support for and approval of the line on the establishment of the people's revolutionary government.

The meeting, which lasted many days in an atmosphere of serious debate and ideological struggle, adopted a decision to reorganize the Soviet in accordance with our line of the people's revolutionary government and to combat the evil consequences of the Leftist Soviet line in all the guerrilla zones.

After the meeting, all the Soviets in east Manchuria were reshaped into people's revolutionary governments. In places where the conditions were not ripe, measures were adopted to form peasant committees and gradually reorganize them into a people's revolutionary government. Property that had been expropriated in the name of the abolition of private property and consumed by the people in the guerrilla zones was compensated for by the new government in cash and in kind.

The people's revolutionary government, which was run by the people, its masters, implemented democracy for the popular masses, the overwhelming majority of the population, and exercised dictatorship over the enemy.

The establishment of the people's revolutionary government in Gayahe and the meeting that had adopted the changed line led to the emergence of a people's revolutionary government in every district of the revolutionary organization in east Manchuria, and also in every village. Each district people's revolutionary government had its own chairman and vice-chairman, and nine to eleven executive committee members. It also had departments of the land, military affairs, economics, food, communications, and medical services.

This was the embryo and prototype of the people's government to be established in the liberated homeland.

The people's revolutionary government distributed land to the peasants without compensation and enforced an eight-hour working day in all the guerrilla zones. In those days there were approximately a thousand workers in the Xiaowangqing guerrilla base. Most of them were lumbermen, raftsmen and charcoal burners. Five hundred of them worked at Sancidao, the administrative center of the district No. 2, and the other five hundred at the foot of the Fangcao Mountains near Macun. They all benefited from the eight-hour working day.

The people's revolutionary government took stringent measures to ensure that private entrepreneurs doubled the workers' pay.

The government also placed the forests in and around the guerrilla zones under its control and prohibited the felling of trees without its permission.

In these circumstances, the Japanese manager of the Qinhe lumber station at Daduchuan and Chinese lumber dealers came to the guerrilla zone authorities to negotiate permission for timber-felling. The matter was settled so that the purchasers paid one yuan for a piece of lumber, but payment was made in kind, in items such as clothing, food and other consumer items.

The people's revolutionary government established the Children's Corps schools and gave the children free education, and it ensured that all the population received free medical care at the hospitals at Lishugon and Shiliping in the guerrilla zone. A law on women's equality was enforced and women participated in public life and work, on a basis of equal rights with men.

Printing works, tailors' shops and weapons repair works were operated in the guerrilla zone.

Cultural activities in the guerrilla zones produced many famous songs of lasting significance for our people, and theatrical art flourished, producing many original works, which later developed into such masterpieces as The Sea of Blood, The Fate of a Self-Defence Corps Man, and so on.

The term "Soviet," symbolic of inhumanity and expropriation, remained only a memento of the past. The people who had fled to the enemy-held area from the evils of the Soviet policy began to return to the guerrilla zones one by one or in groups. Old people freely visited their neighbors, carrying their pipes at their waists. The guerrilla zone rang once again with the laughter of a large and harmonious community of people who trusted, loved and relied on one another.

The valleys and mountains of Wangqing, which had withstood the severe winter, began to be adorned with various kinds of rustling flowers: the throbbing of a new life was in evidence.

This life roused such envy that the son of a landowner, who had been held hostage at Xiaowangqing by Commander Chai's unit, begged to be allowed to live in the guerrilla zone.

7.4. The Man from the Comintern

---

In April 1933, when our struggle against the Leftist deviation was at its height in the guerrilla base, Tong Chang-rong came to see me in the company of a middle-aged man dressed in dabushanzi. The man appeared like a gentleman and had a gentleman's manners. Seeing me from a distance, he smiled and raised his hand above his head in a gesture of greeting. His eyes were shining in such delight, I might have taken him for an old acquaintance of mine. On shaking hands with him, however, I found him to be a stranger. But strange to say, I still had the feeling that this stranger was an old acquaintance. So I received him kindly, with a smile.

This mysterious guest was Manchurian provincial party committee member Pan, an inspector from the Comintern. Just as Wei Zheng-min used to be addressed as Old Wei, this man was addressed as Old Pan. Pan is the Chinese pronunciation of his surname. According to Chinese custom, an elderly or respected person was given the title "Old," which was used as a polite way of addressing him. Few people called him by his real name Lee Ki Dong or by his nickname Pan Qing-you.

Inspector Pan was renowned as a revolutionary and party worker among the communists in Manchuria.

I first heard of Pan from Wang Run-cheng. When Pan worked as secretary of the Ningan county party committee after the September 18 incident, Wang Run-cheng was a member of the committee for propaganda under him. Wang said that he was put in charge of propaganda on that committee on Pan's recommendation, and he was very proud of the fact. According to him, Pan was a veteran who graduated from the Huangpu Military Academy, participated in the uprising at Wuchang and the northern expedition in China, and studied in the Soviet Union. He had also been the secretary of the Suining central county party committee. Wang said that he had been charmed more than once by Pan's noble qualities and keen understanding. Wang's respect for him was quite exceptional.

Hearing about him from Wang, I was delighted at the fact that able revolutionaries like Pan were working in our local areas. I later heard more about Pan from Choe Song Suk and Jo Tong Uk, who came from north Manchuria. Choe Song Suk said that she had been advised by him to come to Wangqing, and she described in an interesting manner how she had participated under his guidance in the May Day demonstration in the streets of Ningan. These previous contacts led us to spend much time on recollections of our common acquaintances Wang Run-cheng and Choe Song Suk.

"Is Comrade Choe Song Suk from Ningan well?" Pan asked at the beginning of our conversation.

His inquiry made it clear to me what Choe Song Suk had meant when she said that Pan's consideration for his subordinates was his particularly good point, and I was deeply moved. "Yes. On her arrival from north Manchuria she was elected to the Dawangqing Soviet. She has now been elected to the women's department of the Xiaowangqing district committee, and is actively involved in the work of the Women's Association."

"Does she go about on horseback over here, too?"

"So I have heard, but I have never seen her riding a horse."

"She learnt to ride, and resolved to join the cavalry of the revolutionary army. She is a bold and determined girl."

"Then we Wangqing people are very fortunate! Don't you regret having sent her to us?"

"Why should I regret it? Her family is in north Manchuria, but I told her to come to east Manchuria. To be candid, Jiandao is the center of the revolutionary struggle in Manchuria, so I told her that if she wished to do her bit for the revolution, she should go to Wangqing, to where the base is, to the people's land; that I expected a great deal from Jiandao, and that I, too, wished to come and work here."

Though I was grateful to Pan for acknowledging east Manchuria as the center of the Korean revolution, I felt somewhat ashamed to hear it. I wondered what impression he would be given by the Leftist abuses in the guerrilla zone when he witnessed them. Of course, I had previously known almost nothing of his political ideas and attitude. Though he was a man of broad political perspective and rich experience in the struggle, he could not always be expected to oppose the Leftist trend unreservedly.

However, I set great store by Wang and Choe's opinion of Pan. They often emphasized that Pan, being an experienced man, had never suffered from prejudice against his subordinates and dealt with every matter on the basis of his own conviction, with fairness and prudence. Moreover, Pan produced a good impression on me when I first met him. That day's conversation allowed me to get to know him. We parted with a promise to have more serious talks later. The visitor from the Comintern had timed his visit badly for me, for I had to go to command my unit in the fight to repulse thousands of "punitive" troops who were attacking us in waves.

"Then I must go with you to fight," he said. "Please give me an old rifle at least."

Pan insisted on taking the field with us for at least one day, saying that as an envoy of the Comintern, if he returned without so much as seeing how we were fighting in east Manchuria, he would feel ashamed of himself and would regret it all his life.

"Comrade Pan, bullets do not make exceptions for inspectors from the Comintern. There will be many chances to see battle, so please rest from the fatigue of your journey today." After I had dissuaded him, I went to the battlefield.

The enemy had surrounded the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone on three sides, and had been attacking us persistently for three days. In stubborn defensive tactics, we mowed him down. The enemy suffered hundreds of casualties before he retreated. The "punitive" forces, which had invaded the guerrilla zone in the direction of Guanmenlazi and Mt. Ppyojok under cover of spring fog, began fighting among themselves, in the style of a tragi-comedy, which was much talked about among the inhabitants of Xiaowangqing. Pan, too, burst into laughter at the news.

His appearance in Wangqing provoked different reactions among the inhabitants.

Those who, regarding the Leftist Soviet line as the Comintern's policy, had placed themselves at its beck and call, thought that Old Pan would support their position, and that his appearance would, therefore, be a good opportunity to apply sanctions against the proponents of the line of the people's revolutionary government and brand them as Rightists, so that they would no longer dispute the form of government.

On the other hand, those who, denouncing the Soviet line as Leftist, had worked all along for the establishment of a new form of government in accordance with the line of the people's revolutionary government, watched Old Pan's every action closely, apprehensive that their anti-Soviet position might be rejected by him or that, in the worst case, they might even be punished in the name of the Comintern. Many of them foretold that Pan's visit would complicate the situation in the guerrilla zone, which had just begun to shake off the grip of the Soviet line.

The former group was in triumphant mood; the latter was in a state of mental defeat. Both attitudes sprang from the fact that they regarded the Comintern authority as absolute. The Comintern, which was capable of disbanding a party or trying a man for his crimes, seemed as awesome to them as an international supreme court. They thought that the Comintern could redeem or destroy the fate of a revolutionary as it pleased.

Pan's appearance placed a strain on the guerrilla zone. I, too, could sense the strain in the atmosphere at every moment.

The attitude which Pan would take towards those of us who had supported the line of the people's revolutionary government against the Soviet line of the Comintern and denounced the Soviet measures as Leftist abuses was a matter of serious concern for us.

I thought it fortunate for our revolution that the Comintern had sent its representative to east Manchuria, where the people were groaning under the yoke of Leftist high-handedness. At a time when the advocates of the Soviet line and the line of the people's revolutionary government were arguing with each other over who was correct, Pan's appearance would initiate a decisive phase by his supporting or rejection of the different lines.

Nobody had yet given any assurance that the Comintern would support our position. But I was determined to lodge a protest to Pan against the directives that had been issued in turn by the Comintern, the Manchurian provincial party committee and other organizations, directives which did not suit the actual conditions in the guerrilla bases. I was also ready, if necessary, to argue with him about theoretical questions, in order to rectify the ultra-Leftist tendency in the implementation of the Soviet line and the anti "Minsaengdan" struggle. I was not in the least afraid of punishment or sanctions. In short, I believed that the decisive moment had arrived.

During those days certain disgruntled comrades apparently sent a letter of complaint to the Comintern, requesting it to settle the dispute in east Manchuria. Having examined the letter, it had apparently sent Pan, a Korean, to settle the dispute, because the majority of the inhabitants in east Manchuria were Koreans. Inspector Pan himself later said that such a letter had been received by the Comintern.

When I came back from the battle in defense of Xiaowangqing, Pan came to see me again. His expression was not so radiant as it had been when I first met him. From the inspector's expression, which betrayed heavy anxiety behind his vague smile, I judged that he had finally found himself faced with a choice between the grim realities on which political philosophies had become entangled. It seemed that he had clashed with Tong Chang-rong over the issue of the political line.

I saw to it that Pan stayed at old man Lee Chi Baek's house, the largest one in Macun, and spent some ten days talking with him in the front room of the house.

Pan spoke Chinese fluently, and he spoke in Chinese from the start, so I was obliged to do the same. We talked mainly at night and early in the mornings. During daylight hours I had no time to spare to talk with him because I was commanding my unit. Pan traveled around the guerrilla zone during the day, busily acquainting himself with the actual conditions there.

People who have frequently stayed away from their homes will understand very well how intimate traveling companions who share the same lodging can become, despite the inconvenience, and how charming and interesting stories become woven through their intimate relations. Pan and I, too, became intimate during those ten days, so intimate that we became like members of one family.

Although Inspector Pan was my elder by more than twenty years, as well as being a veteran revolutionary with a rich experience of struggle, he never put on airs or betrayed any awareness of his seniority. He talked to me frankly and enthusiastically, placing himself on comradely terms with me.

First we introduced ourselves, tracing our pasts, but avoiding formal matters relating to revolutionary practice. I did this first, and then Pan followed suit. And then we took turns in filling up the blanks in our past experiences or relating our impressions of the events we had experienced, not noticing that the night was passing.

Pan became very curious about me when he learned that I had been in prison four times before I was even twenty years old.

"So you are my senior, Comrade Kim, in terms of imprisonment, aren't you?"

He said that he, too, had some experience of prison life in Harbin, and that as a result of a large May Day demonstration he had organized, the party organization in Ning'an County had suffered wholesale destruction. The organization was crushed by the merciless repression of the Manchukuo authorities and the "punitive" actions of the Japanese army, and the party members and hardcore elements were scattered far and wide, he said. Pan attributed the losses to the mental vertigo that had afflicted him with the rapid growth of the party ranks and of their energetic activities. But he recognized that the lessons of the May Day demonstration had provided the political motive for the foundation of the Ning'an guerrilla forces under the command of Kim Hae San and Lee Kwang Lim.

"People realized after a few lashings in prison that we had organized the demonstration clumsily and belatedly. By organizing it in the streets of the county town we actually exposed party members to enemy repression at a time when we should have sent the organization deeper underground and prepared it for an armed struggle!"

Whenever he mentioned the demonstration he was angry with himself. But he admired the demonstration we had organized against the Jirin-Hoeryong railway construction project. He was the type of man who is fair and generous in assessing other people's achievements while underestimating or even denigrating his own success.

"You say you celebrated your twenty-first birthday a few days ago, so you are only half as old as I am, but I must say, Comrade Kim, that you are my senior not only in terms of imprisonment, but also in terms of life experience," Inspector Pan said when he had heard my personal history. I could not help feeling awkward as he repeated that I was his senior.

"Comrade Pan, if you praise me to the skies, I am afraid you will make a fool of me." He shrugged his shoulders in the way Russians do.

"I should like you to know that it is discontent with my own life which underlies my admiration of you. I am a man who has not led a satisfactory life. At my age of forty-three I can say that the prime of my life is past, but I have done nothing which I can be proud of. That is my sorrow.

"Don't be too modest. You have experienced the scorching sun in the south and the snowstorms in the north; your life has known laughter, anguish and tears. To be frank, I am not fond of people who look down upon themselves. How can you say that the prime of your life is past at only a little more than forty?"

He was not displeased by my criticism. I thought he was too modest with himself. The meritorious service he had rendered as secretary of the Ning'an county party committee and the Suining central county party committee, and the role of a midwife he had played in the birth of the Ning'an guerrilla forces, not to mention his activity in southern China - all these could never be ignored. The Suining central county party committee was a very large organization that had been formed by the merger of the Muling, Ningan, Dongning, Mishan and other county party committees.

Once rumour had it that Pan was to receive honorable promotion to the post of a senior cadre in the eastern area bureau of Jirin Province, which was to play the role of an intermediary liaison echelon between the Comintern and the Manchurian provincial party committee. I was not sure whether he actually had been promoted or not, but the mere fact the Comintern had appointed him as the inspector in charge of the work in east Manchuria was eloquent proof that he was a man of high reputation.

Our conversation proceeded with an exchange of information and opinions concerning the current political questions of mutual interest.

The first subject of our discussion was the Comintern and the international communist movement. This discussion was extremely valuable to me, for although I was in touch with the workers of the Comintern liaison office, I had never had candid and serious talks with them.

I explained to him the efforts made by the Korean communists to implement the decisions of the Comintern, and then clarified our position and attitude towards its line and directives.

"We consider that the Comintern fulfils the role of the General Staff of the international communist movement excellently. Over the past years it has achieved a great deal by rallying the communists throughout the world into an international alliance and struggling against imperialism, for peace and socialism. In the clear understanding that the Comintern is the international center which performs the function of centralized control of the communist movement, we will, in the future as in the past, remain loyal to its rules and its line. But, Comrade Pan, I would like to take the liberty of telling you something else about the activity of the Comintern." The final part of my statement immediately made him tense.

"How should I take what you have said? You don't happen to hold any opinion opposed to it, do you?"

"Perhaps an opinion, or a complaint. I have wanted to tell to the Comintern a few things for a long time."

"Speak up, whatever you have on your mind." He gazed at me with curiosity.

I believed the time had come when I should speak out to the Comintern.

"I do not support any faction, but I very much regret the Comintern's decision in the past to disband the Korean Communist Party. Factions existed not only in the Korean Communist Party; the forging of signatures by means of potato stamps was also practiced by the Indochina Communist Party and other parties, wasn't it?"

A look of surprise, rather than tension, flitted across his face. My words had taken the inspector by surprise, a man who had been through all manner of bitter experiences.

"As a Korean communist like yourself, Comrade Kim, not as an inspector from the Comintern, I regarded the disbandment of the Korean Communist Party as a disgrace, and share you in your regret that the Comintern had declared its disbandment. But there is one thing you must understand in this matter, and that is, why the Indochina Communist Party remains in existence, while the Korean Communist Party was disbanded. It is because a prominent figure like Ho Chi Minh represented Indochina in the Comintern. By contrast, in those years the ranks of the Korean communist movement contained no such outstanding figure or center of leadership who would be recognized by the Comintern."

His view that one of the major reasons for the party's collapse was the absence of a leader or a center of leadership shocked me, for I had considered factional strife within the party to be the primary cause of its disbandment. It took Pan's cogent analysis to discern that the disbandment of the Korean Communist Party was due to the absence of a leader, a man of world renown acknowledged by the Comintern, who could resist his party's disbandment.

In addition to the matter of the Comintern, we also had a valuable discussion concerning the practical questions arising in the Korean revolution.

Inspector Pan said that the Korean communists must work hard to found a new party of their own, instead of living in a state of frustration, and sharing lodgings with the party of another country because most of their party members were in exile after the party had ceased to exist.

"I am not saying this because I am a Korean revolutionary, but I do believe that the Koreans must have their own communist party. If the Korean communists regarded the disbandment of the Korean Communist Party as depriving them for good of the chance to rebuild their party, that would amount to suicide. It is the legitimate and inviolable right of the Koreans to have their own party. One may share another man's room for a couple of years, but not for ever."

Pan's conviction that the Korean communists must rebuild their party completely was in agreement with our policy of founding a party, which had been adopted at the Kalun meeting. "You are right," I said, encouraged by his words. "If a Korean does not strive to rebuild the party, he should be regarded as having abandoned the Korean revolution. We must not be like a man who shares another man's room, studying his expression, and wasting time. On the basis of this point of view, we put forward a new policy of forming grassroots party organizations first, and then establishing the party from bottom to top by expanding and strengthening them, and we established a party organization, the Society for Rallying Comrades, three years ago in line with this policy."

I went into the details of the historical background to the formation of the first party organization, as well as describing my own involvement in this work and its expansion.

Pan listened to me with close attention.

"Comrade Kim, I may be a man of fancy, but you are a man of thorough practice. It is simply marvelous.

But, look here. It's a problem that there are too many factions in the Korean communist movement. So you must not recognize the factionalists, but make a fresh start among young people. You can do nothing with factionalists around you. Many of them have become dogs of the Japanese. And many of the confirmed factionalists who are not Japanese dogs are involved in a tug-of-war struggle for hegemony, instead of working for the revolution. In order to combat factions, we must fight the Japanese successfully. If our ranks grow stronger, and the hardcore elements are united in the course of the struggle, they will lay the foundation for the establishment of the party."

His words excited me greatly. They were, of course, not new to me. The basic policy we had maintained was that the party should be formed with young people who had not been infected with factionalism.

I renewed my resolve to found the party by uniting the Korean people and building up its core, so as to accomplish the basic task of national liberation.

It was fortunate that Pan and I had the opportunity to discuss questions concerning the international communist movement, the Comintern, and the founding of the party in Korea, and reach complete agreement.

Our conversation naturally turned to the issue of Soviet power, which had been occupying everybody's attention in Jiandao. I was honestly eager to hear Pan's opinion of the Soviet government to which the people had turned their backs, at which they had spat, and from which they stood aloof.

"Old Pan," I said casually, "what is your impression of the guerrilla zone you have looked around on your first visit to Jiandao?"

"I would like to pay my respects to the people of Jiandao and the revolutionaries who have built a wonderful society on this barren land," Pan said in a loud voice, unbuttoning and opening the front skirts of his gown. "The people here have done a lot of work and endured tremendous hardships. But I must say that it is a matter of great regret that an unwelcome specter is hovering over this marvelous land."

From his emotional tone, I could tell that he was greatly excited.

"A specter? What do you mean by that?" I asked.

He picked up a large pinch of cut tobacco from the pouch which old man Lee Chi Baek offered and began to roll a thick cigarette.

"I mean the Leftist Soviet line. It is pulling down the tower which has been built by the strenuous efforts of the people of Jiandao. I can't understand this at all. How is it possible for the revolutionaries of Jiandao, who pioneered the Manchurian revolution, to take leave of their senses to such an extent?"

"To tell you the truth, I find the Leftist deviation so upsetting that my hair may turn white."

"How can they be so blind and stupid?... I talked with them, and they were totally ignorant of the Soviet government in Russia. Comrade Tong Chang-rong is a man of rich fighting experience and gentle character.....

"What a preposterous mistake! It is clearly no accident that letters of complaint were addressed to the Comintern. You have had plenty to worry about, I expect."

He glanced at me in commiseration.

"I wouldn't mind personal distress, no matter how great. My heart ached at the sight of people who were suffering under Leftist high-handedness."

Pan puffed at his cigarette nervously and continually, as if to give vent to his anger. "I have encountered a stroke of good luck in the midst of misfortune, which is that the line of the people's revolutionary government was born of the soil overgrown with Leftist weeds, the government which enjoys the people's support and will save our revolution from the crisis. Comrade Kim, a short while ago I informed Comrade Tong Chang-rong that your proposal is marvelous."

"Do you mean to say that you also support the line of the people's revolutionary government?"

"If not, why should I have said so to Comrade Tong Chang-rong? He has also expressed his support for the line. He seems to have been strongly impressed by your statement that anything the people like is good. Let us now work better, with firm confidence in ourselves."

Pan grasped my hand in an unconscious but significant gesture, and then released it. In this way the Comintern support for our line on the people's revolutionary government was confirmed.

Pan said it was a remarkable success for us to have gained the freedom of activity of the guerrilla army by forming a special detachment and improved relations with the national salvation army of the Chinese nationalists. He encouraged us revolutionaries in east Manchuria to follow up this success.

Saying that our line on the people's revolutionary government was basically in accord with the line of the revolutionary masses' government proposed by the Chinese party, he explained the Chinese line briefly.

The Chinese line proposed a new and clear strategy on the Manchurian issue, centering on the switchover of their political line. It had been formally issued in the name of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party, but was in fact drafted by the Comintern. It could be said, therefore, to represent the will of the Comintern.

Their idea of forming peasant committees as organs of rural government attracted our attention. The proposal was that the peasant committee should manage relations between the peasants and the guerrilla army, supplying food to the army and organizing armed self-defense guards on a routine basis, and that the party should ensure that hired farm hands and poor peasants become the leading force in the peasant committee, and thus rally the masses of middle peasants around them.

In other words, the Comintern had recognized the irrationality of the Leftist Soviet line in the question of political power, and had acknowledged the need to replace it with a new form of government. After all, this was the confirmation of the correctness of the line of the people's revolutionary government which we had proposed.

However, Inspector Pan was very concerned about the name of the peasant committee. Although peasant committees were better suited than Soviets to the situation in Manchuria, he said, a policy which was orientated towards the hired farm hands and poor peasants would not be able to rally the broader masses behind them. He stressed that the people's revolutionary government was an improvement and advance, a type of united front which was capable of rallying all sections of the population - workers, peasants, students, intellectuals and others - who were opposed to the Japanese. He said he would express this opinion in a letter to the Comintern and the Manchurian provincial party committee.

"What does it matter whether we call it a peasant committee or a people's revolutionary government? All that is required is to satisfy the people's desires. A people's revolutionary government will do in a place where we can put up such a sign, and a peasant committee will do where a committee is more suitable, won't it?"

In this way, I tried to calm the inspector's anxieties, but he was still not at ease. "You are right in general, but the name of the government must cater to the people's preferences. In any case, I must bring the matter to the Comintern."

I am not sure whether he did express his decision in a letter to the Comintern or not. In the wake of these events, the Soviets in all the guerrilla zones in east Manchuria were replaced by people's revolutionary governments or peasant committees, the Worker-Peasant Guerrilla Army was renamed the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army, and the Red Guards were reorganized as the Anti-Japanese Self-Defense Corps.

The inspector's visit raised a whirlwind that swept away the outmoded political order of the guerrilla zone. The Juche-orientated revolutionary policy which we had maintained since our days in Jirin won international support and encouragement, and the correctness of all our lines and policies was confirmed yet again.

This does not mean, however, that we agreed with everything that the Comintern did or that we obeyed its orders blindly. While respecting the measures taken by the Comintern, I applied my own independent judgment to them, regarding them from the point of view of the interests of the Korean revolution and the world revolution.

The most doubtful aspect of the Comintern strategy and the steps it had taken were its views on, and its manner of dealing with, the Korean revolution as a link in the overall chain of the world revolution.

When the October Socialist Revolution triumphed in Russia, and the ideal of socialism became a reality, the communists of all countries were faced with the noble task of both preserving the gains of the revolution and following up its success on a world scale.

In response to the requirements of the times, Lenin established the Third Communist International in 1919. Its historic mission was to organize the struggle of the working class and the oppressed nations of the whole world to free themselves from imperialist oppression and the chains of capital, and to develop this struggle on an international scale. This was a militant mission that differed from those of its predecessors, the First and Second Internationals, and fitted with the requirements of new times.

One of the major tasks of the Comintern at the time was to safeguard and defend the Soviet Union. The defense of the positions of victorious socialism was inseparable from the expansion of the socialist cause. Without defending them, it was impossible to spread and further develop the success of the October Revolution on a global scale. It was quite natural that the defense of the Soviet Union became an international slogan for all communists, and that the implementation of this slogan became the major content of the international communist movement.

These relations, which were historically inevitable and essential, supplied grist to the mills of those who opposed communism and lent plausibility to the reactionary bourgeois theoreticians who denounced the communist parties of various countries which implemented the orders of the Comintern as "stooges of the Soviet Union" or traitors to their own nations.

The communists in every country should have learned a lesson from this and combined their national and international duties in an appropriate manner. The Comintern should also have regarded this matter as highly important. If it was to fulfill its mission satisfactorily, the Comintern, while emphasizing the defense of the positions of victorious socialism, should have given sincere support to the communist movements in other countries, and should, in particular, have championed the interests of the lesser nations suffering under imperialist oppression and assisted their revolutionary struggles.

The Comintern, however, paid little attention to this need. Some officials of the Comintern talked loudly about the revolutionary movements in large countries, but dealt in a slighting or arbitrary fashion with matters relating to the revolutions in small countries. They discriminated too much in their views and their attitudes towards the revolution in different countries, in proportion to the share they could contribute to the building of an international bulwark for the defense of the Soviet Union.

Certain individuals and theoreticians occupying important posts in the Comintern spread the view that victories for the revolutionary movements in large countries would automatically lead to victories for the revolutionary struggles or independence movements in the adjacent small countries. Figuratively speaking, they held the view that if the head ripens, the ears will also ripen of their own accord.

This view gave rise to a sycophantic tendency among communists of small countries, who abandoned the independent position that one's own effort and the efforts of one's own people were the motive force of revolution, and began to rely on large countries. It also produced a chauvinistic tendency among the communists of the large countries, who ignored the communists of small countries and restrained their independent activities.

Thus it was not fortuitous that the revolutionaries' confidence in, and unsullied devotion to, the Comintern and the international communist movement became stained, despite the fact that these communists from different countries had been tremendously inspired by the great events of the birth of the socialist state and the foundation of the Comintern, and looked up to them as an ideal and a beacon-light as they advanced through the flames of struggle.

After the victory of the October Socialist Revolution and the foundation of the Comintern, loving support and a yearning for communism surged across the face of the world in an inexorable wave.

Renowned persons in all parts of the world were quick to join the ranks of those who espoused communism. Many of the major figures of the time, regarding communism as the only idea that represented the future of mankind, made efforts, through different channels, and regardless of their political affiliations and religious beliefs, to establish contact with the newborn Soviet Republic or the Comintern and receive aid from them.

Many of the nationalists in Korea also espoused, supported or sympathized with the idea of communism. Authoritative Christians, Chondoists and other religious believers were among them. For instance, Hyun Soon, the third minister of the Seoul Jongdong Methodist Church, represented the Korean religious organization of "Faith in Jesus" at the Far Eastern People's Congress held in Moscow in January 1922.

Soon in October 1919 (far right, front row) in Shanghai. Shin Ik Hee is far left and Ahn Chang Ho is at center, front row. Rev. Hyun (his American name), aka Song Won Sang, was one of the 33 signatories of the 1919 March 1st Declaration.

He was born in Whang-dong, Kyonggi Province, in 1878, into an yanban family. His grandfather had three wives at the same time. He went to Japan in 1898 for education, but was unable to come up with the tuition and returned home in 1902. He was hired as an interpreter for Korean farmhands at the Kahuku Plantation in Hawaii and arrived at Honolulu on March 1903, with the second shipload of Korean immigrants to America.

Most of the Korean immigrants were Christian converts due to the fact that American missionaries in Korea were primarily responsible for recruiting laborers for Hawaii's sugar crops. He helped establish several Korean churches in Hawaii and became pastor of the Korean Methodist Church in Kapaia, Hawaii, in 1905. He returned to Korea in 1907 to preach at the Chung Dong Church, Seoul, noted for its central role in the March First Movement of 1919. Upon collapse of the movement, he fled to Shanghai and participated in the Korean Provisional Government as deputy foreign minister. He returned to Hawaii in 1921 as official representative of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, and later worked for US intelligence during World War II.

Rev. Hyon sired Peter, David, Alice and two other children in Shanghai. Peter Hyun, joined the US Army during World War II and landed in Korea, a major, with the occupation force in 1945. Alice was recruited by the US to spy on Kim Il Sung. She was caught a few weeks before the Korean War started.

Hyun Soon was a minister of high reputation in Korea and he was elected one of the members of the Korean Provisional Government when it was formed in Shanghai. According to material which our comrades obtained from the Comintern archives in the Soviet Union a few years ago, when he attended the conference he carried with him a letter of attorney signed by Kim Pyong Jo, one of the group who drafted the Independence Declaration of March 1, 1919, and by Jo Sang Sop, Son long Do, Kim In Jon, Song Pyong Jo and other ministers.

When Hyun Soon filled in the form issued by the Koryo Department of the Russian Communist Party, he stated that he was connected with the Shanghai Communist Party, and that he had spent three weeks in Russia in September 1919. In answer to a questionnaire, on his "Aims and hopes," he wrote, "I aim for the independence of Korea and hope for the realization of communism." This document was only recently obtained by our comrades.

Of course, I am not sure how deep an understanding he possessed of the new idea of communism, or how warmly he sympathized with it, but it seems that he expected a great deal from the Comintern.

Lee Tong Whi, the first Prime Minister of the Korean Provisional Government in Shanghai, was involved in the communist movement. It is well known that he was sent as a representative to Moscow to report to the Comintern on the results of a joint conference of the Koryo Communist Party. The reformist force of Chondoism also sought alignment with the Comintern.

Choe Tong Hui, a son of Choe Si Hyong, the second leader of the Chondoist religion, and a grandnephew of Choe Je U, the founder of Chondoism, represented the reforming wing of Chondoism. In his capacity as chairman of the foreign affairs committee of the Emergency Supreme Revolutionary Council of Chondoists, he spent some time in Vladivostok in Russia, working hard for negotiations with the Comintern. He wrote letters to Katayama Sen, Injelson, and other officials who were working at the Oriental Department of the Comintern, requesting them to give the support needed by the movement for Korea's independence, and declaring that active cooperation between the Chondoists, the servants of the poor people, and the Comintern, the vanguard of the working class, would guarantee the success of the revolution in the Orient.

Choe Tong Hui even sent a letter to Chicherin, at that time People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Republic, requesting him to send within two years the weapons, explosives, ammunition, cavalry equipment, and means of transport required to equip fifteen composite brigades of the Koryo National Revolutionary Army which it was planned to organize. The fact that the reformist forces of Chondoism sought a new route for the independence movement, despite the hatred and denunciation of conservative Chondoists, was worthy of national admiration. But neither Soviet Russia nor the Comintern complied with their request.

Ryo Un Hyong, alias Mong Yang, also visited Moscow in 1919 and spoke with Lenin on the question of Korea's independence.

People would not believe it if they heard that an anti-communist element such as Syngman Rhee once supported Soviet Russia. But it seems to be true. There is information that he once visited Moscow and requested a colossal amount of financial aid, and that when his request was ignored, he turned against Soviet Russia and the Comintern and became ultra-pro-American.

Korea, the territory of which was only a hundredth of the Soviet Union, a land of thatched mud huts huddled together and skinny, hobbling donkeys, obviously appeared too small and too miserable to attract the attention of the Comintern officials. Even in the years when we were waging an armed struggle against the Japanese in Manchuria, their views on Korea did not change greatly. I greatly regretted the fact that the Comintern was so indifferent to the fate of the peoples of small countries and the national liberation struggles of the communists of small countries. Needless to say, this unkind treatment and cold attitude merely poured oil on the flames of our determination to establish the principle of Juche in the revolution and liberate our nation by our own efforts.

I was annoyed most of all by the fact that we lacked the strength to oppose or correct the attitudes and activities of the Comintern with which we disagreed, and were unable to control the way in which the Comintern work was organized and its chronic malady of red-tapism, although we knew this might lead to the sacrifice of the Korean revolution or place a stumbling block in the path of its Juche-oriented development.

We, the communists of the new generation, longed for the Comintern to understand the problems of the Korean communists and march in step with our aspirations and our unshakable resolve to carry out the revolution in our own way.

Pan's appearance in east Manchuria at a time when we were struggling with complex problems requiring prompt solutions was welcome. My acquaintance with him was one of the most significant events in my life. It was a good thing that there were people in the Comintern who understood us and supported us. His statements that the ranks of the Korean communist movement should be renewed with trained hardcore elements who had not been infected with factionalism, and that a party of the Korean people should be established produced an especially strong impression on me. His advice encouraged me and strengthened my sense of independence in thinking and in practice. Had it not been for his influence and comradely encouragement, it would have been impossible for me to fight effectively, even though I risked my life, in defense of the Juche spirit of the Korean nation and our revolution at a time when the struggle against the "Minsaengdan" was being conducted in such a dreadful manner.

Park So Sim introduced me to Marx's Capital, Shang Yue taught me the Dream at the Red Mansion, and now Inspector Pan had given me sincere support, encouragement and sympathy and so strengthened my conviction that Koreans must not forget Korea.

In all history of my revolutionary struggle against the Japanese imperialists I never discussed the fate of the Korean revolution and the political line of this revolution so enthusiastically, sincerely and so seriously as I did with Inspector Pan. He was a rare theoretician, with an unshakable commitment to the revolution. Had he been alive to work with us when we advanced to the area of Mt. Paektu in command of large forces in the latter half of the 1930s, he could have made many theoretical and practical contributions to the solution of the difficult problems facing the Korean revolution.

My acquaintance with Pan opened my eyes to the vital need for a theoretician capable of guiding and steering the practical struggle, in addition to the man of practice who was also important in the revolutionary struggle.

Following our unforgettable discussions at Xiaowangqing, Pan became my most intimate friend and comrade. Although he was more than twenty years older than me, we forged a relationship as friends and comrades in a matter of ten days, and this friendship and comradeship were as intimate as those of ten years duration. But they were not cemented by any material or personal interests. This exceptionally warm friendship was derived from a common, long-cherished desire for the liberation and freedom of Korea and from a shared way of thinking and aspiration to independence in all matters.

The depth of a friendship cannot be measured by the length of its duration or by the number of conversations. A long period of association does not necessarily indicate a deep friendship, nor does a short period of association mean friendship is shallow. The essential thing is the viewpoint and attitude one maintains in approaching man and his destiny, in approaching one's nation and its destiny. Depending on this viewpoint and attitude, the warmth of friendship may be redoubled or it may cool. Love for man, love for one's fellow people, and love for one's country are the touchstone of friendship. When Inspector Pan was leaving Xiaowangqing, I saw him off on horseback as far as the boundary between Wangqing and Hunchun Counties. Because he limped a little, I had seen to it that he could travel on horseback.

During our ride we talked a lot, and during a two days' stopover at the village of Shiliping, we discussed a host of subjects, including the international communist movement, our relations with the Chinese party, and matters relating to the Korean revolution at the present and in the future. We also made firm pledges to one another.

The subjects we discussed at the time would be good material for the plot of a novel. Lee Pom Sok's military academy was in that village, the Oh Jung Hwa's family were taking refuge there.

Pan even touched on his own family life. He said his wife was only half his own age. I don't remember exactly whether he called her O Yong Ok or O Pung Ok. I asked him why he had only married when he was over forty.

"Ha, ha!" he laughed, "no need to ask why. I did not have the charm a husband needs, so girls stayed away from me. Who would ever love a lame man like me? If it were not for Madam O, I might have remained an old bachelor."

He seemed to have been born with a low opinion of himself. I sympathized with him deeply for his delay in marrying.

"I expect Madam O has a sharp eye for a man. I have heard that she is a rare beauty. Late love must be as sweet as honey."

"Of course, but strangely enough, it was she, not I, that proposed. Anyway, late love is indeed exceptionally sweet."

"Rumor has it that she is the envy of all in north Manchuria."

"But, Comrade Kim, I hope you will not take so long as I did, if only for the sake of male dignity."

"Well, I, too, may be late. It does not depend on what I wish."

We chatted and laughed, sitting in a grass field near the village of Shiliping, and deepening our friendship.

Pan said that he had become deeply attached to Wangqing, and regretted parting with me. His next destinations were Hunchun and Helong.

"Comrade Kim, I will carry your image in my memory all my life. I am very happy to have met you in Wangqing, Comrade Kim Il Sung," he said, with a serious look, his eyes brimming with tears, his hand squeezing mine, as he crossed the border.

"So am I. I am most fortunate to have met you, Comrade Pan. Frankly, I don't want to bid you farewell."

"How could I wish to part? I wish that after this journey I could come to east Manchuria with my wife and work hand in hand with you, Comrade Kim. I am outdated in some ways. A little stained.... Please be Korea's Ho Chi Minh."

With these words, Inspector Pan took his leave of Wangqing. When he was some distance away, he turned round and raised his hand above his head. Looking at his hand as I had when I first met him, I felt as if a long time had passed. The details of his expression seemed to have been imprinted on my eyes to remain there for decades.

Feelings of loneliness and sorrow at parting from a man with whom I had forged a friendship in so short a time gripped my heart as he looked back at me, and I wondered why the farewell was so sad. Pan was smiling, but he, too, looked sad. His smile lay heavy on my heart. If he had not smiled, my heart would have been much lighter. He left me, wishing that he could return but died in Hunchun and we never met again.

He was murdered by Park Tu Nam, the political commissar of the Hunchun guerrilla battalion. Park Tu Nam was criticized most severely by the inspector at an enlarged meeting of the Hunchun county party committee which discussed the change in the revolutionary line.

Branded as a ringleader of factional strife, he was dismissed from his post as political commissar. While the inspector's guards in the yard of the house were looking at some Model 38 rifles that had been captured from the enemy, and the inspector was busy writing something, the traitor picked up one of the rifles and shot the inspector dead. The news shocked the people in Wangqing.

When I heard the news, I locked myself up in the front room of Lee Chi Baek's house, where Pan and I had discussed the revolution and the meaning of human life, and wept over his death all day long.

7.5. The Memory of a White Horse

---

I was intending to leave out this anecdote, because I considered a war-horse too insignificant to be given a space in the memoirs of my eighty years of life, in which there were so many heroes, so many benefactors and so many events that should be remembered. But my affection for this horse seems to tint my memory of it too strongly, and the impulse to make it known to the public is too strong for me to keep it to myself. Moreover, the animal is unforgettably linked with many people by the bonds of human feelings. The stories of these people are also too valuable to be consigned to oblivion.

In the spring of 1933 I came into possession of a horse. One day an official of the people's revolutionary government of Shiliping came to see me with some guerrillas, and brought me a white horse. In those days, the headquarters of the Wangqing guerrilla battalion was located in the valley of Lishugou, Macun, Xiaowangqing. The procession these people formed appeared too ostentatious for a company leading a war-horse with them. The visitors hitched the horse in the front yard of the headquarters, and then announced their arrival.

"Commander Kim, we respectfully wish to present a horse to you, who have to travel many rugged miles. Please accept this gift," said the official, speaking for his company. I was embarrassed at the sudden appearance of the delegation and at their solemnly decorous manner which seemed more appropriate to some grand function. Moreover, I was immediately surprised by the size of the group, larger than a squad of soldiers nowadays.

"I am afraid I am not worthy of such rich consideration as to allow me to ride about on a horse at the age of just twenty," I said, attempting to express my thanks modestly. The elderly official gesticulated in surprise.

"Rich consideration? The Japanese battalion commanders ride around pompously on horseback to show that they are fine officers. Why should our guerrilla commanders be any worse than them? I have read a book which says that Red-gowned General Kwak Jae U commanded his cavalry on horseback. A military commander needs dignity before everything else." "Where did this horse come from? It's a draught horse from a peasant's family, isn't it?" The government official waved his arms in denial.

"No, it isn't. It's a pet horse. Do you remember the old man, a former farm servant, who was elected to the government council at Shiliping the other day?"

"Of course. I even spoke in his support."

"This is a present to you from that old man."

"I can hardly believe that he had such a wonderful horse," I remarked, looking closely at the horse with its saddle and stirrups hanging on both sides, while I stroked its back. There was really no doubt that it was a farm horse. I could not make myself believe that any peasant in the mountain valley of Shiliping could possess a sleek pet horse like this, still less the former servant of a landowner. The official insisted that it was a pet horse, probably because he was afraid I might refuse to accept it if he admitted the truth. I don't remember the old man's full name, but his surname was Park. Old man Park had a reason for making a present of the horse to me. It is a moving story which should be told here.

The story begins at the time when he left the landowner's house after serving out his term. When the old man became too old to work, his master released him. In return for his life-long service, the landowner gave him a white foal which was a few months old. Immediately after it was born, the unfortunate animal suffered serious bruising, when it was stepped on by its mother, and it was ailing in the stable, too sick to romp about outside. It was infirm and undernourished. The niggardly landowner pretended to show him favor by giving him the sick animal, which might die the same day or the next, which was already as good as dead.

Old man Park came home to his hut with the sick foal in his arms, shedding tears. The sight of this sick foal, given as a reward for all the drudgery he had performed for decades made him feel sad at the absurdity of his whole life and at the hardness of the world. Nonetheless, the old man, who led a solitary, lonely life, treasured the animal as if it were a precious stone in his hands and tended it with all the care he could muster. The foal grew into a full-fledged horse. Whenever he felt lonely, he would go to the horse, and grumbled to himself, giving vent to his feelings at his sad plight, and grieving over his fate. The horse was a loving son and daughter and friend to him.

Having been mistreated all his life, the old man ranked himself with draught animals and accepted worldly abuses as natural. When on rare occasions he was treated as a man should be, he would feel uncomfortable or awkward. This old man was elected to the government council for the Shiliping guerrilla zone. There is surely no need to explain how deeply he was moved and how many tears of thanks he shed on that occasion. This explains why he brought his white horse to government yard one evening.

"Mr. Chairman, please send this white horse on my behalf to Commander Kim Il Sung. Today for the first time in my life I was treated like a man, thanks to the commander. As a token of my deep gratitude to him I wish to present my pet horse to him, the horse which I have fattened for many years. Please convey my thanks to him."

On learning why the old man had sent the horse to me, I felt it improper to decline the present.

"I don't really feel I should accept the gift, but the kindness of the old man's heart obliges me to accept it. Please convey my thanks to him," I told the official from the Shiliping government, as I took the tether from him, and then I asked him why so many people had come when one driver would have been sufficient.

"Commander Kim, we wished to see you on horseback, so the guerrillas and the people have sent their representatives. Please mount the horse!" the official said earnestly. The men from the 2nd company, too, insisted that I ride the horse. Only after seeing me mounted, were the visitors satisfied and returned home to Shiliping.

I was very grateful to the old man for his kindness and his respect for me, but I did not ride the horse for many days. I was afraid that, if I went about on horseback, I might appear extravagant in the eyes of the people and my men. I gave the horse to Lee Ung Man, who was working in the arsenal, the man who had brought a box of Browning pistols in order to be allowed to join the guerrilla army. He was brave, but one of his legs had been amputated after a serious wound.

The leg had been amputated by Jang Un Pho, the doctor of the guerrilla-zone hospital which was located near the battalion barracks at Xiaolishugou. He represented the medical profession in Xiaowangqing, the only doctor, but a man of versatile abilities, practising both medicine and surgery, and treating all cases. The hospital was managed by a mutual aid society, and patients who needed treatment were required to bring a letter signed by the chairman of the council of the people's revolutionary government. The mutual aid society acted as a medical council and would often decide that bones damaged by bullets had to be amputated. Drugs were scarce and no other remedies were available, so drastic measures had to be taken.

The doctor had improvised a scalpel by grinding down the spring of a worn-out clock and he used this for surgery. That was how Lee Ung Man had become a cripple and had been discharged from the guerrilla army. After leaving hospital, he stayed at Yang Song Ryong's house near the hospital, living under the care of Yang's mother for some time. Lee Ung Man found the white horse very useful. He rode to and from the arsenal, cheerful in his life and work.

In the course of time another white horse came into my hands. It was captured from the Japanese in the battle at Dahuanggou. Some veterans say that it was captured in the battle of Zhuanjiaolou, but I don't think it is worth the trouble of denying that. Where it came from is not essential. The point is that a horse which a Japanese officer had ridden about came into our possession, and it was a perfect war-horse that won everyone's admiration. In that battle I had made some of my men lie in ambush, and the Japanese officer on the horse was unfortunate enough to be hit first and he fell to the ground. Then a strange thing happened. The horse, having lost its rider, came running over to the slope where my command post was located, instead of running away to the enemy camp.

When he saw the horse, Jo Wal Nam, my orderly, tried to drive it away towards the road, in case it should attract the enemy's attention to the command post. But although the orderly threw tree stumps and empty cartridges at the horse, the animal would not return to its dead master, and approached us. However hard the orderly tried to chase it away, the horse simply balked, with its legs rooted to the ground.

"Why insist on driving him away when he refuses to go? Don't be too cruel," I rebuked the orderly, and I approached the horse and stroked its mane.

"He's attracting the enemy's attention to the C.P.," the orderly shouted in surprise, shielding me with his body. "Take care, please."

"Ho, ho! They haven't got time to try to spot the C.P. They're already turning tail." In this way the horse came into the possession of the guerrilla army.

The men tried to describe the incident as something extraordinary, the strange story of an enemy horse coming over to our side.

"This animal can tell the difference between Koreans and Japanese," said a man who saw its identification tag and discovered it was born in Kyongwon (Saeppyo), Korea. "He came straight over to us because he recognized us as Koreans."

"The Japanese officer must have been cruel to his horse," another man remarked, as if seeking a more authentic motive for its action. "Otherwise, it wouldn't have come over as soon as its master fell."

On our way back to Macun from the battle, we gave the horse to an old Chinese man to use as a work animal. In Jiandao, horses and cattle were widely used as draught animals. A few days later, the old man came to us and returned the horse to us. He said that the horse's pasterns were too slender and weak for a draught horse. Worse still, he added, it was so wild that he could not even approach it or touch it, let alone tame it.

One of my comrades-in-arms said, "This horse is destined to be one of our company after all." My comrades advised me to take the horse, since I was suffering from an ache in my calf muscle. They even warned me that if I overtaxed the ailing leg in a guerrilla war that might last for years, I might lose the ability to stand on my feet. The ache in my calf muscle actually bothered me considerably whenever I was on the march. The problem probably came from doing too much walking since my childhood. When I was in Jirin I traveled by rail or bicycle now and then, but in Wangqing, which was under constant blockade, such luxury could not be expected. The painful leg was a great physical handicap to me in the life of the guerrilla zone, which required forced marches of dozens or even a hundred miles over steep mountains almost every day.

However, on this occasion also I declined to accept the advice of my comrades-in-arms. Then the comrades called a party meeting and adopted a decision to the effect that I should travel by horse from a certain date. The decision was tactfully worded so that the battalion commander, Yang Song Ryong, too, should ride a horse. Probably they anticipated that I would doggedly refuse if I was the only one to be mounted. I obeyed the decision of the organization. On the day when I first mounted the horse, my comrades surrounded me, clapping their hands in delight.

The horse's records said that it came from the Kyongwon war-horse replacement center. Sometimes the sleek horse appeared grayish, sometimes snow-white. His pasterns were as slender as those of a race-horse, and he ran as fast as a tiger. This horse carried me on his back to battlefields and sometimes through primeval forests for approximately two years, sharing every hardship with me. His image still rises out of my memory now and then, thrilling me with emotion.

My daily routine began with tending of the horse. I would rise early in the morning, pat him on the head and brush his coat with a broom. As I had had no experience of tending a horse, I did just as my grandfather in Mangyongdae had done when he tended a cow. The horse jerked away whenever the broom touched him. Once when I was struggling with the horse, old man Lee Chi Baek gave me a metal comb, and told me to comb the horse's back with it and see what would happen. I did as I was told, and the horse stood quiet with his hoofs stuck to the ground.

While saddling the horse one day, I discovered a pouch between the saddle-leather and the padding. The pouch contained a small notebook inscribed "Horse's Record," a metal comb, a brush, a piece of rug, and a pointed piece of steel. I could guess the use of all of the things except for the piece of steel shaped like a scalpel. I picked up the steel tool and approached the horse.

Now came the miracle. He lifted one leg high, as a circus horse might. This suggested some relationship between the tool and his hoof, but I could not pinpoint exactly what. He circled around me a few times, then approached a stake a little distance from me, and rested one of his forelegs on it. I found dirt, stone splinters, and pieces of straw stuck between his sole and shoe. I removed them from his hoof, and then he lifted another hoof on the stake and looked at me as if in invitation.

While I was learning from guess-work how to tend the horse, a man from a horse-breeding farm in the homeland came to visit a relation in Xiaowangqing. He taught me the skills of grooming and horsemanship before he left for home. A horse detested its body getting dirty and splinters of pottery and similar things getting stuck in its hoofs, he said, so that it should be washed with clean water twice every day, combed, brushed and oiled, and dirt and straw pieces regularly removed from its hoofs. He made a point of wiping the horse well when it had been sweating or had been exposed to the rain.

He also told me that hay and oats were essential food for horses, that barley and beans were also good, that horses must eat a little salt every day as human beings do, and that too much cold water was bad for them after heavy exercise. In the course of tending the horse as I had been instructed, I got to know him better. He was always obedient to me. I was surprised at the cleverness with which he understood from my glances and hand movements what he should do, and he never failed to serve me to my satisfaction. As I caught glimpses of his character and noticed actions that reminded me of their artistically perfect beauty of human qualities which would win universal admiration, I sometimes wondered if this was really an animal and not a human being.

While he was clever and faithful to me, the white horse was also fierce. He tolerated no one except his master touching him or sitting on him. If some tomfool took his tether out of curiosity and tried to mount him, he avoided him by walking in a circle or kicking or threatening to bite.

Jo Wal Nam was one of those who was given the cold shoulder by him. First he stood the horse by the veranda and then, after gently combing his side, jumped swiftly into the saddle. But the moment his buttocks touched the saddle, the horse shied off to one side and he fell to the ground with a thud. After this shameful defeat, the orderly hit upon a bright idea. He took the horse to soft ground, where his pasterns sank into the mud, and while he was grazing, he slid onto his back. He failed again. He was thrown into the mud.

Next the young orderly tied the horse to a tree and gave vent to his anger by whipping him. After the incident, the horse ran away or kicked at him whenever he approached. The orderly even cried in his exasperation. For all the efforts he had made to tame the animal, he could not even approach him, still less ride him. In the end he said he had to return to his company.

I said to him that the horse rejected him because he did not love him, and that, therefore, he should try to feel warmer devotion for him. I taught him how to tend the horse with great care. The orderly followed my advice, and the horse naturally obeyed him in proportion to his kindness. Time has obscured many details of my memories, but I can still picture a few events vividly.

Once I went to Luozigou to carry out political work among the people. O Paek Ryong and his platoon accompanied me. In those days, I used to sleep only two to three hours a day. The day's battle, training my men, and work among the people usually kept me awake until one or two o'clock in the morning, and sometimes right through the night. When our company reached the foot of the Jiapigou Pass, I dozed off on horseback. Perhaps I had stayed up all night at Macun or at Shiliping the previous night. As the white horse was marching at the head of the platoon, nobody noticed that I was dozing.

As we began climbing the pass, the horse's gait changed. The platoon leader O Paek Ryong noticed it. The horse was scaling the slope carefully with his forelegs drawn in, and pace of the march was so slow that the platoon leader was irritated.

"How strangely he is walking today, this horse which is like an English gentleman!" O Paek Ryong thought to himself.

On the down slope, too, the horse walked with difficulty, his hind legs drawn in. In the meantime, the column far out-marched me, leaving myself on horseback and O Paek Ryong behind. The platoon leader was impatient with the horse, and worried about me, but he dared not lash the horse on which his commander was riding. When he had climbed down the slope, the horse balked before a fallen tree on the Jiapigou Riverside. Seeing the horse, which normally leapt such fallen trees without any difficulty, hesitating before a small obstacle, O Paek Ryong grew even more suspicious.

"Why does the commander leave this lazy horse alone, without so much as shouting at him or spurring him on?" the platoon leader thought, looking up at me. Only then did he discover that I was dozing.

"What a fine show!" the platoon leader exclaimed aloud.

The horse's foreleg tapped on the fallen tree, and the sound woke me up.

"This white horse should be given a feast today," O Paek Ryong said, beaming with a broad smile and stroking the horse's nape. I felt a great change must have taken place in the universe while I was asleep.

"Why a feast all of a sudden?"

The platoon leader explained to me with great enthusiasm how the horse had climbed over the pass and how he behaved when faced with the fallen tree.

"My father said that in ancient times the best horse in the country was called the state horse, so what about calling him that from now on?" the platoon leader suggested.

"Why should we simply call him a state horse? Your story proves that he is more than worthy of being called the heavenly horse...."

"What does the heavenly horse mean?"

"It means the best horse under heaven."

"Then let us call him the heavenly horse. Brother Oh Jung Hwa once told me that in some country a high title was awarded to a horse."

"So I've heard. The emperor of that country conferred the title of political administrator on his pet horse. His horse ate from an ivory trough and drank wine from a gold cup, and enjoyed respect from everyone. Shall we give him the title of Ryonguijong (a feudal post corresponding to the modern post of prime minister)?"

"Anyway, this is a quite uncommon horse. He has no eyes in his back, how could he know that you were asleep?"

I spurred the horse, and he jumped over the fallen tree and rushed forward. We overtook the platoon in an instant and arrived at the vicinity of the valley of Sandaohezi, Luozigou, where rocky peaks soared high on both sides of a stream which teemed with trout. I drew a circle around the horse on the grass, and then coiled his tether around his neck. I gave the men their assignments for political work among the people at Sandaohezi, Sidahezi and Laomuzhuhe. After dispatching them to their various destinations, I met the political operatives and the workers in charge of underground organizations who had been waiting for me by the riverside. I talked to them for a long time.

When I returned to the horse after all this talk, I was surprised yet again, for the horse was grazing within the circle I had drawn. It was indeed a rare horse. The horse also helped to save the life of Hong Hye Song, a woman revolutionary. She had gone through high-school education in the homeland, worked underground along with progressive students and young people in Longjing, and then come to Wangqing which she regarded as the promised land, and was doing political work there.

Her father was a renowned doctor of traditional Koryo medicine. In the guerrilla zone, Hong Hye Song was able to draw on the medical expertise she had learnt from her father to give the guerrillas and the local inhabitants great help by treating scabies. This cheerful, sociable, courageous, and pretty woman political worker with a knowledge of Koryo medicine was warmly loved by the soldiers and people in the guerrilla zone.

One day I was riding on the horse, as I went with my orderly to the village of Xidapo in order to carry out political work among the villagers. When we were not far from the village, we heard a sudden gun shot. Suspecting an invasion by the "punitive" force, we hurried toward the place from which the sound had come. We found Hong Hye Song who was caught in an enemy ambush on her way back after her political work in villages and fighting against heavy odds. The enemy was shouting and threatening her with blank fire in an attempt to capture her alive.

I spurred my horse on towards her where on the brink of being taken prisoner, she was returning the enemy fire, and picked her up instantly. The horse, sensing my intention, shot off like an arrow and galloped for a couple of miles. Hong Hye Song was saved. After that the horse became an object of universal admiration to the people in the guerrilla zone.

If she had not been killed in the enemy's "punitive" action at Baicaogou, Hong Hye Song would now be gratefully sharing with me in my recollections of the white horse. I rode the horse to Liangshuiquanzi many times when I was building up a semi-guerrilla zone there. Our organizations were active in the villages of Nandadong, Beidadong, Shitouhezi and Kajaegol around Liangshuiquanzi and also in villages in the vicinity of Tumen, as well as in Luozigou, Sandaohezi, Sidahezi, Laomuzhuhe and Taipinggou.

If I say that I nearly gave up this wonderful war-horse, the reader will not believe me. It happened when, together with the men of O Paek Ryong's platoon, I was working among the people in the Gufang Mountains or a place nearby. Circumstances obliged me to decide to part with the horse. It was the time of the spring food-shortage, and the people were suffering from lack of food.

We attacked the enemy near that place on several occasions, capturing food and distributing it among the people. But the amount was too little to meet their need. We ourselves ate sparingly at each meal in order to save food grain for the people. In the circumstances, the horse's rations also had to be cut to the minimum. Even grain stalks to replace hay were scarce, to say nothing of oats, barley and beans, the nutritious feeds.

My loyal men spared no efforts to obtain feed for the horse. However difficult the situation, they worked hard to find oats and salt for the horse by going to neighboring villages and even visiting people in the enemy-held areas. Some of the men even went out to glean harvested fields. They threshed the gleanings and put the grain in their pockets to give to the horse when they came back. When they approached the horse, he would poke his nose into their pockets.

They took loving care of the horse for my sake. Their devoted efforts were an expression of revolutionary comradeship and loyalty to me.

I was thankful to them for their friendship and loyalty, but I felt very sad and uneasy. Whenever I saw them working with such great enthusiasm to obtain feed for the horse or care for it, I was haunted by the thought that I should no longer put them to such trouble simply for my sake. I was not used to accepting such services from other people. If anybody were to ask me when I felt most awkward during the years of the guerrilla war, I would answer that it was when I was treated unusually well by my men.

Whenever special benefits or privileges were offered to me, I felt sorry and guilty rather superior or self-satisfied, as if I were being put to the test.

Although the aching muscle in my calf was not cured and I would have to suffer for a few months longer, I made up my mind to give my pet horse to a peasant so as to relieve my men of this burden. If the horse was used as a draught animal in a semi-guerrilla zone, it would not be exposed to the dangers of the battlefield. I thought at first of giving it to the old man who had once been a servant and had given me his white horse, but I dismissed the idea for fear that he might feel embarrassed and upset.

I summoned the duty officer and told him to prepare a special noon meal for the horse even if it used up all the remaining feed.

"Feed the white horse with the best of the provisions today. Take him to the chairman of the Anti-Japanese Association of the village beyond the mountain in the afternoon. The remaining feed should be sent with the horse. Tell the chairman to give the horse to the poorest peasant who has no draught animal."

"Yes, sir," answered the duty officer, but he hesitated to leave.

"Go and do as you were told." I urged him sternly.

When the duty officer was gone, I thought things over, and regretted having given such cruel orders to send the white horse away I went out of the room to bid farewell to him. As usual, I combed him and brushed him all over and stroked his nape many times. As I looked back upon the thousands of miles I had traveled with the horse, I felt as if my heart were breaking.

Then I was surprised to see tears trickling from his eyes as they were fixed on me. It was really astonishing that he should have a premonition of parting. The horse had evidently read my mind from my look.

For the first time in my life I realized that even in the world of beasts slaved under the lash, there were beautiful emotions that would increase and enhance the beauty of the human world.

"Forgive me, my pet. Though I am sad, I must bid farewell to you. Though the pain of our parting is tearing me apart, I cannot afford the luxury of riding about on you any longer. All the sufferings and hardships you have gone through for my sake will live in my memory as long as I live," I thought, as I stood with my face buried in his neck for a long time. Back in my room, I felt lonely for the rest of the day and could do no work. I even wondered whether I had made a foolish decision out of too great concern for saving face. But it would be absurd to change the decision that was already made. I waited for the evening report from the duty officer, hoping that the white horse would be given to a hard-working and kindly man.

But the officer did not turn up at the appointed hour for the evening report. Instead, platoon leader O Paek Ryong brought me my evening meal as dusk was falling. Without any preliminaries, he simply begged me to forgive him.

"I have violated discipline, so punish me, please."

"Violated discipline?" I could not see what he meant.

"I have raided a lumber station, without obtaining your approval in advance."

He hastily explained why he had done it. The duty officer who received my orders in the morning, had gone to O Paek Ryong and told him about the orders, and that he would obey any orders from me except orders about the horse. He had asked him to discuss the matter. O Paek Ryong sympathized with him. He told the duty officer:

"Perhaps the commander gave the orders because he was sorry to see his men taking so much trouble over the horse. But how can we allow the horse to be taken away from our commander, when he is still suffering from the aching muscle in his calf? If we find plenty of feed and then beg him to withdraw his orders, he may reconsider the matter. You should keep the horse out of sight for a while, instead of sending it to the neighboring village. And I will go to the Qinhe lumber station to get feed. Don't tell the commander where I've gone." The lumber station was a little more than ten miles from Xiaowangqing. One of the foremen was an acquaintance of O Paek Ryong. They had probably got to know each other during the foreman's frequent visits to the guerrilla zone to fell trees.

The platoon leader went to the lumber station with a foraging party of several men. Saying that if he gave the feed to the guerrillas he might get into trouble, the foreman told the platoon leader to raid the lumber station instead.

Realizing that the foreman's suggestion was reasonable, O Paek Ryong arrested the sentry, then broke into the office where the other sentries and supervisors were gambling, and disarmed them instantly. The raiding party returned safely to base carrying with them four or five sacks of oats and beans.

I put aside my evening meal and went out of the room. The horse was in the stable, having been brought back from the hiding place.

He snorted, and nodded his head towards me as if in thanks.

I felt my nose tingle. I was glad to see the horse again. But how should I deal with the duty officer and O Paek Ryong who was reckless as a bear in Mt. Paektu and had plenty of guts, these men who had disobeyed their orders? How preposterous O Paek Ryong had been in thinking that his commander would withdraw his orders if plenty of feed was obtained, and how absurd ways his guts had led him to raid a lumber station! Though I was grateful to him, I was appalled at the thought of the catastrophe his recklessness might bring on us in the days to come, if it was not nipped in the bud.

The irony was that I, who never compromised with principle, could not assert principle at the moment. I brushed the horse lightly on the back, and, when I saw him nodding with tears in his eyes, I did not feel like rebuking the platoon leader for disobeying the orders. Moreover, his stubborn attitude made me disinclined to force him to send the horse away. "Comrade Commander, please punish me or demote me, but I hope you'll understand that the horse must not be sent away anywhere as long as I am alive."

Having pronounced his ultimatum, he snorted as if he just fought a major battle.

I suppressed the impulse to hug him and pat him on the back in a show of thanks. More than once had I been moved by the loyalty of this peerlessly courageous platoon leader who had not hesitated to plunge through fire and water for me. He had followed me and respected me as he would his own elder brother, saying that it was Kim Il Sung who taught him to read and write the Korean alphabet, and it was Kim Il Sung who had opened his eyes to the things of the world.

I had also loved him and cared lovingly for him as I would for my own brother. This platoon leader whom I myself had trained had now raided the lumber station at the risk of his own life in order to save the white horse for me.

But for all this, he had committed a gross violation of discipline by foraging without approval from his commander. If he was forgiven, he might commit even a graver mistake. What was to be done?

A commander needs to make a wise decision at such a moment.

"The soup is getting cold," he said worriedly looking down at the steaming bowl. "Please take your meal and punish me quickly."

I held back the hot tears in my eyes. I felt a lump in my throat at his staunch readiness to accept punishment.

When he was a member of the Children's Vanguard, O Paek Ryong had crossed to Onsong in the homeland with a matchlock pistol he himself had made, shot a policeman at the customs house and snatched a rifle from him. He had a audacious as that as a boy. He had experienced all the hardships of life; growing up in a family of seventeen, he had sympathized sincerely and passionately with suffering people from his childhood. For this he was loved by all his comrades.

From his days in the Children's Vanguard, he was eager to join the guerrilla army. His antics included an episode involving empty cartridges: He once heard that an applicant for the guerrilla army needed a trustworthy reference or a rifle the applicant himself had captured from the enemy, or at the very least a stick grenade as a substitute for a reference. So he went to a battlefield where fire had just been exchanged. He tied the bottoms of his trousers with string, and then he held the waist of his trousers open with one hand while he gathered cartridges, live and empty, with the other hand and filled the legs of the trousers with them. Then, he came to the guerrilla army base, sweating all over. As he untied the legs of his trousers, nearly a gallon of cartridges poured out.

"How about that?" he said, looking elatedly at the company commander. "Is this enough for me to be accepted?"

Instead of the answer he expected from the company commander, he saw the guerrillas burst into roars of laughter.

"Look here, Paek Ryong!" the company commander said, laughing. "What did you bring these empty cartridges for? They've already been used."

O Paek Ryong had thought that the empty cartridges could kill the enemy. When he realized his mistake, he sorted the live cartridges from the useless ones. The number came to hundreds.

So, the cartridges did serve as a reliable reference for him to join the guerrilla army. Since enlisting he had fought courageously to take vengeance on the Japanese "punitive" troops for the deaths of his parents and brothers. As a raw recruit, he had many distressing experience. Once, while cleaning his rifle, he had let off an accidental shot and been punished for it.

The political instructor who punished him was an enemy spy. He had got himself promoted to company political instructor by worming his way into the confidence of factionalists who held important posts in the east Manchuria ad hoc committee and the county party committee, and was doing everything possible to undermine the guerrilla army.

The punishment he meted out to O Paek Ryong for the accidental shot was brutal and barbarous in terms of the code of discipline and morals of the revolutionary army. As punishment he sent O Paek Ryong to the walled town of Mudan, where a company of the puppet Manchukuo army was stationed, with orders to take down and bring back the Manchukuo flag flying in the center of the town. The orders, in fact, were intended to get him killed during this adventure in the enemy's den. His comrades-in--arms had all been worried that he would never return alive.

O Paek Ryong, however, went off to the town, which was 25 miles away from his company, and came back safely with the flag. After that the spy in the guise of political instructor watched for a chance to do away with O Paek Ryong. He even went so far as to start an argument with the men who ate their rice in water. He preached that soldiers should eat solid food, without soup. Once the company butchered a cow. The men, tired of eating "dry food," were delighted at the thought of eating their fill of beef soup that evening.

That evening, however, the dastardly political instructor had appeared again and said that if the men ate beef soup when they were not used to it, they would have loose bowels, and ordered them to eat only rice and meat, not the soup. So the men were denied the chance of eating the soup which they had been looking forward to.

Only O Paek Ryong and one other man disobeyed the orders and ate the soup. The wife of O Paek Ryong's second eldest brother, who was a cook, brought them the soup in secret. As bad luck would have it, O Paek Ryong was caught by the political instructor in the act of eating the soup behind a stack of firewood in the yard of the barracks. This incident gave the spy a pretext for labeling him a "Minsaengdan" member. Had it not been for the references given by his comrades-in-arms, O Paek Ryong would have been executed on the false charge of belonging to the "Minsaengdan."

The spy's identity was later discovered and he was executed by O Paek Ryong. O Paek Ryong had virtually been condemned to death penalty and it still rankled in his mind. If he was subjected to another penalty, wouldn't it leave an even worse scar? "Comrade O, I am grateful to you for taking the risk of raiding the enemy camp for the sake of the white horse. But your breach of discipline is a grave error that must not be repeated by a commanding officer. This sort of thing must not recur. As I understand your feelings, I will not send away the white horse. Well, are you satisfied?"

"Yes, I am satisfied," the platoon leader replied with a grin on his face. Then he scampered off to his quarters like a child.

I settled his case with these few words of remonstrance. In the years that followed, the white horse served me as faithfully as ever. I still remember an event that took place when the battle to defend Xiaowangqing was raging. At that time the enemy was invading Hwanggarigol at the end of the valley of Lishugou and killing the people in the guerrilla zone. The mountains and fields were littered with dead bodies, and the houses were reduced to ashes.

I spent every day galloping about on my horse, commanding my men in the battle, in the thick of the fire. One day I organized the defenses on Mt. Ppyojok, the next day I halted the charging enemy on Mapanshan, and the next day I provided covering fire for the evacuees from the hill behind Lishugou. In the course of this whirlwind of battle, I went through many hair-raising incidents.

In the barrage of fire, even the fur lining of my overcoat caught fire. The flames could have enveloped me in an instant, but I did not notice it. As my horse was galloping against the wind, the flames on the skirt of my coat flew out behind me. It was only when the horse began to run with the wind that I discovered the flames on my coat. I had no time to pull it off, and if I jumped from the rushing horse, I might collide with a rock and kill or seriously injure myself.

At this critical moment, the horse slowed down in front of a snow-covered depression and then slid into it sideways, with his forelegs folded in. I stumbled into the snow, and the fire on my coat was put out as I rolled over in it. The horse's two legs were bleeding. Had it not been for the horse, I would have suffered fatal burns and not survived to tell the tale.

I marveled at the horse's seemingly supernatural powers. How could he sense that I was in a fire? It still remains a mystery to me. His unusual clarity of judgment might be attributed to animal instincts, but to what can one attribute his loyal devotion, the self-sacrificing devotion which led him to save his master, while injuring his own legs? The expression says "a faithful dog and a pet horse," but I would rather change the word order and say "a faithful horse and a pet dog."

The white horse became a legend, beloved of all the people in the guerrilla zone. The story of the horse spread to the semi-guerrilla zones around Xiaowangqing and even to the enemy-ruled areas. Wu Yicheng, too, heard the story and coveted the horse.

"Commander Kim, wouldn't you exchange your white horse for fifty war-horses?" he asked when I was at Luozigou negotiating with him for the formation of a common front with the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist forces. I do not remember what I said to him in reply. I only remember that I returned to Macun on the same horse after the negotiations.

The white horse that had carried me over thousands of miles of wet and dry trails for nearly two years, with his shoes changed only occasionally, died at Xiaowangqing in the winter of 1934. When I returned from the first expedition to north Manchuria, I found the stable empty. They led me to the horse's solitary grave, where the earth had been mounded up by my comrades-in-arms. I did not know how to express the depth of my sorrow.

Seeing how grieved I was, my men suggested firing gun salutes to the horse. But I declined, asking what was the use of a gun salute, for the horse had lived among the roar of guns all his life, so he should be allowed some peace at least in his grave. The grave is somewhere in Wangqing.

One day in the early 1960s, when O Paek Ryong was the head of the General Bureau of Guards, he and I went for a casual ride, and we reminisced about the white horse. Even though several decades had passed, the former leader of a guerrilla platoon could recall every detail of the horse's story.

Somehow the story became known to writers, Song Yong and Lee Ki Yong. An officer is said to have asked them to write about the white horse, but I am not sure how the matter came up and how it was settled.

The white horse that was born of the flames of the war against the Japanese and lived through fire all his life appeared on a small piece of canvas in the Korean Revolution Museum. The legendary anecdote of the white horse came to the attention of the artist Jong Kwan Chol perhaps through Lee KA Yong or Song Yong. Jong Kwan Chol painted the subject in oils. I discovered the picture when I visited the museum at the suggestion of O Paek Ryong. It depicted me and the white horse.

The canvas reminded me of the orderlies and O Paek Ryong, who had shared the horse's loyalty to me. I suggested that it would have been even better if these comrades had been shown together, and the artist changed the picture, following my advice, to include two orderlies. That is the picture now on exhibition in the museum.

Whenever I missed those loyal orderlies and the white horse, I used to go to see them in the museum.

Nowadays, at the age of eighty, I occasionally picture them only in my memory. The image of my faithful white horse still moves as vividly before my eyes as he did sixty years ago. If he had been a human being he would have won higher commendation than the most loyal of men.

8.1. Lee Kwang

---

I made friends with Lee Kwang in Jirin. One day Kim Jun and his company from the General Federation of Korean Youth in East Manchuria brought a young man to me and introduced him. He was Lee Kwang.

Our comrades had assumed from his appearance in Jirin that he had come either to study, to get in touch with an organization, or to learn how the student and youth movement was progressing. Kim Jun hinted to me that Lee Kwang seemed to have come to Jirin to attend a secret provincial meeting of teachers.

My first impression of Lee Kwang was that he appeared intelligent and magnanimous, but reticent. In the course of repeated contacts thereafter I learned that he was indeed a young man of exceptional sensitivity, with a kind heart and the ability to form strong friendships.

My comrades were charmed when they met Lee Kwang, and they tried to persuade him to settle in Jirin, even suggesting to him that the Wenguang Middle School would be good for developing his knowledge, that the Law College would give him an ideal start in life, and that the Yuwen Middle School would be best for a man who wished to become a revolutionary.

Lee Kwang himself did not wish to leave Jirin. He said that, in his primary school days at Guchengzi, Yanji County, he had visited Jirin several times on errands for leaders of the Independence Army, that the life of the young people and students had now changed beyond recognition, and that the city was now buzzing with the social campaigns organized by students, whereas in previous years the young people had been so lethargic that their campaign had gone almost unnoticed. So Lee Kwang stayed and attended Middle School No. 5 in Jirin for some time.

In his early days Lee Kwang had been influenced mostly by the Korean Independence Army leaders, such as Hong Bom Do, Kim Jwa Jin, Hwang Pyong Gil and Choe Myong Rok. The headquarters of an Independence Army unit had been billeted on his wife's parents' house at Guchengzi for a long time, so he had met many leaders of the nationalist movement. Lee Kwang was sharp-eyed, quick-witted and modest and he attracted the attention of the Independence Army leaders. They seemed to have tried to make him heir to the cause of the Independence Army, just as O Tong Jin and Lee Ung had tried to make me their successor.

During his boyhood Lee Kwang had learned Chinese characters at the village school which was run by his mother's father. As his father's health was poor, he had given up the idea of going to secondary school, and at the age of 14, he began to help his father support the family. At the tender age of 16 he began to manage the household affairs as effective head of the family, and his modern schooling was therefore delayed. After graduating from school he taught at primary schools in Yanji and Wangqing for some time.

Until that time he had been known by his real name Lee Myong Chun. But from the time he started teaching at Beihamatang in Chunhua Sub-county he was known by the nickname Lee Kwang. In those days eight schools at Beihamatang and its neighborhood used to hold joint debating contests and athletic meets as part of the enlightenment movement, and RI Kwang who was working underground, used to compete for the football team of Hamatang, using his nickname. From that time onwards everybody called him Lee Kwang.

"It was the Independence Army that guided me to nationalism and it was the independence movement that led me to communism," he said to me when we first met, recollecting the days in Guchengzi. His words sounded very strange to me.

"How could that be, did the old men of the Independence Army teach you two thoughts at a time?"

"No, I wasn't exactly taught. How can I explain? I should really say that they influenced me, and there were both nationalist and Marxist-Leninist influences."

"The old men must have been double-dealers?"

"I would say they were seeking a shift of direction, rather than double-dealing. While leading the Independence Army movement, they read communist books in secret. When I visited the house of my wife's parents, I saw in a corner of a room lots of the books the old men were reading. So I began to read them, too, to kill time - but now I simply enjoy reading them."

I squeezed Lee Kwang's hand, and said. "I am glad to meet a man who espouses communism."

Lee Kwang waved his hand in a hasty gesture, saying:

"No. I am not yet a communist. There are quite a few concepts I cannot understand among the communist principles advanced by Marx and Lenin. To my simple eyes, the communist ideal appears somehow too fantastic. You may feel sorry to hear this, Comrade Sung Ju, but I hope you will understand that I am speaking frankly."

I liked his candidness during our first conversation. It was this, more than anything else, which attracted me to him.

At the time Lee Kwang was neither a nationalist nor a communist. In short, he was in the process of changing his direction. In the course of his association with us in Jirin he became a communist, but he did not join the Young Communist League or Anti-Imperialist Youth League which we had organized.

An informed source states that when he was coming to Jirin, Lee Kwang mortgaged some of his school's ten hectares or so of land for 400 yuan for travel expenses, but I am not sure this story is authentic. The school lands had been allocated by the state for the running of educational institutions. So if it is true that he took the risk of mortgaging such public property, he must have been very ambitious. In a letter to his brother-in-law which he sent after he left home, he is said to have expressed the following grim resolve:

"I think I must find a true patriot even if I have to comb the whole of Manchuria and the Korean peninsula. It may take me ten years or twenty years to do this. However, I pledge myself not to return to my paternal home until I succeed."

His determination gives us a glimpse of his character, and explains why he left his home and traveled round all the major cities and political centers of Manchuria.

Lee Kwang was honest, meticulous and resourceful. He spoke Chinese as fluently as a northeastern Chinese. Therefore, he was competent to perform the job of a headman of ten households, a hundred households, or even of a sub-county in the later days.

It was from him that I, who come from a northwestern province of Korea, learned the customs of Jiandao and Hamgyong Province.

While in Jirin, for some unknown reasons Lee Kwang did not wish to join us in the organizational life. He was probably in the mood of a traveler who was only stopping over at Jirin. However, he frequently kept company with me. Later, through me, he became a close friend of my mother.

He met my mother when he was returning to Jiandao after studying in Jirin. Before his departure he came to see me and as he took his farewell, he casually said:

"Sung Ju, when I return to Jiandao I wish to drop in at Fusong to see your mother. Do you mind?"

"No. It isn't like you, Lee Kwang, to ask about such a thing. If you want to see her, you should go to see her. Why should you need my permission?" I was grateful to him for his suggestion.

"So you agree. Good! I will see your mother as I have decided to. Everyone follows your mother's lead and calls her 'our mother,' but I haven't even made a courtesy call on her. How impolite I have been! Why should she be mother only to Kim Hyok and Kye Yong Chun, and not to me?"

"Thank you, Lee Kwang! Now my mother will have another son. From today we are brothers." "Then, we should drink a toast together, or at least make a visit to the noodle shop together, shouldn't we?"

Needless to say, we did both.

He paid a visit to my mother at Fusong, spending a few days in her company, before going to Wangqing. In those days his family was living in Wangqing County, not at Yilangou in Yanji County.

After Lee Kwang left Fusong, mother sent me a letter, telling me a lot about him. The letter said:

"Sung Ju, Lee Kwang left today for Jiandao. I saw him off at the ferry on the River Songhua. I feel so lonely, just as I did when I said goodbye to you, that I don't feel like working today. He is so affable! Strange to say, I feel as if he were one of my own sons. He himself said that he felt as if I were his own mother. My heart overflows as I think of taking more and more sturdy boys under my wing as the days pass by. Can there be any greater pleasure than this in the world? You have introduced a really fine boy to me. He took Chol Ju with him to Yangdicun, paid obeisance at father's grave and cropped the weeds on the mound. Many of your friends have been to my home, and I know many young men, but this is the first time I have met such a lovable boy as Lee Kwang. I hope your friendship will thrive like the green pines on the southern hill."

On the day I received the letter I walked in buoyant mood on the bank of the River Songhua all day long. The joy my mother expressed in every line of the letter affected me greatly. If she was happy, I was happy; and if she was satisfied, I was satisfied. If meeting Lee Kwang gave her such great satisfaction, I was equally delighted.

After Lee Kwang left Jirin, I received a money order from the post office.

Many people assisted me financially while I attended the Yuwen Middle School in Jirin, as I have mentioned on various occasions. Those who gave me money for my school expenses were mostly my father's friends such as O Tong un, Son Jung Doh, Yang Se Bong, Jang Chol Ho and Hyon Muk Gwan, who lived in Jirin or came frequently to report to the headquarters of the iongui-bu from the bases of the independence Army, for instance, from Liuhe, Xingjing, Fusong and Huadian.

My patrons in my Jirin days included members of the Young Communist League and the Ryugil Association of Korean Students in Jirin. Sin Yong Gun, who was working as an activist of the Young Communist League while attending the Wenguang Middle School, also contributed to my school expenses, though he was far from rich.

As I have already mentioned, in those days my mother earned only five to ten fen a day by taking in sewing. If she earned ten fen a day on average, her monthly earning was three yuan, which was just enough to pay my monthly school fees at the Yuwen Middle School. She did not send me the school expenses by post, in order to save the cost of postage. She used to save her daily earnings until she had enough for the monthly school fees and then send them with someone she knew traveling to Jirin. This saved me the trouble of calling at the post office.

I used to accept the money from my mother with mixed feelings. There was a feeling of relief at not having to worry about being disgraced by failing to pay my school fees; but there was also a feeling of concern for my family, who would have to get by without any money.

In fact, three yuan was a trifling amount, scarcely enough for a rich man's son to buy himself lunch. Most of the students at the Yuwen Middle School came from rich families. Sometimes scores of money orders, which we called "slips," would arrive for the rich men's sons at school in a single day. On these occasions the children of poor people like myself, who scarcely knew what a money order looked like, went about in low spirits. In this context, the arrival of ten yuan for me, one of the poor students, was a great event.

As I took the money order to the post office, I tried to guess who might have sent it. But I could not think of any relations or acquaintances who could send me so much money at one time. The only person who might send money to me at Jirin was my mother, but it would be impossible for her to send so much. I thought the money might have come to the wrong person because of a mistake by the clerk at the post office, but such a mistake seemed very unlikely.

If a person who received a money order could not name the sender at the post office, the clerk could refuse to pay. On that day, however, the clerk paid without even asking me the sender's name. Instead, I asked the clerk who had sent the order. "It is from Lee Kwang!" the voice behind the partition replied. I was surprised: I had many closer friends than Lee Kwang, even though we had become close friends by the time he left Jirin. I had never imagined that he would send me money.

I was deeply moved by his generosity.

While he was in Wangqing, Lee Kwang frequently visited my home, bringing many packages of medicine and money for my mother who was living at Xinglongcun, Antu County. The money was his monthly savings from his wages as the headman of a hundred households. He was extremely kind-hearted and charitable to the needy.

He used to stay at my mother's for several days, helping her around the house, and then returning to Wangqing. He became a welcome regular visitor to my family.

Whenever I received financial support I regretted my inability to return the kindness. My family was too poor to pay the money back. I resolved to repay my friends and colleagues by becoming a loyal son of the country and a faithful servant of my fellow people.

In the winter of 1929, Lee Kwang took a train from Dunhua to Jirin in order to visit me. I was in prison at the time. He had timed his journey badly.

Instead of meeting me, he made the acquaintance of Kong Suk Ta, a waitress at the inn where he was lodging, and from her he learned the details of the youth and student movement in Jirin, including the way in which the leaders were guiding the movement. While assuming the guise of a waitress, Kong Suk Ja, on assignment from the Young Communist League, maintained a liaison between us and the young men who came to Jirin to visit us. She later became Lee Kwang's second wife as a result of their acquaintance at the inn. His first wife, Kim Orinnyo, died of illness.

Lee Kwang was determined not to marry again, so deep was his grief over his wife's death. He believed that no woman would make a better wife than her because they had been devoted to each other. Within a year of her death, many women had offered him their hands, but he would not even glance at them.

Whenever we met him, his friends and I tried to persuade Lee Kwang to get married, at least for the sake of his infirm parents and his little son. Dissuading him from his resolution proved more difficult than pressing resin from dry wood. It was only after three years of mourning for Kim Orinnyo that he accepted my advice. His second wife Kong Suk Ja was good-natured, wise and virtuous. She raised the orphaned child with such great care that she won everyone's admiration. The child, too, regarded her as his own mother. Unfortunately, Kong Suk Ta had no children of her own.

Although he could not meet me when I was in prison, with the help of Kong Suk Ta Lee Kwang made close friends with young people attending the Yuwen Middle School and the Normal School in Jirin who were committed to the movement. The Jirin organization convinced Lee Kwang that all the patriotic forces must first be united in the cause of national independence, and that in order to unite the patriotic forces there must be an idea and a line which would serve as their common banner, as well as a centre of unity and cohesion. He returned to Jiandao convinced of this.

Lee Kwang's stay in Jirin was a turning-point in his revolutionary activity. As a result he was put under surveillance by the secret agents of the Japanese consulate and the Manchurian police, but he was never afraid of them and continued courageously along his new course of action.

The autumn and spring struggles were important events which proved the correctness of the lessons he had learned in Jirin. His world-view made a leap to still greater heights as a result of these struggles.

After he moved to Wangqing, Lee Kwang worked as the sub-county head at Beihamatang. The fact that a man who had declared his commitment to the great cause of revolution and regarded it as his exclusive ideal, was appointed as an official at the lowest rung of the enemy's administrative hierarchy was an event worthy of considerable interest.

I met Lee Kwang again at Mingyuegou in December 1931.

At that time he was occupied with providing bed and board for the representatives to the meeting at Mingyuegou that winter. When I saw him appear at the meeting place with a knapsack full of foxtail millet and with five pheasants hanging over his shoulders, I was moved to admiration, and thought that he was a man worthy of his name. The starch noodles, a specialty of Jiandao, with a sauce of minced pheasant and chicken were so delicious that we could not resist the temptation of asking for a second helping. After Lee Kwang and I each ate two bowls of noodles at the same table, we lay in the front room of Lee Chong San's house with wooden pillows under our heads, talking through the night.

First of all, I thanked him heartily for helping my mother in her household affairs and also for sending me money for my school expenses.

"While I was eating the noodles tonight, I thought a lot. The efforts you put into preparing the meat sauce moved me to tears. While I was studying in Jirin you often took me to restaurants. I don't know how I can repay your kindness...." When he heard me say this, he tapped me on my shoulder.

"Don't mention it. I have helped your family out of my desire to contribute to the independence movement to which your father dedicated his whole life. How hard you have been working directing the youth and student movement! It's only natural to contribute a little money to such a patriotic family as yours.... Don't mention it again."

He pretended to be angry, and gestured threateningly at me with his hand.

This made me keenly aware of another aspect of his beautiful character.

"Lee Kwang, don't be too modest. Kindness should be repaid. I must thank you again, and also on my mother's behalf. Frankly, I had no idea you would give us such wholehearted support." "I didn't suppose you would. But Sung Ju, I have my reasons for doing it."

"What are your reasons?"

"One day your mother told me how she was married to your father, as if it were an old folk tale. She said that arranging the marriage had been by no means easy.

"I know that. My two brothers and I heard about it from my mother after her husband passed away. It was a really tearful story."

This story takes us back to the years before the "annexation of Korea by Japan." A distance of about two miles lay between my mother's home at Chilgol and father's home at Namri, with a low hill standing between the two villages. Travelers from Namri to Pyongyang had to go by way of Chilgol. And those from Chilgol to Nampho had to pass by Namri. The people of the two villages were on good terms and visited each other frequently. This led to many of them being related by marriage.

My maternal grandfather was looking for a suitable person for a son-in-law from Namri and the first young man that attracted the old man's interest was none other than my father. When a matchmaker had begun to come and go between the two houses, mother's father came first to my father's house at Namri to see him. However, he returned to Chilgol undecided, because the young man's family was living in dire poverty, although he thought the young man himself was acceptable. If his daughter was married to such a poor family she would have to suffer hardship all her life, the old man thought. But even after that he visited my father as many as five times.

My father's family, being destitute, were not able to serve a proper lunch to this person who might become an in-law, on any of his six visits.

Only after the sixth visit did my mother's father consult with his wife and send a letter agreeing to the engagement.

"Sung Ju, this story has given me a better understanding of your family. You will be surprised if I tell you that I knew of the crab incident, won't you?"

I was, indeed, surprised to hear Lee Kwang mention the crab affair. This was an old family event of which only a few members including mother, grandfather Po Hyon, and I myself knew. "Oh! How do you know about that?"

"Surely you can guess how close I have become with your family members, can't you?" Lee Kwang pretended to be elated at seeing me so surprised.

At the age of six or seven, during the childhood days I spent at Mangyongdae, I began catching crabs. My grandfather used to catch a lot of crabs to eke out a poor living. The Sunhwa River, a tributary of the Taedong River, was teeming with crabs, and whenever he went catching crabs, grandfather always took me with him. Perhaps he wanted to teach me the skills needed to eke out a living from childhood. Although they were despised by rich people, to us these crabs were delicious when they were salted.

Crab catching was a quite simple and monotonous task. You just needed to lower well-boiled ears of sorghum into the water and then pull them out some time later; we found clusters of crabs clinging to the ears. We used to catch scores or hundreds of them a day, and no words could tell how happy we were as we returned home carrying the catch in mesh bags.

The crabs improved our meals a lot. Whenever we had a guest, my grandmother would take salted crabs out of a jar to serve the visitor. On such occasions I used to think how good it would be if we could serve them to my mother's parents. For me my mother's maiden home in Chilgol was a mysterious world, a focus of infinite love and sympathy. I liked the homely smell of the boiled cattle fodder steaming in the stable, and I loved to hear the twittering of the birds on the branches of the jujube trees in the garden. I also was fascinated by the old tales that were told on the straw mats, as I sniffed at the scented smoke of the moxa, burning to keep away mosquitoes on summer nights.

My mother's sister would tell me not to forget Chilgol because I was born there. Perhaps my mother spent some time at her maiden home before she gave birth to me. But my grandparents always said that my birthplace was Namri. They said that my mother stayed for several days at her parents' home at about the time I was born, but that was no reason for me to be known as a boy from Chilgol. A woman might give birth to a baby away from home, they said, but according to ancestral law the home of the child's father should be considered to be its birthplace.

In any case, I liked my mother's maiden home as much as my father's home, and I felt this very strongly when I was catching crabs.

When I was studying at the Changdok School at Chilgol, I would return to Mangyongdae on Sundays to go crab catching with my grandfather. One day I hid half of the catch in a nearby bush before I showed the mesh bag to grandfather. He was saddened by the small catch, but I pretended not to hear his expressions of regret.

Of course, I should have told him the truth, that I had put aside half the catch for my mother's side of the family. But I was not sure whether he would like it or not, so I hesitated. After I took the mesh bag home for him, I went to the Sunhwa River again and took the other half of the catch to Chilgol. My maternal relations were glad to see the crabs, and thanked me for the present. I told them that thanks were due to grandpa Po Hyon, who had caught the crabs.

One day my maternal grandfather came to Mangyongdae and thanked grandpa Po Hyon for the crabs, which he said were delicious.

At first grandpa Po Hyon was embarrassed by the unexpected thanks, but when he heard the whole truth he was pleased.

Later he praised me for being a very considerate boy.

This was the incident mentioned by Lee Kwang, an anecdote of poverty and a drama of kindness.

However, Lee Kwang seemed to have interpreted this story in a different light, not as an act of kindness.

"After I heard the stories of the marriage and the crabs, I began to feel sympathy for your family," Lee Kwang said.

I was deeply moved by his consideration.

"Lee Kwang, how do you like the job of sub-county head?"

I had wanted to know this ever since I had come to central Manchuria. A report from the political workers in the Jiandao area, whom I had sent to east Manchuria, said that Lee Kwang, in whom I was most interested, had been working as a sub-county head in Wangqing. He smiled at my question.

"It is irksome, but I've done quite well at it. Last autumn some of our comrades were held in custody at Hamatang by the defense corps, but they were released when I gave them a reference. The authority of a sub-county head seems to have been effective." He said jokingly that if he were allowed, he would like to be a sub-county head all his life.

I talked proudly about my home village, and Lee Kwang joked.

"If Mangyongdae is such a beautiful place, I will follow you there with my family after the country becomes independent."

"Not to Jongsong? I heard that you come from Jongsong."

"I can make myself at home anywhere so long as I feel attached to a place, even though I was not born there. Anyway, if I do go there, please help me to find a place where I can teach primary schoolchildren. You'll be a schoolmaster and I will work under you as a teacher."

"Oh, my! I hate teaching at primary school...."

"Oh, really! I heard that you taught at Antu or Guyushu. And your father was a teacher for many years, I heard."

Our friendship grew deeper when we were organizing the special detachment.

Immediately after he organized a special detachment at Wangqing on our advice, Lee Kwang came to Xiaoshahe to see me. The hostile activities of the national salvation army against Korean communists and young patriots were a great obstacle to the efforts of our comrades in Wangqing to prepare for the founding of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Even after he had organized a special detachment, Lee Kwang was still left in suspense, unable to decide the future direction of his activities.

At that time I told him about my views on matters of principle and the means of forming a united front with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units, and I discussed about the goals and methods of the special detachment's activities with him in detail. He accepted my proposals with an open mind.

Foxtail millet mixed with sorghum, bean paste soup, and dry wild vegetables were the only food that my mother could afford at that period, but she still accorded him cordial hospitality. And he respected my mother greatly, too. Mother's warm love moved him and his youthful enthusiasm and his simple and honest mind were a comfort to my mother.

It was while Lee Kwang was staying at Xinglongcun that we founded the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army. Though she was ill, my mother came with Chol Ju to see the guerrilla army. Stroking the rifle which Lee Kwang was shouldering, she said; "With these weapons you can fight in real earnest now. How can the Independence Army fight the Japanese with outmoded weapons? Now as I see your army and the weapons on your shoulders, I feel as if my life-long grievances had been resolved. How glad your mothers would be to see you as you are now! Mothers' hearts are broken and they weep if their sons act like fools or behave badly, but they would be delighted and moved to tears if they could see their sturdy sons under arms ready to fight for their country."

Back at Wangqing, Lee Kwang worked hard with the national salvation army.

Our success in achieving cooperation with Commander Yu at Antu provided valuable experience in work with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units. At first this work went comparatively smoothly and successfully.

Many of these anti-Japanese units were enthusiastic about forming an anti-imperialist united front with us.

We communists took the initiative in forming the united front.

However, the Leftist elements obstructed this work. Their adventurism motto "Down with the upper stratum and win over the rank and file!" was a provocation to the higher echelons of the anti-Japanese units, leading to bitter resistance and resentment, and many of the commanders of these units began to take measures against the communists, repressing or even killing them.

It was something to be wholeheartedly welcomed in this situation that Lee Kwang started working among the anti-Japanese units.

In order to work with these units, Lee Kwang moved from Beihamatang to Taipinggou. In those days I often visited his house at Taipinggou. The village of Taipingcun, with about three hundred peasant households, was located at the geographical centre of a delta connecting Xiaowangqing, Yaoyinggou, and Laoheishan. It was not far from the Soviet-Manchurian border. From this village it was about six miles to Luozigou. All of the major assembly areas of the national salvation army units were located near Taipinggou. Lee Kwang's special detachment was at Jianchanggou, a little more than one mile from the town of Luozigou.

His house was perched on the sloping river-bank, isolated from the village of Taipinggou. There was an imposing well with a large water dipper by the house, which was known as the house with a dipper. I drank from this well on several occasions. When we appeared in front of the house on hot summer days, streaming with sweat, Lee Kwang used to fetch a bucketful of cool water from the well and offer the water to me. The water was most refreshing.

Whenever I went to Luozigou, I used to drop in at Taipinggou to inquire after his parents. At this house, together with Chinese communists such as Zhou Bao-zhong, Chen Han-zhang, Hu Jin-min and Wang Run-cheng, we held the last meeting of the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee which discussed the question of a united front with the national salvation army. In the battle in defence of Xiaowangqing and many other large and small battles, Lee Kwang demonstrated distinct ability and capacity as a commander. The practical example he set influenced the soldiers of the national salvation army, and he became renowned as a military and political worker among the broad masses of east Manchuria.

Wu Yi-cheng, who regarded Lee Kwang's special detachment as a genuinely anti-Manchukuo and anti-Japanese armed force, appointed him commanding officer of the security squad under the forward headquarters of the national salvation army, and even gave him bodyguards.

After that Lee Kwang established contact with Tong Shan-hao in order to develop further cooperation with the national salvation army against the Japanese.

Though he had taken up arms to fight the Japanese, Tong Shan-hao had degenerated into a bandit. In those days, many people identified the bandits with the mounted rebels as, indeed, they still do.

There had been many mounted rebels in Manchuria. When a large number of people of the Han nationality flowed into Manchuria through Shanhaiguan from China proper in the closing years of the Qing dynasty, the Manchurian people began arming in self-defense to protect their farmland and their ancestral heritage from the plundering immigrants. This was the origin of Manchuria's righteous rebels, whom the Japanese called mounted rebels.

Unlike the scattered bands of sordid highwaymen, the mounted rebels regarded themselves as just soldiers, acting in accordance with their own code of conduct and refraining from plundering people's property. The mounted rebels' society was an insurgent society, far removed from the central political authorities.

The life of the mounted rebels was inconceivable without arms. They had lived by carrying arms for a long time, and such a life inspired feelings of envy and admiration. The people in Manchuria would say openly, "Going on the streets is for women and rebelling against the authorities is for men."

Naturally, the rebels did not always in fact abide by their own strict code of conduct. Many mounted rebels degenerated into bandits in the course of their outlaw existence. There were many groups of mounted troops, which were difficult to identify as either righteous rebels or mere bandits. Many bandits behaved as if they were righteous rebels. Groups of bandits in the guise of righteous rebels accepted political bribes from imperialist aggressors and warlords, murdering people and committing atrocities beyond all imagination.

When many commanders of the national salvation army became indignant and hostile to the communists because the Leftist tactics of "down with the upper stratum" were applied in work with Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units, the strategists of Japanese imperialism understood this fact very quickly and used it to sow discord among the anti-Japanese forces. They were skilled in the notorious method of getting the anti-Japanese forces to fight among themselves, sniping at and destroying each other.

The Japanese imperialists employed this method when they urged Tong Shan-hao to massacre all the members of Lee Kwang's special detachment.

At first, they tried to get him to surrender. They put up notices everywhere stating that the person who captured Lee Kwang would be rewarded with lots of money, and that if Lee Kwang himself surrendered he would receive an important appointment. In their judgment, in order to disband Wu Yi-cheng's army it was imperative to check the influence of the communists on it, and Lee Kwang was the man who wielded that influence. Lee Kwang's special detachment was regarded as a united-front shock force operating in the heart of the national salvation army.

Thus the Japanese intelligence service was aware of his true significance and role. Tong Shan-hao, the worst of the bandits, was politically an obtuse, brutal and capricious man, and was easily bribed by the Japanese strategists. Knowing the views Lee Kwang supported, he baited a trap by proposing negotiations for a joint operation at Laoheishan, in accordance with a script prepared by the Japanese imperialists.

Lee Kwang made the mistake of taking the bait. Not knowing that Tong Shan-hao had become a running dog of Japanese imperialism, he set out for Laoheishan with more than ten members of his special detachment, including Wang Cheng-fu, the chief secretary of the forward headquarters of the national salvation army. The party organization warned him against the danger of dealing with a blind and brutal bandit commander. Lee Kwang, however, insisted on going to negotiate, even at the risk of his life, saying that if the line of the anti-imperialist united front was not implemented, it would be impossible for the revolution to advance any further.

Tong Shan-hao held a banquet for Lee Kwang's party and then massacred all of them except one, who narrowly escaped death. When the bandits fled, they left him at the site of the massacre, thinking he was dead like the others. When we got there we saved him. But he, too, died in battle later, in the woods between Luozigou and Laoheishan.

Lee Kwang was killed at the age of twenty-eight in a mountain hut near Laoheishan. His error was lack of vigilance. In order to form a united front with Tong Shan-hao, he needed to transform him ideologically. But he tried to effect a united front merely by making friends with him.

I grieved over his death.

I was on fire with the desire to take immediate revenge on the Tong Shan-hao clique. Had it not been for the voice of reason which told me that organizing a common front with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units was the duty of the communists at that time, their primary task and general strategy, I would have given way to the impulse and plunged into a bloody battle of vengeance.

The whole of east Manchuria condemned the nefarious crime committed by Tong Shan-hao, and cried out for justice to be done. Leftist hooligans complained that the army did not retaliate against the class enemy who had murdered Lee Kwang. Some people claimed that it was a Rightist deviation not to strike against Tong Shan-hao.

Lee Kwang's death was an irretrievable loss to the communist effort for an anti-imperialist common front. We lost a precious comrade worth more than a thousand enemy soldiers. The enemy had taken away from me yet another prop and mainstay of the Korean revolution.

I felt as if my own flesh had been torn away. I bit my lips to suppress my cries, I was obsessed by my thoughts. In the year since we started the war against Japanese, how many comrades-in-arms had already been taken from my side! Why had my friends departed one after another, never to return, as soon as we became attached to each other? Was this the work of destiny?

As I strode with clenched fists, up and down the bank of the River Xiaowangqing, where Lee Kwang and I had discussed the strategy of the great anti-Japanese war, I cursed again and again the cruel fate that had driven me into this abyss of grief. Then I came to a decision:

Lee Kwang's death must not be pointless. If I succeeded in establishing the united front with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units to which he devoted such great efforts and so much energy, then he too would be delighted, though in his grave.

Lee Kwang's death drove me to speed up the negotiations with Wu Yi-cheng. It did not make me flinch from the path to the united front, but urged me on along it.

I had to visit Wu Yi-cheng! If I could succeed in negotiations with him, I would be able to avenge Lee Kwang's death.

With this in mind, I speeded up the daylight march to Luozigou. I dropped in at Taipingcun to console Lee Kwang's bereaved family. His wife Kong Suk Ja spread her arms wide to stop me.

"General, you must not go there. It is not the place you should go to. My husband went there and.... General, please don't go there for God's sake."

But strangely enough, her tearful warning only urged me on to complete the daylight march. The woman's shoulders heaved up and down as she held a seven-.or eight-year old boy in her arms, and wiped the tears from her eyes.

The boy in her arms was Lee Po Chon, Lee Kwang's own son. The boy also stared at me with his eyes brimming over with tears. Whenever I went there, Lee Po Chon, who would be playing on the porch, used to call out to me "Uncle Sung Ju!" and come out of the gate. One day he pestered me with a request to make a grasshopper for him.

When I saw Po Chon run out to the road led by her mother, I regretted that I had not done this for him. How good it would have been now if he had clung to me, asking for the grasshopper as he had before!

How much happier I would feel even if the boy had not dared to ask, but simply climbed up on my shoulders like the innocent child of former days, who used to call me "Uncle" and beg me to let him ride on my shoulders!

But Po Chon was weeping silent bitter tears. Lee Po Chon at my side was not a friendly, cheerful and mischievous boy, but a downcast and fearful child suffering great distress, a person who had bid farewell to his boyhood and its rainbow illusions. His father's death had destroyed the boy's world of playful fancy in which his greatest desire was for a grasshopper. In this way, Po Chon lost both his parents before he was ten years old. Po Chon would never again ask me for the grasshopper. His tender soul was grieving over the tragic death of his father.

I gazed into his face helplessly.

The words were on the tip of my tongue: "Po Chon, good-bye! I will return soon when I take vengeance for your father on his enemy."

Instead, I said, "Po Chon, I'm thirsty. Whenever I came here your father used to bring me a bowl of cold water, but today you can do it for your father, can't you?"

At that moment, his dreamy eyes suddenly became animated and he darted off like the wind, reappearing just as swiftly with a brass bowlful of water from the well with the large dipper. This small event seemed to transform his mental state.

The rippling water in the brass bowl revived Lee Kwang's image in my mind. The intermingled images of the boy and his father reflected on the surface of the water moved me to tears. Mentally thanking the boy I gulped the water until the bowl was dry.

Po Chon wiped his nose and glanced at me lovingly as he held the bowl in his hand. I felt a little light-hearted as I ordered my men to resume the march.

Just as I was about to take my leave, Po Chon darted towards his house. I wondered where he was going.

He ran back quickly, and held out a handful of oats to my white horse. This silent gesture released the tears that I had been holding back.

Po Chon stood there on the riverside as we crossed the river and moved far away. When I turned my head as I sat on the saddle all I could see was a flickering white dot. "Po Chon, you must grow up to be a revolutionary like your father!"

I held my hand up in salute from afar, wishing him a bright future. Later, when the guerrilla zones were dissolved and the second expedition to north Manchuria was begun, I stayed at Lee Kwang's house for about one week and discussed Po Chon's future with Kong Suk Ja.

Po Chon grew up into a revolutionary as I had wished. When he was working at Linkou as a railway worker, he attacked a Japanese military train, but he was captured and served a two-year prison sentence. This was all before he was twenty years old.

With the liberation of the country in 1945 he was released and traveled to the land of his forefathers via Dandong in the autumn of the same year, craving to see his native land and sky and water. He travelled as far as Pyongyang and Seoul, and then returned to Linkou. That journey left vivid impressions on the mind of Lee Po Chon, a sensitive twenty-year old with a bright future.

Feeling an irresistible desire to devote himself heart and soul to the construction of the country of his father's friends, he crossed the railway bridge over the Yalu River with reluctance. In the motherland there was the new world of which his father had dreamed, the promised land which he himself had longed for since his boyhood.

But this promised land was engulfed in the flames of war five years later, as the young Republic fought a decisive battle for survival.

At the news of the war that was raging far away, Lee Po Chon, now a company commander of the Chinese People's Liberation Army, volunteered for action and joined the Korean People's Army on the Korean front. To our great sorrow he fell in battle in the autumn of 1950 while fighting as a commanding officer in a mechanized army division.

Later, in the 1970s, Kim Jong Il, Secretary in Charge of Organizational Affairs, who took a particular interest in Lee Kwang's fiery career and his revolutionary activity, instructed film workers to produce a film entitled In the First Armed Unit, based on Lee Kwang's life. Since then Lee Kwang's name has been known to the entire country. Kong Suk Ja, Lee Kwang's wife, died while fighting as a member of the sewing unit in the guerrilla army.

Lee Ju Phyong, Lee Kwang's father, who worked in support of the revolutionary army with an enthusiasm fuelled by grief over the death of his son, and Lee Pong Ju, Lee Kwang's elder sister, died of illness induced by enemy torture.

We must be grateful that Lee Po Chon left his son with us before his death. The son is advancing stoutly along the path that was pioneered by his grandfather's generation and transformed into a broad highway by his father's generation.

Lee Kwang's family has thus been serving in the revolutionary army for three generations. For a family to have fought under arms for three generations is just cause for noble pride. We must admire Lee Kwang's grandson for choosing to wear military uniform as heir to his grandfather and father, instead of working in other fields.

When this young officer, whose face, bearing and gait so resembled his grandfather's, first appeared before my eyes, together with his mother, I felt a lump rise in my throat, for it seemed as though Lee Kwang, who left our side 60 years ago had returned to visit me. Lee Po Chon's wife, who lost her husband at the age of 25, has brought up her son, trusting for more than 40 years that he would be a stalwart heir to Lee Kwang's cause and his revolutionary spirit. Her devotion merits everyone's highest commendation.

At his meeting with me Lee Po Chon's son said that he was resolved to dedicate himself and his son and daughters to me and Marshal Kim Jong Il, that they would serve with loyal devotion in military uniform. I know very well that this will not prove to be empty words. Lee Kwang's family does not use words idly.

What great work Lee Kwang would have done if he had returned alive to the liberated motherland!

Even now I occasionally ponder on this. Lee Kwang's social activity began, of course, with teaching and at Lee Chong San's house, at the time of the Mingyuegou meeting that winter, he also expressed an ambition to become a teacher.

But I think that if he had survived, to return to the liberated homeland in triumph, he would have become a soldier like Kang Kon and Choe Hyon. He was a devoted communist who always chose a difficult job.

8.2. Negotiations with Wu Yi-cheng

---

One of the most serious and pressing problems we faced in our activities after we moved to Wangqing was sharp confrontation with the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese armed forces. In the year 1933, the Japanese imperialists' persistent machinations, intended to sow dissent, the frequent vacillations on the part of the leaders of the Chinese nationalist armed forces, and the harmful effects of the Leftist Soviet line, brought the relations between the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army and the national salvation army again to the brink of armed conflict.

I have mentioned before that the communists of Korea and China invested great efforts in the work with the Chinese nationalist units in Manchuria after the September 18 incident. Thanks to these efforts the Wangqing guerrilla unit was able to maintain intimate relations with those Chinese nationalist units in the early days. To cite an admirable example, on one side, two armed units - the AJPGA and the self-defense corps - and, on the other side, Commander Guan's battalion concerted their efforts to repulse an attack by Japanese garrison troops at Tokgol in the spring of 1932.

At that time the Japanese garrison troops in Daduchuan had moved scores of carts towards Tokgol in order to transport timber that had been cut during the reign of the Kuomintang. There were large stockpiles of timber in the valleys of Dawangqing and Xiaowangqing. That day our forces lured the enemy into an ambush, killing most of the force of 40 to 50 garrison troops and capturing many weapons.

The battle at Tokgol marked a turning-point in the work to improve the image of the communists in Wangqing, where anti-communist feelings were deep-rooted, and in the development of relations with the NSA from hostility to cooperation. The battle paved the way for the Korean communists to infiltrate into the NSA. After the battle Kim Un Sik, Hong Hae Il, Won Hong Gwon, Jang Ryong Sam, Kim Ha Il and others joined Guan's unit. Kim Ha Il, a crack shot, was appointed communications officer and Kim Un Sik, a man of knowledge, was appointed chief of staff soon after that.

As they had done in the past the people of Macun washed the clothes of the men and officers of Guan's unit after the battle, and sent them toothbrushes, tooth powder, soap, towels and tobacco pouches as gifts; moreover, they frequently organized artistic performances by Children's Corps members. The Young Communist League members conducted political work among them with propaganda leaflets.

In general, the NSA soldiers seldom called the communists "ton gzhi (comrade); however, the officers and men of Guan's unit always called our guerrillas "ton gzhi" whenever they met them.

The guerrillas who joined Guan's unit were all qualified at least for district party committee members, so they were efficient in working among the officers and men of the NSA unit. Battalion Commander Guan was charmed by the communists' personalities and qualifications. Winning him over was an event of great significance for the improvement of relations with the other units of the NSA.

The anti-Japanese guerrilla unit in the Hunchun area exchanged information with the NSA units, and they cooperated even in the struggle against the enemy's lackeys. The guerrillas in Yantonglazi armed themselves with weapons provided by a NSA unit.

The prevailing situation favoured the communists: this turning-point meant that they could establish a united front with the NSA if they worked harder.

However, the "Kim Myong San incident" provoked by the Leftist adventurisms had nullified the friendly relations with Chinese nationalist units which had been established with so much effort. This incident resulted in Battalion Commander Guan's surrender to the Japanese imperialists and in other NSA units breaking with the communists. At about the same time the guerrilla unit led by Choe Hyon opened fire with a machinegun on the soldiers of a Chinese nationalist unit in Yanji County as they defected to the enemy; this incident further complicated relations with the NSA.

In its early days the Wangqing guerrilla unit made quite a few mistakes in its relations with the NSA. Swayed by his desire to obtain a few rifles, Yang Song Ryong, who was in charge of the battalion, did not implement the line of the united front to the letter. He had a fine personality and was a competent officer who commanded skillfully in battle, but his ingrained military routines and adventurism led him to slight the united front. We criticized him severely for this.

Only Kaoshan unit, which had been under our constant influence, did not follow the example of Battalion Commander Guan; this unit maintained a lasting alliance with our anti-Japanese guerrilla army. On the Tano day or the fifth day of the fifth lunar month of 1933 the unit, in cooperation with the self-defense corps in Jattogi (the present Taipingcun) which was led by Park Tu Song, repelled an attack of the 300-strong Japanese garrison troops and the puppet Manchukuo army, when they invaded Shiliping via Dongnancha from their base in the Dongning county town. Many of the invading troops were killed.

The NSA units neglected long-range observation, posting sentries only directly in front of their headquarters; so the Anti-Japanese Self-Defense Corps maintained long-range observation posts for Kaoshan unit. When he had to send important, urgent messages to other Chinese units, Kaoshan would often ask the paramilitary organizations in Shiliping for help. The members of the Children's Vanguard were extremely responsible in the way they transmitted these messages for him.

However, this friendly relationship did not extend to other units, and the reckless Leftist tendency prevalent in the guerrilla zone threatened it in this case. The Leftist Soviet policy helped to accelerate the corruption and degeneration of the Chinese nationalist anti-Japanese units which only recently had been our allies or sympathizers.

The Leftist opportunists conducted their work with the Chinese units in an ultra-Leftist fashion. They indiscriminately promoted such slogans as "Down with the officers from the landlord and propertied class!" and "Soldiers should mutiny and come over to the guerrilla army!" claiming that we should "establish a united front only with the rank and file" and "make the soldiers of the NSA kill their commanders and rise in revolt." The only result they produced was the harmful one of destroying our unity with the upper echelons of the Chinese units.

The Chinese nationalist units killed Korean people, saying that they were "Japanese puppets" and "laogaoli gongchandang" ("Korean communists"). The Japanese imperialists took advantage of this situation to launch an all-out offensive to drive wedges between the Korean and Chinese peoples, between the Korean and Chinese communists and between our Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army and the Chinese nationalist army. From the first day of their occupation of Manchuria, they made desperate efforts to gain control over the NSA units which had broken with Zhang Xue-liang's former Northeast Army and fought under the anti-Japanese banner. What they feared most here was the alignment of our guerrilla army and the NSA. They were well aware that such an alignment of communists and NSA units would produce a formidable force that would undermine Japanese imperialist rule and be a stumbling block in their path of aggression across the continent.

Japan's skill in sowing dissension was clearly revealed in the Wanbaoshan incident, the Longjing incident (an abortive scheme), and the Fushun incident. The Japanese strategic intelligence service, which was skilled in underhand subterfuge, did not hesitate to invent such a murderous drama as the Fushun incident, at which even a beast or a stone Buddha might feel shame, in order to weaken the good-neighborly relations between the Korean and Chinese peoples.

The Fushun incident involved the murder of an innocent Chinese in Fushun by a Japanese who was ordered to stab him with a dagger provided by the Japanese intelligence service. The murder was committed but the scheme failed to create bad blood between the Korean and Chinese peoples even though the plotters had disguised the murderer in a Korean overcoat to reinforce the rumour that it was a Korean who had murdered the Chinese and escaped. He was identified as a Japanese when his Japanese clothes were spotted under the Korean coat.

A number of such incidents culminated in the Liutiaogoti incident and the Lugou Bridge incident. The method Japan applied every time she hatched a plot was equally primitive and brutal. However, many people were easily deceived by these put-up jobs, even though they themselves often suffered because of the Japanese imperialists' dastardly methods in cooking up their shams.

While spreading rumours, such as "The Korean people will lay claim to Manchuria," and "The communists are going to disarm the NSA," the Japanese imperialists gave the reactionaries belonging to the "Minsaengdan" a reason to clamor for Korean autonomy in Jiandao, that is, for the establishment of a "Korean autonomous region in Jiandao" and a "Korean legal autonomous government," so playing the Korean people off against the Chinese people. At other times they would set fire to Chinese houses and spread the lie that the Korean guerrillas had done it. Another reason for the collapse of the united front was that the Japanese imperialists laid schemes for the surrender of the leaders of the Chinese anti-Japanese units, which resulted in the degeneration of the latter's anti-Japanese consciousness.

in January 1933, Wang Yu-zhen, who was in Tumenzi, Hunchun County, surrendered to the enemy with his soldiers. Hundreds of them were restructured into a special guerrilla unit fighting against us. In February, half of the soldiers of Guan's unit in Xiaowangqing capitulated and joined the defense corps and the public security bureau of Manchukuo; in the same month scores of the officers and men of the Ma Gui-lin's unit which was appearing frequently in the vicinity of Dahuanggou, capitulated and joined the self-defense corps in Hamatang. The officers and soldiers of the Chiang Hai's unit in Erchazigou, Wangqing County, and of the Qingshan unit in Huoshaopu offered to surrender.

The Japanese imperialists bribed the notorious bandit leader Tong Shan-hao, who was holding the Luozigou area, and instigated him to murder all the guerrillas of Lee Kwang's special detachment. The situation was so bad that the guerrilla army, afraid of the NSA's violence, had to march by night. The Koreans would not be able to keep their heads above ground unless relations with the NSA were improved. Reversing the hostile relations with the NSA and developing an alliance with them was once again a vital task for the Korean communists if they were to continue the revolution.

I made a firm decision to pay a visit to Wu Yi-cheng, the forward area commander of the NSA. Since Wang De-lin left Jiandao, Wu Yicheng held the real power in the NSA. I felt confident that if I prevailed upon him, I would be able to put a stop to the difficulties created for guerrilla activities in east Manchuria as a result of the "Kim Myong San incident" and the massacre of Lee Kwang's special detachment, and at the same time I could possibly break the deadlock in which our revolution found itself.

I had a serious discussion with Pan, the provincial party committee member, about negotiations with Wu. Pan acknowledged that my decision was reasonable, but he advised me not to go to Wu in person. He was of the opinion that it would be difficult for a Korean, rather than a Chinese, to persuade him, for he was too self-important and too prejudiced. He added that in order to win over Commanders Wu and Chai we would have to prevent Lee Chong Chon, the latter's adviser, from interfering in the negotiations, and that this was a problem.

I insisted on going to negotiate in spite of all the difficulties Pan had pointed out. I said, "Lee is a Korean; even though he is anti-communist, he will not place obstacles in our way if we argue persuasively. He is an old acquaintance of mine. I spoke with him several times during the meeting on the merging of the three nationalist organizations in Jirin. My father was also close friends with him."

Pan tried his best to prevent my making an adventure, saying:

"What difference does it make now whether someone is an acquaintance or a stranger? Do you think they will treat acquaintances differently from strangers? Worse still, they say Wu is a die-hard. The odds are against us.

"I once managed to win over Commander Yu in Antu. So why not Wu Yi-cheng?"

"When you were negotiating with Yu, Mr. Liu Ben-cao was his chief of staff. That gave you a good start."

"I could have a good start in Wu's unit, too. Chen Han-zhang is working as chief secretary in the unit. The chief of staff, Hu Jin-min, is one of our operatives, too."

This remark threw myself into consternation. Only a few days before I had received a letter from Chen, whose role as a powerful support I always emphasized, requesting me to take decisive measures to assist him. On the grounds that it was almost impossible to effect an alliance with Commander Wu through his own efforts, he wrote that he "would like measures to be taken by the organization as soon as possible, for only Comrade Kim Il Sung will be able to find a solution to this problem." Pan, too, knew about this.

"The revolution has a long way to go, and you should not engage in such an adventure. Please think about it carefully, for mercy's sake," Pan implored. "You must not regard yourself as your own property. One slip and you could become another Lee Kwang. Don't forget that. Even if we all die, you must survive and fight to the last for Korea on behalf of all of us."

Pan's remark moved me, but I could not abandon my commitment to an allied front.

After Pan had left for Hunchun County delegates from guerrilla units in every county of east Manchuria gathered in Wangqing and held a meeting to discuss the question of a united front. The main agenda item was the formation of an alliance with the NSA, in other words, who should go to lead negotiations at Luozigou, where the NSA units led by Wu Yi-cheng, Chai Shi-rong, Shi Zhong-heng and others, were concentrated.

I insisted that I should go. The meeting decided that my journey to Luozigou would be possible only with an escort of 100 guerrillas, and granted permission. The journey to Wu Yi-cheng was no simple one as we have already seen.

In order to negotiate with Wu, I had to find out about the situation there through such people as Chen Han-zhang and Hu Jin-min. However, Chen was Wu's chief secretary and a serious man; he would not play games, shut away in his office. And if he showed himself outside, he could be misunderstood if he made a contact with Koreans. Nevertheless, he was sure to help me in my work no matter what the risk because in former days he had been a member of the Young Communist League organization in which I had had a part, and we had pledged loyalty to one another at that time.

After writing to Chen and Hu, I sent letters to Wu Yi-cheng and Chai Shi-rong, explaining the purpose of our journey to Luozigou. To make the letters more formal, we stamped a large, square seal beside the name of the sender.

After dispatching the letters we inquired into the reaction in Wu's unit through the revolutionary organizations in Luozigou, and the reports were good. The underground organizations even informed us of the fact that the NSA had set up a placard with the words "Welcome to the Korean Anti-Japanese Guerrilla Army!" at the entrance to the town. I left for Luozigou with 100 selected men. As they marched along in new uniform, and with new rifles and leather kit-bags over their shoulders, they were a spectacular sight. I rode on a white horse at the head of the column.

On arrival at Taipinggou we issued a statement on the AIPGA's entry into Luozigou and dispatched an orderly to Wu's unit; then we settled in for the night, waiting for a reply. The following day we received notice from Luozigou that they had agreed to the proposed negotiations. Chen Han-zhang's assurances had proved effective in persuading Wu to accept our proposal. When he received my letter he recommended Commander Kim to Wu as someone he knew well, and said I was a very good-natured man.

As he listened to his recommendation Wu asked him, "He is a communist, how is it that you know him so well? Are you then a communist, too?"

Chen replied that Commander Kim was his schoolmate and an old acquaintance.

"If he is your schoolmate and a good fellow, then I will talk to him over luncheon." We posted a company from Hunchun in the lower village of Taipinggou so that they could support us in case the NSA should detain us or do us harm; then our remaining 50 men entered the town of Luozigou in an imposing array, flying a red flag and sounding a trumpet.

Chen Han-zhang, who came to greet the guerrilla army, guided me to the headquarters of the NSA. JO Tong Uk and Lee Song Lim, my orderly, who were to assist me during the negotiations, followed Chen, with wooden-cased Mausers at their sides. There were several aides of Kuomintang origin in the headquarters.

Wu Yi-cheng was a man of fine presence with a long beard. I had heard a rumor that he was so arrogant he would not stand up even when a visitor called and would talk to him, sprawling on a tiger skin and drinking tea; but on that day he greeted me with all due formality. However, he did not maintain the Chinese custom of offering his guest tea. At first I greeted him in a humble manner, saying, "We highly appreciate the patriotism of your unit's joining the anti-Japanese struggle when many units from Zhang Xue-liang's former Northeast Army were surrendering to the Japanese army.

My greeting brought a smile to the corners of his lips and he ordered his aide to bring tea.

"I have heard reports that you, Commander Kim, are fighting well against the Japanese. Your army is not great in numbers but you know how to fight; we are not like you, even though we have many soldiers. My men say the soldiers you brought with you have brand-new rifles; will you not exchange some of them for our old ones?"

The negotiations thus began with his words of greeting, which were somewhat perplexing. Facing Commander Wu as he tried to fathom the other party's thoughts by praising him on and at the same time requesting something difficult to comply with, I judged that he was a competent diplomat and shrewd man who had known both sweetness and bitterness in his life. I did not think that a forward area commander, the leader of thousands of soldiers, would make such a request at the first meeting without forethought, simply out of greed for a few new rifles.

"You say exchange? We can give them free."

I satisfied his request without any fuss and added in a casual manner, "Is there any need to deal in such petty matters? We'll have plenty of them if we fight a battle with the Japanese. But since you request it, we will give them as a gift."

Wu stroked his beard down and then approached me from a different angle, "Well, what is your communist party? That man, Chen Hanzhang, says the communist party is not bad, but I can't believe him. Zhou Bao-zhong is also a communist and when he was my adviser, I found him not to my liking, always wasting time for some reason, I don't know why. So I got rid of him. By the way, I heard that you communists destroy the mountain shrines when you pass by them."

"Why should we destroy the shrines? It is a lie told by wicked people to discredit the communists."

"Then, do you, Commander Kim, pay tribute at the shrines?"

"I neither destroy them nor pay tribute to them, for it is nothing to do with me. What about you, Commander Wu?"

"Neither do I."

"Then both of us are the same in that neither pays tribute."

Dumbfounded, he stroked his beard once again with a smile on his face.

"That's right. By the way, they say that communists, men and women alike, all sleep under one quilt and they plunder the people of their property. Is this true?"

I realized that the success of the negotiations depended on how I could manage this question and that I must give him an appropriate answer which would give him a correct understanding of communists.

"That is another fabrication of the bad elements. It is true that some alleged communists have deprived landowners of their lands, regardless of whether they are pro-Japanese or anti-Japanese, but we don't regard it as a good thing. However, the landlords should have had the generosity to give the sharecroppers who were dying from hunger, some grain. Can it be right that they regard them with indifference while they feather their own nests? Why should the poor peasants revolt if they are given food grain? Hungry people have no way to survive but by fighting. I may be wrong but I believe the Taiping Rebellion took place in China in the last century for the same reason.

Wu Yi-cheng nodded his head.

"That seems right. Those who wish to eat their fill and live comfortably by themselves are evil-doers in this chaotic situation."

Grasping my opportunity, I continued:

"That men and women sleep under one quilt is a lie the Japanese invented to insult the communists. There are many woman soldiers in our guerrilla unit, but such a thing never occurs. If they fall in love, they get married. Our discipline between men and women is very strict."

"That's what I mean. It must never happen that several men sleep with one woman in turn." "Of course not. There are no men in the world more decent-minded than us communists." When our conversation reached this point, Wu began calling me "Commander Kim" and stopped using awkward words.

"Ha, ha! Commander Kim is trying to make a communist of me."

"I have no thought of making you a communist, Commander Wu. A man cannot be made a communist by someone else. However, I think it advisable to unite our efforts to defeat the Japanese imperialists."

Wu Yi-cheng gestured nervously with his arm.

"We don't collaborate with the communists, even if it means fighting on our own.

"Surely it is good to fight the Japanese in cooperation when we are not strong enough alone?"

"I still don't need favours from the communists."

"No one can predict his future. Some day you may ask a favor from us.

"Well, that may well be possible. God only knows what awaits a man. By the way, may I ask a favor of you? Won't you join jiajiali ? It is better than the communist party, I think," he said casually.

Seeing me hesitate, he looked at me in amusement.

I was perplexed to hear the word jiajiali in that context. Commander Wu had puzzled me completely.

Jiajiali is a Chinese word meaning "one family." It is an organization of the Chinese people which was also called Qinghongbang. It was formed as a union against the emperor by the workers who dug canals and hauled boats, when they could no longer endure their hardships. There was no private property in this organization, and it was a large one for that time.

When people swear brotherhood, they become elder and younger brothers, but people joining jiajiali become fathers and sons. A man who wishes to find a father could join it, but not a man who wishes to find sons. The higher the caste of the jiajiali was, the more dignified its members were and the more authority they possessed. A ceremony was held when a man joined. Kim Jae Born (alias Kim Phyon), who had joined a jiajiali of the 24th generation on our instructions, had said that the ceremony was spectacular. A new member had to bow hundreds of times to those who were to become his fathers and seniors.

Now I had received an embarrassing invitation to join such an organization. If I declined, the negotiations which had gone smoothly so far might be deadlocked; but if I accepted, he would take me to a Buddha and make me bow there and then, which would mean making myself subordinate to Wu Yicheng. When preparing for the negotiations, we had not anticipated this kind of situation. Anyway, I had to resolve the dilemma.

"It would be a fine thing for you and I to enter a jiajiali, but before we join another organization we are obliged to obtain permission from the party organization. If it is not granted, I can do nothing. Let us leave the matter until I obtain permission from our organization."

"Ha, ha! Then, it seems you are a half-baked commander, not a fully-fledged one." Commander Wu looked at me with a slightly dissatisfied expression on his face and all of a sudden asked me, "Do you drink, Commander Kim?"

"I can drink, but don't even if I want to, lest it hamper me in fighting against the Japanese."

"Your communist party is agreeable to me. I wish to cooperate with you but I am afraid I would have to imbibe Marxism. Spreading communism among our people is not good."

"Don't worry about it, Commander. We have no intention of propagating communism. We will only carry out anti-Japanese propaganda."

"Your party is very gentlemanly for a communist party. But it was wrong of the communists in Wangqing to disarm Commander Guan's battalion. What is your opinion of that incident?" "What more is there to say about it? It was the most serious mistake of all possible mistakes. So we severely reprimanded the Wangqing special detachment last year." "Commander Kim, you are a fair-minded soldier. By the way, some people say that the communist party is right in everything it does. How could that be?"

"A communist is also a man. So how could he make no mistakes? I, too, make mistakes now and then, for I am not a machine, but a man. When one tries to do a great deal of work, one is bound to make mistakes sometimes. So we study hard and improve ourselves so that we shall commit fewer errors.

"You are right. Lazy men who do nothing will make no mistakes. The communists do many things and this we appreciate. In general, it is amusing to talk to you, Commander Kim. You are candid, so we do understand each other."

Saying this, Wu wound up the negotiations for the moment. He took me politely by the hand and then released his grip. I was sure the negotiations were going well. On the spur of the moment he said good humouredly that Chen Han-zhang, a friend of Commander Kim, helped him with his writing and that without him he was as good as blind.

Wu asked me whether I knew Hu Jin-min. I answered that I did not know him, for I was afraid the nature of our relations might be revealed if I answered in the affirmative. He called Hu Jin-min and politely introduced him to me. Hu and I said, "How do you do?" to each other as if we were strangers. Chen Han-zhang told me that it was very rare for Wu to introduce his staff officers to visitors in this way; he said confidently that I could regard the negotiations as successful.

That day we agreed with Wu Yi-cheng to establish a standing body called the Joint Anti-Japanese Army Coordination Commission which would keep the AJPGA and the NSA in touch with each other and coordinate their actions. We also discussed the membership of the commission. Wang Run-cheng, a Chinese, was appointed a representative of the Chinese units and Jo Tong Uk, a representative of our unit. We decided to set up the commission's office in Luozigou, near Commander Wu's headquarters.

Wu Yi-cheng invited us to luncheon. Chen Han-zhang informed me that this also was special treatment.

The conversation over luncheon also took place in a friendly atmosphere. Whenever the Japanese imperialist occupation of Manchuria came up, Wu would frown indignantly, twitching his thick eyebrows. He was also indignant at the murder of Lee Kwang by Tong Shan-hao. "They are indigenous bandits, not our sort. That Tong Shan-hao was certain to become a cat's paw of the Japanese! That his ilk has harmed your army is a cursed crime. I am ashamed that such a devil can be one of our Chinese nation."

This remark gave me a glimpse of another side of his personality.

I was satisfied with the result of the negotiations and Wu Yi-cheng's hospitality. Wu put on airs, and he was tainted with the ideology of the Kuomintang, but that was not the fundamental point. What was important was his exceptionally strong anti-Japanese spirit and his great commitment to national salvation. Cooperation would have been inconceivable if only our distinctions had been asserted, the ideology, class and nationality which separated us. The goal of an allied front permitted us to scorn such limitations.

That same day I sent a liaison man to Xiaowangqing with a letter saying that cooperation with Commander Wu had been successfully arranged, that the question of Chai Shi-rong was still outstanding, that we would try to approach him gradually, and that the unit should make full preparations for action because we needed to attack a large walled County town like Dongning in order to step up the united front.

After our success in the first contact with Wu Yi-cheng, we immediately tackled the work of winning over the unit of Chai Shi-rong, the most obstinate force among the NSA units, to the anti-Japanese united front. Chen Han-zhang said Commander Wu seemed to be quite determined, but Commander Chai posed a problem; he was anxious to find a way of expelling Lee Chong Chon. Commander Wu had only one brigade. Commander Chai had a larger force.

I suggested negotiations to Lee Chong Chon, but he declined. On the contrary, he incited Chai to disarm the communist army. But Chai, who would normally heed any advice from Lee, objected to that trick. He said that if he were not careful, he could get into serious trouble, since Commander Wu Yi-cheng had dined with Commander Kim and that, moreover, Commander Kim was in command of the Wangqing unit, which fought bravely. Lee Chong Chon worked so hard to incite Chai against communism that we could not even meet him face to face.

The only way of solving the problem was to separate Commander Chai's unit from Wu Yi-cheng. The method used to separate Wu Yicheng, who had agreed to cooperate with us, from Chai Shi-rong was to bring Shi Zhong-heng's brigade, Wu Yi-cheng's main force, under our influence. If we dealt with the brigade commander properly, we could further consolidate our initial success in the negotiations with Wu Yicheng.

I inquired about the composition of his brigade; most of the soldiers were of lower class origin. Shi Zhong-heng himself had been a swineherd for a landowner at the age of 9 and then joined the army to support himself. He had served under Wang De-lin in the Jirin field army; after the September 18 incident he had entered the national salvation army and led a platoon, a company and a regiment, and now he was a brigadier-general. He was a typical soldier who relished fighting.

I went to see Shi Zhong-heng with a letter of introduction from Hu un-mm on the day Hu wrote it. When I requested an interview, Shi complied without ceremony, setting all his other business aside. He treated me warmly, like a friend, saying that a visit to his unit by Commander Kim who fought the Japanese so successfully was an auspicious occasion. He was neither against communism, nor was he like a warlord; he was open-hearted and gentle.

Shi said that our unit's successive victories in the fight with the Japanese army were a source of pride to the people living in east Manchuria as well as to the Korean people. At that time we had already dealt heavy blows against the Japanese imperialists in the battles at Jiapigou, Liangshuiquanzi and several other places. Although the media had not reported them, the news of those battles had been spread widely throughout the Jiandao area. To my surprise, Shi was well aware of the details of the battles and their results.

He welcomed my proposal for a joint attack on the Dongning county town. He said, "I had long wished for a strong neighbor and friend such as your army, Commander Kim .We are brothers from today. Your enemy is my enemy and your friend is my friend."

We embraced each other warmly in celebration of the success of our negotiations. From that day we were brothers and comrades-in-arms who shared the days of fierce battle like brothers. Our close friendship remained unchanged until he fell in battle as the commander of the 2nd Independent Division.

The outcome of the negotiations at Luozigou removed the greatest obstacle in the way of the anti-Japanese revolution. While cooperation with Commander Yu was the starting-point of the allied front, the negotiation with Wu Yi-cheng was a historic step towards extending that initial success gained to the whole area of east Manchuria; it was a stunning event which put an end to the meaningless confrontation and bloodshed occurring between the Korean and Chinese nations since the May 30 Uprising and the Wanbaoshan incident and merged the fierce anti-Manchukuo and anti-Japanese tendencies into one raging torrent.

Through the negotiations with Wu Yi-cheng and Shi Zhong-heng we realized quite clearly that a united front was possible only when our own forces were strong. Had we not displayed our military strength to the full through the campaigns in south and north Manchuria in 1932 and through the large and small battles in 1933 in and around Wangqing, and had we not developed the guerrilla army into an indomitable armed force, Wu Yi-cheng would have turned us away from his door. The alliance with Wu Yi-cheng was established so smoothly because we were strong, because our politics and morals were superior to those of the NSA, and because our ardent patriotism international fraternity and unshakable faith in the validity of our cause won his sympathy.

Since the day I achieved cooperation with the NSA I have regarded it as axiomatic that the best resources for an allied front are one's own forces and that one cannot fight in cooperation with any friendly army or country without fostering one's own strength, and I have devoted my entire life to consolidating the motive force of the revolution.

Wu Yi-cheng and Chai Shi-rong also agreed with my idea of attacking the Dongning county town. We held a joint meeting in Luozigou with Wu Yi-cheng, Shi Zhong-heng, Chai Shi-rong and other commanders of the NSA, and mapped out a detailed plan of operations for the battle; then I wrote to our headquarters in Wangqing once again.

Thanks to the successful negotiations with Wu Yi-cheng and victory in the battle at Dongning county town, we became widely known to the guerrilla units of the Koreans, Chinese NSA units and other anti-Manchukuo, anti-Japanese forces. Cooperation with Wu Yi-cheng convinced me more than ever that strengthening the united front was essential to the survival of the anti-Japanese revolution as a whole and the key to promoting the revolution.

Even after I had left Jiandao and moved the theatre of operations to the Changbai area, I looked back with emotion upon the days when I strove to make the negotiations with Wu a success. Wu Yi-cheng, now as a member of the Northeast Anti-Japanese Allied Army, was fighting in those days on our flank, with Fusong and its district as his base. When I heard he was fighting nearby, I was reminded of our old friendship, sealed in the days of the common struggle.

With more than 100 guerrillas, I went to the woods east of Xigang where the secret camps of Wu Yi-cheng's unit were located. Wu rushed to the edge of the camp and embraced me. We hugged each other as warmly as childhood friends separated for scores of years.

No sooner did I feel Wu's coarse moustache smelling of gun smoke on my chin, than a lump rose in my throat despite myself. I could not understand why a meeting with this Chinese man whose character contained so much of the warlord, who was so very proud, should make me choke. Our friendship sealed in the days of battle was quite exceptional. I was greatly moved that Commander Wu treated me quite sincerely like his own brother, disregarding my nationality and age.

No friendship in the world can be more sincere, more ardent and more durable than friendship formed under the hail of fire. Is this not the reason why we call the friendship between the very closest of friends a militant friendship?

I could find no trace in him of the former haughty pride which led him to assess people's ability with his sharp eyes while lounging over a tiger skin. He looked like an old, generous villager rather than a hero of the green forest with thousands of soldiers under his command. He seemed to have lost weight and his eyes seemed less bright.

I stayed for two days in Wu Yi-cheng's secret camp before returning. As I was leaving Wu Yi-cheng offered to turn over 100 of his soldiers to me. When I declined, he feigned anger, saying, "You obviously lack or want nothing. However, Commander Kim, as a friend I must give you some assistance towards your preparations for a great campaign. Those 100 men must fight under your command rather than following me. As the saying goes - Mugwort grows straight on the hemp plantation."

I have not met Wu Yi-cheng since then. At the end of the year I heard that Wu had gone to the Soviet Union after entrusting his unit to another man; then I lost contact with him and heard no more of him.

Wu Yi-cheng was not simply a companion of convenience while we were putting together the allied front; he was an unforgettable comrade-in-arms who braved the hail of bullets shoulder to shoulder with us in battle. How Commander Wu spent the latter part of his life and how he met his fate still remain unclear. Worst of all, there is nowhere I can turn for reliable information.

If he remained loyal to the ideal of patriotism until the last moment of his life, then that is enough to satisfy me.

8.3. The Battle of the Dongning County Town

---

After the negotiations at Luozigou, the Joint Anti-Japanese Army Coordination Commission worked hard among the national salvation army units. Members of the commission even infiltrated the mountain rebels and made strenuous efforts to draw them into the anti-Japanese united front.

Early in September 1933, this commission arranged a joint meeting at which we discussed with Wu Yi-cheng, Shi Zhong-heng, Chai Shirong, Li San-xia and other leaders of the Chinese nationalist units at Laomuzhuhe near Luozigou the plan for attacking the Dongning county town (Sanchakou) and finalized the plan of operations. On the recommendation of Commander Wu Yi-cheng the meeting unanimously approved the operation plan as we had drafted it.

We did not attack the town immediately after the negotiations at Luozigou; we allowed ourselves more than two months for preparation, because we attached special importance to this battle. We regarded this battle as a watershed in making our anti-Japanese guerrilla army fully legitimate; we also believed that an agreement on the united front with the NSA units would be brought into effect through victory in this battle.

Should we succeed in this battle the united front with the Chinese nationalist units would be put on a rock-solid foundation; if not, the positive outcome of the negotiations at Luozigou would be undermined, and the united front would collapse while still in the stage of formation. Failure in the battle would also stain the military prestige of our guerrilla army which we had built up in the course of bloody battles. It would also cause serious problems if the NSA complained that they had been crushed because of the united front.

This was indeed a tough test for us. Our reconnaissance and information from our local organizations confirmed that a 500-strong Kwangtung Army unit led by Ishida, a puppet Manchukuo army regiment commanded by Commander Qing, and puppet Manchukuo police and self-defense corps were posted in the county town. Worse still, the enemy was entrenched in an impregnable fortress which was armed with artillery and other modern weapons.

At that time some leaders of the Chinese units estimated the chances of occupying the town at only 30 per cent. At the meeting they even expressed concern that our forces were too small in comparison to the enemy, saying that internationally recognized war manuals stated that the forces of the attacker should be three times greater than those of the defender. However, Wu Yi-cheng and other people retorted that they had nothing to learn from such silly prattle, which could only make sense in the Japanese military academy that Lee Chong Chon had attended. They criticized such a passive attitude to the battle.

As the NSA had already failed once in an attack on the Dongning county town, it was no accident that some commanders overestimated the enemy's strength, fearing the Japanese army with its boasts of "invincibility."

Once a plan was adopted at the meeting, the coordination commission, in collaboration with Hu Jin-min, allocated to each unit the number of troops which should participate in the battle.

We were to contribute three companies, one from each of Wangqing, Hunchun and Yanji to the battle, and we summoned them to Luozigou.

The company I had taken from Wangqing and the company which Paek Il Phyong, the battalion political commissar, led all the way from Hunchun, met amidst great emotion near Luozigou at the end of August 1933.

But to our regret, the comrades from Yanji did not arrive at the rendezvous, for the message had not reached them in time. The Yanji battalion had selected Choe Hyon's company, which was the strongest. Before starting the march Choe Hyon had ensured that every man was supplied with 150 rounds of ammunition and a new pair of shoes. The company left Beidong and arrived at Macun by forced march in the middle of September, when we were in Xiaowangqing after the battle on the Dongning county town.

As we entered Luozigou with the men from Hunchun, the men and officers of the NSA, together with the local residents, welcomed us enthusiastically. Quite a few peasants from neighboring villages came to welcome us too. Their warm welcome was a clear expression of the strength of the anti-Japanese organizations in this place.

Behind the crowd who were waving their hands and shouting for joy at our unit stood the able revolutionary Choe Jong Hwa. Though in the service of Manchukuo, as the head of the Anti-Japanese Association in Luozigou, he worked, in fact, mostly for the NSA in the capacity of a member of the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee, and he publicized widely the correctness of our line of an anti-Japanese allied front in Luozigou. He encouraged people to supply the NSA units with food grain and cloth.

We lined up in the street where the Chinese people lived, and made speeches appealing for an anti-Japanese national salvation movement. Then we danced and sang in groups. Even the Chinese shopkeepers along the street suspended their business and came out in the street to enjoy the performance. As the guerrillas and the NSA soldiers mingled with one another the town of Luozigou became animated and festive. The whole town, both the Korean and Chinese streets, was enveloped in a holiday atmosphere.

Young people who had heard of us jostled each other to see Commander Kim. They were arguing over whether Commander Kim hailed from Phyongan Province, or Hamgyong Province, or Kyongsang Province.

The children were keen to touch the Model 38 rifles and cartridge belts. Each soldier wore three cartridge belts, one on the waist and two across his shoulders. As one belt contained 100 cartridges, every one was carrying a load of 300.

Large numbers of women came and tugged at the guerrillas' arms, saying, "Men fighting for the country, join us for lunch."

Even women living several miles away from Luozigou brought lunch and served the guerrillas. On the day of our arrival at Luozigou, I, accompanied by those working on the coordination commission, paid a visit to Commander Wu Yi-cheng at his lodging.

As old acquaintances, we had an amicable conversation. It was a candid conversation between two men, not a conversation designed to fathom each other's thoughts, like the first one we had in June.

What had worried me most on my way to Luozigou was whether Commander Wu had given up the idea of fighting the battle or not in the meantime. I wondered whether such people as Lee Chong Chon, who were not pleased with the alliance, might not have persuaded Wu Yi-cheng to abandon the idea of the battle and set back the relations between the NSA and ourselves to the state preceding our negotiations. Those working on the coordination commission had informed me on several occasions of Lee Chong Chon's ceaseless efforts to get Chai Shi-rong to abort our cooperation. They had been apprehensive that this trick might affect Commander Wu.

But they need not have worried. His commitment to the allied front remained unchanged, and his determination to redeem his previous defeat through the attack on the Dongning county town was as firm as ever.

What Commander Wu felt was most ignominious was the blow he had suffered during the Japanese "mopping-up" operation in Luozigou at the end of 1932. At that time the Japanese had mobilized ten air force fighters and hundreds of troops and crushed the NSA mercilessly. Luozigou had been reduced to ashes and the NSA driven away to Chengnancun, Xintunzi and Shitouhezi.

"To be honest, our numbers were greater than the Japanese. But we abandoned Luozigou and fled to the mountainous area. Whenever I am reminded of the defeat we suffered at that time, I cannot sleep. Even though the Japanese ruffians who occupied Luozigou beheaded innocent people and hung their heads on the south gate, we remained entrenched in the mountainous area without so much as a thought of revenge. We were simply afraid of the Japanese army. What shame! I will make them pay dearly for it at Dongning."

As he said this, Wu frequently put his hand on the Mauser on his side. As I saw him burning with thoughts of revenge, I realized that his determination had not lessened. It was a good omen for the allied front.

That day I told him the story of my past life in outline, as I had done to Pan, the member of the provincial party committee. In return Commander Wu told me his own personal history. Through the unceremonious talk of that day I learned that his native district was somewhere near Dongehang in Shandong Province and he had the nickname of Wu Jieheng. When we were holding our conversation two of our guerrillas stood sentry on the roof of Commander Wu's lodging. The NSA organized a strict watch around the headquarters that day.

That day Wu Yi-cheng talked as the rumors portrayed him, lounging idly on a tiger skin. He disliked talking formally, sitting cross-legged on a chair, probably because he was corpulent. So I had to talk to him while I lounged with my arm across a wooden pillow.

Wu Yi-cheng ordered his men to prepare delicious food for lunch as he had a distinguished guest. I told him I had brought my own food and there was no need to take the trouble to prepare lunch for me. The man who accompanied us and carried our meals in those days was a Chinese soldier with a pockmarked face. Wu was very interested in the fact that I was speaking fluent Chinese. The knowledge of Chinese I had acquired thanks to my father proved its worth in my work with Wu Yi-cheng.

In Luozigou, the Wangqing and Hunchun companies discussed on several occasions the tactics for political work among the people.

We stressed the following to the guerrillas; the future direction of the NSA depends on the result of this battle; if our guerrilla army fights bravely in the van the NSA will follow us; if we fail to play our part, they will abandon us; so you must always set an example both in everyday life and in the battle; we are going to fight this battle for the sake of the allied front rather than for a few rifles and sacks of grain; we are staking the future of the allied front on this battle; let the NSA soldiers win all the trophies; let us not care what they take, no matter what it is, even opium; but let us keep in mind that there will be no concessions in the political and moral aspects of our conduct.

Brigadier-general Shi Zhong-heng, one of the leaders of the Chinese nationalist units, supported the plan of the battle most actively. During our stay in Luozigou a friendship transcending nationality and affiliation sprang up between Shi and myself. When the large forces of our guerrilla army and the NSA units were marching towards the Dongning county town from Luozigou he tried to stay near our unit all the time. When bivouacking he tried to pitch his tents near ours and act together with our unit in the battle. During the march of a hundred miles from Luozigou to the Dongning county town, we came to understand each other on a deeper level.

The expeditionary forces which had left Luozigou in early September spent several days on the road. The march was a clear demonstration of the noble revolutionary spirit and sincere humane traits of the Korean communists. The political and moral differences between the AJPGA and the NSA were clearly expressed during the march and in our daily life.

Wherever we went, we behaved as an army of the people. We did not destroy the mountain shrines on our way nor lay our hands on the delicious foods offered in sacrifice; we did not give it a second glance.

When we stopped at Chinese villages we held parties, hung posters on the walls and conducted oral propaganda. Other units caused the villagers much trouble, but we helped them in fetching water, grinding grain, threshing and weaving cornstalks for fences. In the villages where Koreans were living we read to them from story-books.

Since we behaved in this way, the people made rice cakes and killed pigs for us, saying that our army really appreciated them. They said that other units were hopelessly bad-tempered and rude, but Commander Kim's unit was so gentle, affable and warm-hearted that they spared nothing in their efforts to please us.

Whenever he witnessed the sincere loving care we took of the people and the genuine support and welcome the people accorded us, Brigadier-general Shi Zhong-heng praised us profusely, holding his thumb up, and saying that Commander Kim's army was a unique gentlemen's army. On several occasions he instructed his men that they should follow the example of the communist army led by Commander Kim.

"At present some villains are disgracing the NSA in the van of our column. You should not follow their example. God will bless you only if your manners are noble. I hereby warn you in advance that if any unpleasant acts such as toying with women, laying hands on others' property or blustering at people should occur, the man will be strictly dealt with, whoever he may be."

Shi Zhong-heng's orders were effective in alerting his men to the need for good behavior. Some soldiers of the NSA took flight at the sight of grain stacks on moonless nights, saying that the stacks were Japanese soldiers. After this occurred several times we made our guerrilla army march in the van of the column and the NSA units were made to bring up the rear. This insignificant measure inspired the guerrillas to new efforts. They realized very keenly that victory in the battle did not depend on the NSA soldiers who confused grain stacks with Japanese soldiers, but on themselves, that they themselves were the decisive force driving the wheel of the allied front, and they speeded up the march. The guerrillas studied even on the march. They sometimes argued about serious political subjects.

"Hey, Comrade Kang, will you please explain the purpose of our attack on the Dongning county town clearly and wittily? When the Commander told us about it in Luozigou it seemed understandable but somehow it seems hard to grasp now."

The wily question came from a man at the tail of the Wangqing company as the expeditionary forces were nearing Laoheishan. He did not ask it out of ignorance; he wanted to test his understanding.

Kang, who had been asked the question, was also a wily man.

"Ah, look at him. Trying to roast his crab on someone else's fire. If you are so hazy about it, then I will tell you. If I must, I will sing it to the tune of the Ten-point Song." And he really did begin to sing it without giving the asker a chance to speak.

What is first? Realizing the allied front Even though the heavens collapse, This is first.

What is second? Expanding our unique guerrilla zone, the citadel, To the Soviet-Manchurian border; This is second.

What is third? Clearing the passage to the Soviet Union Which is welcoming even in chilly weather; This is third.

Park, who asked the question, was struck speechless and gestured in astonishment. "Your talent is worth far more than its weight in gold. The purpose is as clear as the full moon in a blue sky even to such a stupid man as me.

Kang, the talent of the Wangqing company, deserved this admiration. He was able to encapsulate in that song the complicated circumstances of World War I and the appalling course of political calamities beginning with the outburst of the September 18 incident to the foundation of the Kingdom of Manchukuo.

His song, which expressed the purpose of the battle poetically in simple words, spread in no time from the Wangqing company to the Flunchun company, to the brigade of Shi Zhong-heng and to Chai Shi rong's unit. Some of the NSA soldiers hummed the song on the march. The NSA soldiers tried their best to follow the example set by our unit.

But not all the officers and men of the NSA behaved in that way Many of them were expecting a windfall, dreaming of the trophies they would be distributing before long. I could seldom find the soldiers who were talking, with noble anti-Japanese sentiment, about expanding the area of operations to the border area of the Soviet Union and Manchuria or restoring Manchuria through a strong and secure allied front with the AJPGA.

One of Shi Zhong-heng's soldiers marching in the rear of our unit asked one of his companions, "Hey, will there be much opium in Dongning?"

"Well, it may be easily obtainable as there is a regiment of the pup? pet Manchukuo army there. They cannot exist without opium, can they? But why are you talking about opium all of a sudden when you don't smoke it?" said the other, glancing at him dubiously.

"Why! Opium is the same as money, and money is opium. They say you can fly to Yangzhou on a crane if you have a lot of money.

"You are right! They say one cannot see the sights of Hangzhou without money. You can go to Hangzhou and Xuzhou with opium which is worth a lot of money. All I want to get is a Japanese-made electric torch."

"Don't worry about a small thing like that. You can surely get one, since there are so many Japanese soldiers."

"Don't talk so big. Opium and electric torches can only be taken when the battle ends in victory. Do you think the town will be so simple to capture?"

This conversation I overheard weighed heavily on my mind. Would those soldiers of the NSA who were preoccupied with trophies fight hand to hand with "the warriors of the invincible imperial army"? Would they charge like human bullets at the enemy's battery, for the sake of the Republic of China?

There was something unsettling in their way of talking and their gloomy eyes. It was a bad omen.

In Laoheishan we held a joint meeting of the Wangqing and Hunchun guerrilla units and once again conducted political work to give them a clear understanding of the purpose of the battle and its military and political significance.

Afterwards we advanced to the area of Gaoancun and Wushegou near the Dongning county town, and there we reconfirmed the enemy's condition and decided upon the plan of battle. That night we located the underground party organization near Dongning. It was an organization Pan had formed in Dongning, Gaoancun, Xinlicun, and Laoheishan and which he had guided while he was working as the secretary of the Suming central county party committee. It had been exposed and tracked down by the enemy in the spring of 1932; some of its members had escaped to Wangqing and the others, remaining in Dongning, had gone into hiding. At that time Pan had sent not only party members and Young Communist Leaguers but also many guerrillas and civilians to Wangqing.

When leaving for Hunchun, Pan had asked me to locate and contact the party and YCL members hidden underground, re-establish their line of organization and take good care of them for him if I had a chance of going to Dongning. Faithful to his request when we announced in Luozigou the program of the political work among the people, I included an item on reconstructing the underground party organization in Dongning County through efficient political work among local population.

We restructured the underground party organization in Dongning County with some party members we found in Gaoancun and its vicinity, and re-established its line of organizational guidance in such a way that the underground party organization in Luozigou guided its activities. This organization furnished us with a lot of information. Thanks to its efforts we opened a passage to the Soviet Union without difficulty.

This organization continued to exist in good condition until the 1940s, implementing our orders for secret operations to the letter. Following the meeting at Xiaohaerbaling we frequently used this passage when the Korean People's Revolutionary Army was operating in small units from the secret camps around Mt. Paektu and training camps in Khabarovsk, the Soviet Union. Many small units used to travel through this passage to the homeland and Jiandao and enter the border area of the Soviet Union and Manchuria from Mt. Paektu. Individual operatives who were sent to the homeland used this passage when traveling to the Maritime Province of the Soviet Union.

The small unit of Jon Mun Uk, which had been operating on a reconnaissance mission in the Soviet-Manchurian frontier region, also received much help from this underground party organization in Dongning. Ya. T. Novichenko, an internationalist soldier who served at that time in the army on the opposite side of Dongning County on the Soviet-Manchurian border, recalled that he saw small units of the KPRA making frequent use of this passage. The underground organizations in Dongning were active in harassing the enemy's rear at the time of the war against Japan, and rendered great assistance in the liberation of the county town.

From talks with the inhabitants of Gaoancun and the local area, and with members of the secret organizations, we learned that the regimental commander of the puppet Manchukuo army was strongly anti-Japanese, even though he served Manchukuo, and that there was bitter discord between the puppet Manchukuo army and the Japanese garrison in spite of their apparently peaceful relations. They said that the regimental commander was on good terms with Chinese shopkeepers in the county town and he acceded to their requests. The members of the underground party organization were well acquainted with the shopkeepers. We ordered these members to bring influence to bear on the shopkeepers in order to get the regimental commander to agree to collaborate with us.

The battle of the Dongning county town began on the night of September 6, 1933, and ended at noon on September 7. I think there were not many instances of battles lasting for 2 days in our war against Japan.

The main thrust of our attack on the county town was directed against a two-storied fort built on a mountain ridge outside the west gate. Several heavy and light machineguns were mounted in the fort. They had constructed a secret underground passage and a deep communication trench between the fort and the command post of the Japanese aggressors' army unit, so as to counter the enemy's attack by continuously throwing in reinforcements as necessary. This fort was responsible for the NSA's failure in their attack on the county town.

I posted the Hunchun company which was to block the enemy's reinforcements at a place called Jjajakgol and ordered the Wangqing company to advance along the main line of attack and seize the fort.

At 9 p.m. a demolition party from our unit, which had approached the enemy's line by stealth, concentrated its fire on the fort when my shot gave the signal for the attack on the town. The enemy reinforced his troops continuously through the communication trench and the underground passage. The fierce engagement between our forces and the enemy lasted for hours.

I made the guerrilla unit which had stormed into the town through the west gate blockade the enemy's barracks while other forces bypassed the fort to the north so as to divert the enemy's fire; then I sent in the demolition team to seize the fort by means of a violent bomb attack. The fort abandoned resistance and fell quiet near dawn. Our main force surrounded the barracks of the Japanese garrison in tight formation and mercilessly checked the enemy's desperate attempt to launch a counterattack. Some of the Japanese narrowly escaped through the north gate.

NSA units which had entered the town in advance in civilian disguise, and the other NSA units which had charged into the town through the east and south gates took up their specified places and fought the enemy.

The headquarters of the puppet Manchukuo army unit sent a representative to us to convey its acceptance of our proposal to attack the Japanese aggressors in joint operation. If the scheme had gone smoothly, the whole town would have fallen into our hands.

At that moment, however, some of Chai Shi-rong's units began plundering the shops under the control of the puppet Manchukuo army and robbing civilian houses; this caused the puppet Manchukuo army to withdraw from the agreement and instead launch an all-out attack on us. The Japanese garrison joined this attack.

Some of the NSA units, scared at the vigor of the enemy's attack, deserted the areas they had occupied and began to flee from the town.

Nevertheless, our unit, succeeding in pinning the enemy into a corner of the town, expanded the area we occupied by means of all-out street fighting. Encouraged by this, the NSA units then occupied the munitions factory and raided the munitions yards. The street fighting continued for hours.

Recognizing that the purpose of the joint operation had been largely accomplished, I gave orders to withdraw. Guerrilla units that had withdrawn on their own initiative provided covering fire for the withdrawing NSA units.

At this moment we were informed that Brigadier-general Shi Zhong-heng had been seriously wounded and was still in the town. His men had fled the town, leaving their commander in the jaws of death. His aide-de-camp had not assisted him, either.

In my mind's eye I saw the NSA soldiers who had been talking about trophies. When I heard them dreaming about opium and electric torches, I had been apprehensive of pillage and the effect it might have on the course of the battle. Such pillage had taken place during the battle. And then, to our surprise, the soldiers had deserted their commander. In general soldiers regard their superior officers as their fathers or mothers. So in a sense, the NSA soldiers had fled, leaving their parent in the jaws of death.

I had heard many stories of soldiers' conduct in war, but I had never heard of such dereliction of duty. There were links between the NSA soldiers' pillage and their faithless desertion of their commander. The greed for material wealth had been overflowed into an extreme of egoism and cowardice. A dipper that leaks in the house will also leak outside - how profound the truth of this proverb handed down to us by our ancestors!

A battle may be regarded as an extension and concise expression of everyday life. Soldiers' success in battle is always determined in advance in their everyday life, not on the battlefield. A battle is no more than the epitome and reflection of that life.

History knows no case of an army with inferior moral fiber being crowned with victory. The Nazi army of Hitler's Germany trembled to defeat mainly because they were morally inferior, having abandoned moral principles and driven their caterpillar tracks roughshod over the good and beautiful. The main reason why the Japanese army, which boasted of its invincibility, met its end was also its moral leprosy. Japan could not avoid being smothered by the encirclement of the allied forces and billions of honest-minded people who condemned and hated the Japanese army as the most brutal and shameless in the world. Never in the history of war has there been such a barbarous army as the Japanese army which invaded other countries and slaughtered their peoples, even taking "comfort girls" with them to battlefields.

War is not only a contest of strength, but also a test of morality and ethics. An army that neglects the influence which morality exerts on the course of a war or regards it as an inessential adornment is no more than a heap of rubbish.

I ordered Choe Chun Guk to rescue Shi Zhong-heng.

Choe and his men risked their lives to carry out my orders. Carrying Shi, who had been rescued by our guerrillas on our backs and covering our withdrawal with fire, we withdrew safely onto a hill. The guerrillas abused Shi's men who had abandoned him as cursed cowards. The NSA soldiers deserved this abuse for their behavior. But the relationship between the NSA and ourselves was not damaged by this affair.

The battle of the Dongning county town was significant not only because we killed several hundred enemy soldiers. The important point was that after going through this battle the NSA had full confidence in the Korean communists. The Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army was able to act in east Manchuria as proudly and legitimately as before while flying a red flag. This battle implanted the true image of the Korean communists in the minds of the NSA soldiers.

Afterwards the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist units would of their own free will beat those who attempted to harm our unit.

"September 7, 1933 is the day when I was born again. My life from that day was bestowed on me by Commander Kim, while my life until then was bestowed on me by my parents. I owe him my life; the AJPGA is the first brother of our national salvation army." These were Shi Zhong-heng's words when he regained consciousness.

His words spread a legendary tale to every corner of Manchuria, the legend that the AJPGA was a paragon of noble, self-sacrificing spirit and loyal comradeship.

On our way back from the Dongning county town to Luozigou, a journey of a hundred miles, I was constantly at the side of Brigadier-general Shi. All through the first day, we carried him on a stretcher. Even though they saw their commander was being carried by the guerrillas, the NSA soldiers dared not approach the stretcher and only watched him from a distance. His aide-de-camp and some of his men asked us to hand over their commander to them, but the guerrillas refused, and sent them away.

When his aide-de-camp approached our column for the third time, I ordered my men to hand over the stretcher. I persuaded the guerrillas by saying that the men had consciences, so they might feel sorry for their mistake, and even if we only granted the right to carry the stretcher, they would be able to atone for their crime to a small degree.

When we handed Shi Zhong-heng over, the NSA soldiers bowed to us graciously. Brigadier-general Shi greatly regretted the behavior of his men, and he apologized to us as a commanding officer for his subordinates' misbehavior.

"I am ashamed in front of you, Commander Kim, for these creatures of no account. It is because I have not educated them properly, so please blame me if you will, and have mercy on my men.

I was moved by his regarding his men's shame as his own. I would not have been so deeply moved had he given vent to his anger against his men or felt even a little bitterness against them. He was indeed a generous, fair-minded soldier. I said:

"As the Chinese proverb has it, even a sweet melon hangs on a bitter stalk. A man cannot always be perfect nor a flower be beautiful for a thousand days. You have regained consciousness following a serious Wound, and we are satisfied with that."

"Another Chinese proverb says that if a man wants to buy a horse he should study his teeth, and if he wants to make a friend he should know the other person's mind. I will take it as a godsend that I made your acquaintances Commander Kim, and treasure the gift for all my life."

Shi Zhong-heng, a dozen or more years older than I, became my blood-bound comrade-in-arms as we worked to establish the anti-Japanese allied front. After the battle of the Dongning county town he moved his unit to Xibeigou near Macun. We frequently visited each other as one visits relatives, and deepened our friendship.

I sent him various medicines for the treatment of his bullet wound, and exposed him to communist influence in an attempt to transform his ideology. As a result, he joined the Communist Party and became a commander of the people's revolutionary army.

He fought well in the anti-Japanese joint operations at Luozigou in June 1934, and rendered highly distinguished service as commander of the 2nd Independent Division after his unit was incorporated into the people's revolutionary army. In every battle he would lead the charge at the enemy's positions with a Mauser in his hand. This led his men to believe that he was the bravest commanding officer in the world. The soldiers of the other NSA units also respected and adored him. Quite a few of them transferred to Shi Zhong-heng's unit. He was fatally wounded in the abdomen while leading a charge at the battle of Laosongling. The bullet did not pass through him, lodging in the intestines. He went to the Soviet Union to have the bullet removed, but breathed his last there. When I heard others were mourning his death, I remembered him with aching grief.

Chai Shi-rong, who had joined us in the anti-Japanese front amid the flames of battle in the Dongning county town, was later transferred to the people's revolutionary army, becoming vice-commander and then commander of its 5th Army Corps. He made great efforts to maintain friendly ties with us when he was fighting under Zhou Bao-zhong in north Manchuria. I kept in close touch with him even as late as the early 1940s.

When the allied front between the AJPGA and the NSA had apparently become too strong to break as a result of the battle of the Dongning county town, an unexpected incident occurred which threatened to damage it.

The root cause was a remark by Wu Yi-cheng in praise of Chiang Jieshi. After returning to Luozigou we held a joint meeting to review the battle. Wu Yi-cheng spoke first. Speaking about the victory of the combined forces in the battle, he suddenly began to extol Chiang Kaisek and went on to say that the anti-Japanese war in the northeast of China would only be brought to a triumphant conclusion when Chiang sent guns and reinforcements from the south. This provoked the guerrillas to anger.

Paek Il Phyong, who was there as the commander of the Hunchun guerrilla unit, took the floor and accused Commander Wu, who had praised and supported Chiang Kaisek, of being a reactionary, asking how Chiang could possibly assist and lead us when the whole world knew that he was a running dog of imperialism.

In a blaze of anger Wu had him arrested and threatened to have him shot.

At this point, Paek's men rebelled. They protested: we did not lose a single rank-and-file guerrilla during the battle, and it is not logical to lose our commanding officer for the sake of the allied front; how could we possibly return to Hunchun after losing our commanding officer? We must save Comrade Paek Il Phyong even if it means fighting with Wu Yi-cheng to the last man of our unit. They were about to dash out with rifles in their hands.

The NSA soldiers had taken their rifles and were preparing to fire back.

In this hair-trigger situation a single gunshot would result in whole-sale deaths and the disruption of the allied front which had cost so much effort. Wu Yi-cheng turned pale and pursed his lips.

I jumped up on the platform and argued with both sides, in Korean and Chinese, and tried to reason with Wu Yi-cheng:

"You may feel angry, Commander Wu, but be generous and set Paek Il Phyong free. It was most presumptuous of him to call you a reactionary, and impugn your dignity, but you, too, must think this matter over. Will others listen willingly to your praise of Chiang Kaisek when the whole China condemns him as a puppet of the imperialists? It was he who kept telling Zhang Xue-liang not to fight against Japan before the September 18 incident. If you kill Paek, the whole of Manchuria will call you a traitor to the nation, so please give the matter deep thought."

As I finished my speech, some of the NSA soldiers asked themselves, "Who is that man? Is he from the south? A delegate from the Kuomintang?" Others answered, "From the south? No. He is Kim Il Sung, the commander of the guerrilla army."

"I spoke as I did out of ignorance, please do not regard me as the same kind of man as Chiang Kaisek," Wu Yi-cheng said, and declared he would withdraw his order to have Paek killed.

However, two days later he still had not released him. The rank-and-file soldiers of the NSA accused their commander of foolhardiness, saying, "Why does not Commander Wu keep his promise to Commander Kim?" Some of Wu's men said, "Everything will be alright if we do not shoot him. Can he kill any man he wants?" Another said, "Our national salvation army will be cursed if we kill him."

While the masses of the soldiers were agitated in this way, the officers lodged letters and petitions with Wu Yi-cheng, urging the release of Paek Il Phyong. Paek was released from detention by Wu after 3 days.

The process of cementing the allied front with the Chinese nationalist army units was beset with many such painful incidents; perseverance and sacrifice were required. How could the two "organisms" with the different blood types be effectively combined without difficulties and distress? For three successive days the enemy cremated the bodies of the soldiers who had been killed in the battle. Meanwhile, we lost Hu Jin-min. He was killed by an accidental shot on our way back to Luozigou.

8.4. A Comment on Ultra-Democracy in the Army

---

The Soviet line was a Leftist tendency in the establishment of government; military ultra-democracy was a Leftist ideological tendency which occurred in the command and administration of the army. It advocated absolute equality for every soldier, irrespective of his rank, in the command and administration of the army. In other words, it advocated excessive equalitarianism in all aspects of military activity, regarding it as an absolute. It was while we were directing the guerrilla army on our return to Wangqing from the campaign in south Manchuria that we first encountered the practice of ultra-democracy in the guerrilla army. At that time the tendency was at an incipient stage, and its effects were not serious.

As I acquainted myself with the work of the guerrilla army on my return to Wangqing after the battle of the Dongning county town, I realized that the ultra-democracy which had barely been germinating had now assumed definite weight in the command system of the army and was paralyzing that system.

The alarm was first raised concerning the danger of ultra-democracy in Dahuanggou, Hunchun County, in the autumn of 1933. Dahuanggou was a central guerrilla zone in Hunchun. Pan, the inspector from the Comintern, was murdered there by Park Tu Nam. At the same place, 13 soldiers of the Hunchun guerrilla unit who had fought in the Dongning county town were all killed in a single incident, bringing grief to all the people in east Manchuria.

A group of guerrillas who had returned to the guerrilla zone after the review of the battle held at Luozigou broke the fatigue of their journey for a while at a solitary house, celebrating Chusok or the day of the Harvest Moon. They relaxed the following day and the day after that, with a guard posted. A Japanese garrison discovered them and surprised them by surrounding the house by night.

The wisest thing to do in such a situation would have been to strike at the enemy's weak point and quickly fight a way through the enemy's encirclement. To do this the commander needed to judge the situation properly and make a prompt decision. But the company commander had no right to make a decision. One of the men was O Pin, an experienced soldier, but his words carried no weight because he had been demoted by the Leftists from the post of head of the military department of the county party committee to a mere soldier.

The Leftists who were in the higher levels of the leadership of the party bodies in those days did not allow the commanders the right to make a decision on military affairs. They maintained that everything concerning military operations must always be discussed at meetings and decided collectively, on the principle of majority rule. This became an iron rule which no one could ever break in the command and administration structures of the army, binding the commanders hand and foot. This abuse of democracy in military affairs weighed so heavily even on able commanding officers that it produced a state of functional paralysis.

Even at the critical moment when the armed enemy was tightening his encirclement in order to destroy them, they continued their nonsensical argument over whether to stand and fight the enemy or break out of the encirclement. Some sensible men insisted that they should fight, and not continue their empty talk until they were all destroyed, but the ultra democrats declared that no military action should be taken without a decision of the meeting.

This was nothing short of criminal suicide for the besieged guerrillas. While they continued their futile argument, the enemy fell upon them. Only then did the guerrillas stop arguing and begin fighting. The enemy fire mowed down 13 guerrillas. Only a few of them escaped death by a miracle. One of them came to Wangqing at O Pin's request and told me the details of how the 13 men had been killed. Paek Il Phyoung and O Pin were among the dead.

The soldier from Hunchun told me that, as he was elbowing his way through the heap of dead bodies, O Pin, with his intestines tumbling out of a wound in his belly, had said with his last breath: "I have no right to order you, but I am telling you as a party member to report this incident to Comrade Kim Li Sung without fail."

I cursed the advocates of ultra-democracy and the dogmatists who had blindly followed them in battle. Had it not been for the obstacle of this ultra-democracy, the Hunchun company could have broken the siege and averted such tragic losses.

These 13 comrades are still fresh in my memory; they had shared life in the shadow of death with me in the Dongning county town. As we were withdrawing from the town after the battle, they had come over fresh from their blocking mission, shaken my hands, set me on their shoulders, and tossed me in the air, saying that the Wangqing company had fought well. At the memorial service for the fallen comrades they had cried bitterly as they made speeches. I felt my heart choked at the news that these men of such burning passion and love had all been killed in one night.

Of these 13, O Pin was the most unforgettable. He had been introduced to me by Chae Su Hang when we were building revolutionary organizations around the six towns in the northern frontier region of Korea. While Chae was attending the Taesong Middle School in Longjing, O Pin had attended the Tonghung Middle School in the same town. Both schools had produced many figures of social importance and independence fighters. They had participated in the student movement together in Longjing. O Pin, together with Chae Su Hang, had attended the Kongsudok meeting and the winter Mingyuegou meeting which we convened. They had taken an active part in the discussion of the policy on the armed struggle.

It was probably in May 1931, that O Pin and Chae Su Hang guided me to Jongsong, the birthplace of Chae. My first step on Sinhung village after crossing the Tuman River with them on a smuggling boat is still as vivid in my memory as if it happened yesterday. Drinking in with profound emotion the beautiful verdure on the willowy bank and the ancient scene of the old castle site, we talked at length about the future of the motherland.

In the spring of that year, outside the north gate at Sinhung village, I met O Pin's father, O Ui Son, who was the head of the Anti-Imperialist Union in Jongsong. He had been eking out a living by sharecropping in Chatiaogou, Yanji County; when his son became a career revolutionary he had moved to Sinhung village with his family, and his house soon became a secret liaison point linking the AJPGA in the Wangqing area with all the underground revolutionary organizations in Jongsong County in the homeland.

Every time I went to Sinhung village, O Pin's family served me noodles. We spent the Tano festival or the fifth day of the fifth lunar month at this house in 1933. On that occasion O Ui Son went to a market in Phunggye, eight miles away, to buy buckwheat flour, and he made buckwheat noodles for us for lunch, noodles that reminded me of Pyongyang cold noodles.

They were suffering from a shortage of water. I worked with the spade as hard as if I were O Pin, who was then fighting in Hunchun. When I met O Pin at Luozigou before the battle of the Dongning county town, I said that his father in Sinhung village had served us buckwheat noodles for the Tano festival. When he heard this, his pleasure was evident. Even though he had been demoted to a soldier from the post of military department head of Hunchun County, he was not in the least disaffected or dispirited.

As I encouraged him not to lose heart, he said, "I am in high spirits, as you can see. My demotion cannot make me Kim Pin or Park Pin. Nevertheless, I do not feel like working in Hunchun any more. I am thinking of moving to Wangqing after the battle, if my superior permits it. What do you think of the idea?"

I answered, "I will be happy if you come to Wangqing. But remember that there are a lot of Leftists willing to brand people as 'Minsaengdan' members in Wangqing, too." "Is that so?"

"The Leftist wind never dies away in Wangqing."

"But I think I should feel light-hearted beside you. In any case, I shall come to Wangqing, come what may. When I say something I stick to it."

When we attacked the fort in the west of the town, he led the line of advance with a grenade in his hand. He was highly commended for this at the meeting to review the battle. When the units were parting with one another at Luozigou after the meeting he reaffirmed his firm intention. His resolve to come to Wangqing was unshakable. He said his determination had been strengthened when he saw the guerrillas from Wangqing capturing the fort and charging into the town during the battle. Naturally I promised him my full cooperation.

However, the sad news of O Pin's death reached Wangqing before I could keep that promise. Lee Kwang had been murdered in the spring, and Pan, the member of the provincial party committee, had been killed in the summer; today O Pin had gone to the world of no return without realizing his long-cherished desire.

The sad news of the death of 13 warriors including O Pin came as a bolt from the blue. Ever since then I have shuddered at the mention of ultra-democracy in military affairs, and never tolerated the slightest tendency towards it in our ranks.

This tendency was so repugnant to me because it was utterly destructive of revolutionary practice.

We still regard it as an absolute principle that all questions concerning military operations must be discussed by Party organizations and welcome that the creative opinions of the masses must be incorporated into the planning of military operations via the Party organizations. But we do not tolerate the encroachment of this principle of collectivism on the authority of the commanding officers who are in charge of the administration of their units.

In the early days of the war against the Japanese, however, ultra-democracy, on the excuse of collectivism, limited the authority of the commanding officers and paralyzed the command system in the administration of military units and conduct of operations.

In those days, in order to stimulate the creative energy of the party members there were party group meetings, branch meetings and committee meetings at all levels in the guerrilla army when military operations were being planned or during a battle, and there were also unit meetings similar to the general servicemen's meeting nowadays. The principle was to consider every aspect of the situation.

For all this, the Leftists, who regarded ultra-democracy as being as absolute as Napoleon's code of laws, maintained that all military matters, irrespective of their importance and the prevailing circumstances, should be discussed at party bodies of all levels and at unit meetings.

Suppose the revolutionary army was to attack a town. They discussed the plan first at a party group meeting, using a sketch map of the town without its name, deciding whether or not it was necessary to attack it and, if it was necessary, in what way, before a resolution was adopted.

When the need to do battle and the possibility of victory was confirmed at the meeting and a detailed plan of operations was mapped out, the same process was repeated at a branch meeting.

The same procedure was followed at the unit meeting, except that this was also attended by non-party members. They said: "We are going to attack a certain town, the attack will bring us great political and military benefits with no losses or few casualties, the plan of operations is such and such, we will surely emerge victorious if we fight in accordance with this plan."

Then they passed a decision, issued battle orders and attacked the town. Such meetings, which proceeded with agenda improvised as suddenly as a stone thrown into a lake, involved endless arguments, about the pros and cons of every possibility, before conclusions were finally reached. The right to an equal vote required by ultra-democracy resulted in time-consuming uproarious arguments involving everyone.

Operational plans which had gone through different meetings at different levels turned out to be useless as the enemy situation changed in the meantime. And when such an operation was undertaken the changed situation resulted in a heavy toll of the forces of the revolutionary army. The death of the 13 courageous men at Dahuanggou was a glaring example of the influence of ultra-democracy on military affairs.

Another expression of this abuse of democracy was the striving to establish excessive equality and impartiality in the revolutionary army. Such abuses were also witnessed in the units under my command.

One day, with Kim Myong Gyun, head of the military department of the county party committee, I paid a visit to the barracks of the 1st company to learn about its work. I found the company commander sweeping the yard and its political instructor chopping firewood with his men in a corner of the yard. I smiled at the laudable sight of officers working in harmony with their men. For some reason, however, the sight left Kim Myong Gyun cold.

"I'm pleased to see the commanding officers setting an example," I said, but the department head still seemed unimpressed. "Well, what about joining them?" I said, approaching a besom lying in a corner of the yard.

Kim Myong Gyun tugged gently at my sleeve, saying, "Let me show you an amazing sight." He ordered the duty officer to summon the company commander and political instructor immediately.

The officer answered, "Now is the morning cleaning time."

"Bring them here as you are ordered and no more idle talk!" Kim Myong Gyun demanded with no more ado.

The officer's response was not soft, either. "Then the company commander and political instructor will be criticized at the unit meeting"

I casually asked Kim Myong Gyun what the officer's answer meant. He replied, "It means that the company commander and political instructor must do the cleaning, setting aside everything else, when the soldiers are cleaning, for they are equal human beings."

This incident occurred when ultra-democracy was still at its incipient stage. This blind idea of equality was soon put into practice by the guerrilla army, and it paralyzed its command system for some time.

It is needless to say that of course every man, and every soldier, is equal as a human being. But in the revolutionary army - the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army or the Korean People's Army - every soldier is given different assignments in accordance with his duty. One man is designated company commander, another man platoon leader and another squad leader.

The various duties and assignments performed by soldiers place them in the relationship of superiors and subordinates in the revolutionary army, a company commander being superior to his platoon leaders, a platoon leader to his squad leaders and a squad leader to his men. The service regulations of the revolutionary army stipulate that subordinates shall obey the orders of their superiors without reservation. Otherwise it would be impossible to command the army and maintain iron discipline.

The service regulations of the anti-Japanese guerrilla army fully reflected the collective opinions of the soldiers and required the commanding personnel to abide by the regulations willingly.

However, the Left opportunists ignored the relationship between superiors and subordinates stipulated in the service regulations of the AJPGA, and this inflicted serious damage on the living tissue of the AJPGA, whose lifeblood was discipline, order and unity between the officers and men, and it undermined the army's moral basis.

Ultra-democracy in the army was an expression of ultra-egalitarianism. It even produced the unsavory practice of soldiers not respecting the superiors they had elected, speaking impolitely to them or disputing their orders on the excuse of equality.

An army in which subordinates do not salute their superiors, speak to them impolitely, or dispute their orders and instructions, is no longer an army. It is a rabble. Can one ever expect from such a rabble the noble comradeship and unity of ideology and purpose that encourage men to shield their commanders from danger and the latter to protect their men at the risk of their own lives? Can one ever expect from it the steel-like unity that enables them to speak with one voice, walk with the same gait and breathe as one?

Ultra-democracy in military affairs also required that a commander should do exactly what his men did in battle. The proverb, "Horns on the head, rosary beads on a string," states the simple truth that everything has its place. In other words, a commander and his men have different duties to perform in battle. A suckling infant is capable of understanding this.

Ultra-democrats in the army, however, preached that the commanders should fight in the front rank both in attack and defense, unafraid of death. This sermonizing made it impossible for the commanders to perform their duties properly. Commanders who were duty bound to study the combat situation from the best vantage point all the time and command the battle from a broad viewpoint, had to move about in the rank and file. That was why they were unable to control their units in accordance with the situation.

Certainly, a commander sometimes needs to take his place at the head of the attacking men, or to inspect the trenches and encourage the men by going through fire. When his personal example is required to change an adverse situation into a favorable one, he must, of course, stand in the front rank and encourage his men to destroy the enemy. But doing this in every situation is not the correct way to set an example.

When summing the results of battles in those days, commanders who moved in the front rank of the attacking formation, away from their command posts, were always extolled. Men would compete with one another in praising their commanders - one saying that his platoon leader did not fear the hail of bullets as he stood on the hill, commanding the battle, another boasting that his company commander jumped into the enemy's trench several meters ahead of his men, and another bragging that no battalion commander could be braver in fighting the enemy hand to hand than his battalion commander.

In this climate, the adventurism tendency to plunge, single-handed, into the enemy's position became endemic among the platoon leaders, company commanders and battalion commanders of all guerrilla units in east Manchuria, the very commanders who should have maintained the positions defined in the battle regulations, calculated the general development of the battle and determined their forces' future course of action. This tendency led to the deaths of many platoon and company officers, the basic unit commanders of the guerrilla units, in the early days of the war against the Japanese.

A great number of these single-handed heroes were produced in Wangqing - men such as Kim Chol, Kim Song Hyon and Lee Ung Man. Kim Chol and Kim Song Hyon - fell while leading charges in battle, and Lee Ung Man was wounded in the ankle while leading the fighting from the front.

Choe Hyon and Jo To On in Yanji were master-hands at the bayonet charge, famous throughout the whole of east Manchuria. They even carried out reconnaissance missions themselves, instead of sending their men. They were innocent adventurers, as naive in their actions as schoolboys, rather than military commanders.

Jo To On was a famous adventurer produced by the Yanji guerrilla unit. He was so good at whistling that from the early days the people in Yanji called him by the nickname of "Whistling Jo." Wherever he went, his nickname attracted the people's attention.

Even when his hair was gray and he had long given up whistling, he used to be known as "Whistling Jo," an expression of people's affection for this veteran who always braved the hail of bullets at the head of his men during the war against the Japanese. He became so accustomed to the nickname throughout his life he felt uncomfortable when he was called by his real name.

Once a visitor knocked at his door and asked, "Is this the house of Comrade Jo To On?" He answered bluntly, "Not Jo To On, but 'Whistling Jo.'" This reply embarrassed his visitor, but it showed how fond he was of the nickname his comrades-in-arms had given him during the anti-Japanese war.

If he had been alive, I would wish to recollect him by his nickname which was so popular among the masses.

Jo To On did not know how to write even his parents' names; only when he was much older than school age did he learn how to read and write the Korean alphabet, as well as studying the multiplication table and a Children's Reader. As soon as he was able to read and write, he became a member of the organization and the guerrilla army and then developed further to shoulder the heavy responsibility of a company commander. This company commander would go himself to reconnoiter enemy strongholds within sight, come back to his company, issue orders for a raid, and then dash like hurricane in the vanguard of the attack.

When he had captured several rifles at one time after reconnoitering and raiding positions of the enemy's self-defense corps in broad daylight, the Leftists gave wide publicity to his distinguished deed at various meetings and in the official papers. But this was one-sided propaganda which gave no consideration to the fact that Jo was a commanding officer who should have refrained from such adventures. However, as a result of that propaganda he became famous as a soldier throughout almost the whole of east Manchuria.

He was seriously wounded in the battle of Dadianzi while rushing at an enemy machinegun emplacement at the head of his unit. He was so near the machinegun that a bullet which hit him in the belly emerged diagonally from his back. His life was saved by miracle, but he had to live in hospital for six years because of the wound he received. He was Unable to return to his beloved company.

He was bedridden while the anti-Japanese armed struggle was developing to the level of victorious, large-unit operations over wide areas in south and north Manchuria and the homeland. The Korean People's Revolutionary Army became a legendary army known to the whole world and its just struggle became a beacon of light to the oppressed peoples of the world. This war required efficient commanders and veterans capable of directing new regiments and divisions. If he had not been disabled, Jo To On could have rendered tremendous service when the war against the Japanese was at its triumphant high tide.

The Leftists refused to pay attention to the safety of commanders until the distorted concept of democracy was finally eliminated from the army; it was only some time later that guards were organized in each of the regiments and divisions to protect the commander. The abuse of democracy in the revolutionary army was also expressed in the indiscriminate use of reward and punishment. The anti-Japanese guerrilla army had a system of reward and punishment designed to strengthen its fighting efficiency. We rewarded soldiers who were exemplary in combat, training and everyday life, and punished those who seriously violated the service regulations, applying various standards according to specific merits and demerits.

Ultra-democrats, however, disputed this system by arguing over why one comrade was awarded the first prize, and another the second prize, when they had both performed the same duty in the same squad, over why somebody was only given a reprimand and somebody else was given a warning when they had committed the same mistake; thus they bolstered opinion in support of indiscriminate application of regulations and brought pressure to bear upon us.

This surrealistic attitude undermined the basic aim of a system of reward and punishment. In short, ultra-democracy was a pernicious ideological trend that ran counter to our aspirations and efforts to foster the military, political and moral superiority of the anti-Japanese guerrilla army and advance the anti-Japanese armed struggle towards ultimate victory. If we had not eradicated this ideological trend in good time, all the commanders of the guerrilla army would sooner or later have been reduced to mere figureheads, and the guerrilla army to a lawless collective in which there was no distinction between the commanders and the rank and file, and ultimately to a rabble disarmed by itself.

Ultra-democracy, no matter what specific forms it took, was an opportunist trend derived from petit bourgeois ideology. It was, in effect, an anarchic tendency which had nothing in common with the revolutionary ideology of the working class.

Anarchism, a reflection of petit bourgeois ideology, derives from an extreme hatred for authority in general and a resistance to the political power of the bourgeoisie in particular. It attempted to introduce anarchic disorder and immoderate conduct into society, extolling ultra-democracy, radical freedom and self-indulgence.

Some radical ideologists, who represented the distress of the petit bourgeoisie, which was economically bankrupt and politically disenfranchised under the pressures of capitalist mass production and the political dictatorship of the bourgeoisie, attempted to lead the masses in opposition to state power in general by alleging that the political power of the capitalist class should be overthrown by violence and anarchism established.

The so-called "theory of anarchism" of such ideologists as the French petit bourgeois, Proudhon, and Bakunin and Kropotkin in Russia, which found expression in an extreme hatred for political power and unreasonable demands for social equality, was a destructive ideological trend which made it impossible to rouse the working masses to the struggle against the repression of the capitalists, to safeguard the gains of the revolution and establish truly popular and democratic systems in those countries which had overthrown the dictatorship of the exploiting class; it was condemned by the impartial judgment of history.

Nevertheless, for some time this ideological trend gave the petit bourgeoisie illusions about ultra-democracy and unrestricted freedom and it spread to some extent to the regions and countries where capitalist industry had not been developed on a large scale and the petit bourgeois and peasant mentality remained dominant. This is the major reason why quite a few people thought that anarchism made certain contributions to the struggle against capitalism.

Some working-class parties enlisted anarchic forces in the struggle to overthrow the reactionary regime of the landlords and bourgeoisie. It is well-known that the Soviet government cooperated with Makhno and his clique, an anarchic collective in the Ukraine, during the Civil War.

In the early days, when ultra-democracy emerged in the guerrilla army, anarchism still existed as a political idea that served a certain social stratum, the petit bourgeoisie in particular, as an expression of their revolutionary character, and it inflicted tangible harm on the revolutionary theory and practice of the working class.

This does not mean, however, that the only form taken by ultra-democracy was anarchism. The activities of the revisionists who emerged in the international working class movement also had elements in common with ultra-democracy. Under the cloak of democracy, they promoted bourgeois liberalism, anarchism, immoderacy and disorder, and they gave rise to social confusion and self-indulgence. In the light of this experience, we cannot but conclude that there is an ideological community between extreme bourgeois democracy and anarchism.

If ultra-democracy finds its way into the military sector, it will eventually produce anarchic confusion. Had it not been eliminated from the guerrilla army before it was too late, ultra-democracy could have irretrievably damaged the process of building up the guerrilla army and its military operations, and could have seriously hampered the overall development of the revolutionary movement.

When we were involved in combating it, with the firm determination of wiping it out, a meeting of commanders and political commissars of the guerrilla units in east Manchuria was convened in Shiliping to review the work done in the year and half since the guerrilla zones had been established and to take measures to defend these zones from the enemy's large-scale "punitive" operations.

I met Kim Il Ryong and Kim Jong Ryong at this meeting. The former was the commander and the latter the political commissar of the Antu guerrilla unit. The meeting was also attended by Lang and Cha Ryong Dok, commander and political commissar of the Helong guerrilla unit, and Lu Jin, Park Tong Gun and Park Kil, general commander, commander and political commissar of the Yanji guerrilla unit. Some comrades also came from the Hunchun guerrilla unit, but I cannot remember who they were.

This meeting also discussed measures for overcoming the ultra-democratic tendency in the command and administration of guerrilla units.

We maintained that the main factor in the command of a guerrilla unit was the authority of its commander and the establishment of rigid discipline and centralization, that the method of administration should give priority to political work. At the meeting I stressed the following points: The distinctions between the superior and the subordinate in a unit should be clear and absolute.

A commander should be steadfast and positive in executing the orders issued by his superior and unswervingly carry out a decision once he had made it. He should always take the initiative in commanding and act with determination, without wavering or hesitating in complicated and difficult circumstances. But this on no account means that he may resort to subjectivism and arbitrariness in commanding. He must know how to draw on the energy and wisdom of the masses in executing the orders of his superiors and in the command of battles. He should not command his unit only by means of orders, but engage the soldiers' conscious enthusiasm by giving priority to political work.

Today's war is not like wars in the days of slave-owning and feudal societies, when one contended for victory on a solitary horse; it is a modern, people's war in which the army and people fight as one. The outcome of a war is decided by the ability to allow fuller scope to the enthusiasm and creativity of the army and people. This requires that political work should be given definite precedence. Party meetings, unit meetings, explanations and propaganda by agitators are powerful means for political work. Commanders should therefore make effective use of these means.

I criticized the Hunchun guerrilla unit for its mistake in Dahuanggou and warned the representatives from the guerrilla units in all counties of the harmfulness of ultra-democracy in military affairs, showing that it had led to the loss of 13 guerrillas. Our younger generation might not easily understand or believe the episodes I have briefly mentioned here, or the childish nature of the infantile disorder of ultra-democracy as demonstrated in these episodes. But these are the true facts.

The infiltration of this malady into the guerrilla army in the early days of the armed struggle was a trial for those of us who bore the heavy burden of defending the guerrilla bases and creating the allied front while also being responsible for administering the army.

At the meeting we stressed once again that guerrilla units should be commanded and managed in accordance with the principle of individual responsibility on a basis of democracy. After the incident in Dahuanggou two contradictory tendencies appeared in the guerrilla units. One supported the enforcement of one-man management system with a single commander, and the other insisted upon continued adherence to the democratic principle in army administration. These two positions each had merits and demerits.

Rendering the one-man management system absolute might give rise to arbitrariness and subjectivity in the command and administration of the army, while making democracy absolute might deprive the army of promptness and efficiency in its command and management. So I proposed the principle of one-man management system based on democracy for discussion. According to this principle a commander's responsibility to command and administer his unit was based on a decision made by the party organization following collective discussion.

Collective discussion based on democracy would enable complex and difficult military tasks at each period to be carried out satisfactorily by exploiting the masses' collective wisdom, whereas the one-man management system based on the discussion would enhance the commander's sense of responsibility and role in accordance with the military requirements, the prerequisite for which was a high degree of promptness, determination and concerted action.

We also stressed the need to establish iron discipline in the guerrilla army by maintaining a well-regulated system of command within it. A commander's orders are not an expression of individual opinion; they are an expression of the democratic and organizational opinion of the body of a higher level. Military orders possess legal force and a commander is responsible before the law for the orders he has issued. The rank and file should never in the least degree discount or dispute orders; they are duty bound to execute them promptly and without fail, whatever the circumstances. Commanders should command and supervise the carrying out of their orders in an appropriate manner.

We also discussed the tasks of creating a sound ideological atmosphere in the units and of consolidating revolutionary unity between the superiors and subordinates by intensifying the study of communist ideology and the struggle against such petit bourgeois ideologies as the infantile equality and anarchism pursued by ultra-democracy in military affairs. The meeting at Shiliping enlightened the commanders of the guerrilla army. In the subsequent trials of repeated battle ultra-democracy was eliminated from the army once and for all.

I-lad we not completely overcome ultra-democracy in the army in the early days of the anti-Japanese war, we would not have been able to consolidate the invincible ranks of the Korean People's Army in such a short period of time after liberation, nor would we have emerged victorious in the fight against the international allied forces of imperialism headed by us imperialism.

It is now a matter of course that our People's Army contains neither those who insist on unprincipled equality and impartiality nor those who dispute their superiors' orders. The soldiers answer their superiors' orders only by saying, "I understand!" Our People's Army is a collective of loyal soldiers who live in a spirit of unity of superiors and subordinates, unity of army and people, a spirit of constant self-reliance and fortitude from the day they take the oath of the military code of conduct to the moment they are discharged from the service.

If anyone wishes to know our soldiers' attitude towards democracy, he need only understand their militant slogan, "When the Party decides, we do everything!" If he wants to see the genuine features of unity between superiors and subordinates manifested in the deeds of our soldiers, he need only learn of the last moments of Heroes Kim Kwang Chol and Han Yong Chol, who had sacrificed their lives for the sake of many of their comrades-in-arms. Ultra-democracy was liquidated a long time ago, but it must still be guarded against.

We safeguard democracy but oppose ultra-democracy; we maintain equality but we regard ultra-egalitarianism as taboo, because both of these extremes invite revisionism. There are quite a number of people on the Earth who are anxious to see our style of socialism corrupted by the filthy germ of revisionism. Our people and the People's Army therefore never tolerate the infiltration of our ranks by revisionism.

We do not want our Party to be reduced to a club or a market-place by the tendency of ultra-democracy. The suffering inflicted upon us by the evils of ultra democracy in military affairs during the anti-Japanese war and the lessons of Eastern Europe cry out to us that we must not allow this.

8.5. Operation Macun

---

An epidemic of fever broke out in the guerrilla zone in the autumn of that year. This acute disease, with the symptoms of chill, high fever and rash, swept through the valley of Xiaowangqiflg. I, too, fell ill and was confined to my bed in Shiliping. I learnt later that this illness was an eruptive typhus.

The younger generation nowadays does not know what this disease is like, for they live in a land which has long been free of epidemics.

But when we were waging the armed struggle in the mountains 60 years ago, the people in the guerrilla zone went through untold suffering from epidemics. Since thousands of people lived in the relatively small valley, epidemics of various kinds would break out. The enemy's "punitive" forces would attack frequently, creating havoc as they pursued people from hill to hill, so we could not improve the unsanitary conditions and take appropriate measures to prevent epidemics, even though we wished to. All we could do was to stretch a straw rope across the gate of the house of people who had been affected or paste a warning notice on the wall: "Off limits. An epidemic site."

This was the worst possible trial for us - an epidemic raged at the same time as the enemy hurled thousands of troops against us day in and day out, in a do-or-die attempt to eliminate the guerrilla zone. To make matters worse, I was ill and many of the leadership were pale with worry over the fate of the guerrilla zone.

They sent a platoon leader, Kim ThaeK Gun, together with his wife and about a platoon of soldiers to guard and attend to me. When the other units went out to fight, these guerrillas remained behind to defend Shiliping. Mr. and Mrs. Kim had been living in Yehe in north Manchuria and had moved to Wangqing by way of Muling, determined to participate in the revolutionary struggle in east Manchuria.

In addition, Choe Kum Suk, the Wangqing county party committee member for women's work, stayed in Shiliping, on assignment from the party committee to nurse me. At first I received medical care in the front room of the house of a woman called Chun Ja. Her husband, Kim Kwon Ii, had been the secretary of a district party committee and later worked as the secretary of the county party committee.

Whenever the enemy attacked the guerrilla zone, Kim ThaeK Gun would carry me on his back from valley to valley to seek shelter.

As the enemy's "punitive" operations intensified, they carried me deep into a valley in Shiliping along a water course, and built a hut for my shelter under a huge steep rock, difficult for the enemy to assault. One could only approach it by means of a rope hanging down the rock. Here I recovered completely thanks to the ministrations of the three people tending me.

These unforgettable individuals snatched me from the jaws of death. But for their diligent nursing, I would not have survived in the valley of Shiliping. I was so ill that I lost consciousness several times. I was told later that each time I slipped into a coma, they would shed tears, and cried, "For goodness" sake, pull yourself together. What shall we do if you are so ill?" And when Kim ThaeK Gun was out looking for provisions, Choe Kum Suk would support me as we wandered in search of a shelter. It is no exaggeration to say that I only recovered thanks to her help.

I had received much assistance from Choe since the early days after my arrival at Wangqing. When I had arrived at Macun from the campaign in north and south Manchuria, she was the member of the party committee of district No. 2, Dawangqing, for women's work. At that time Lee Sin Gun had been in charge of the women's association of the county. Whenever Choe came to Lee to discuss their work, I would often see her at Lee Chi Baek's house. They were on intimate terms, as close as sisters.

Lee Sin Gun praised her greatly for having a fast hand at writing, to which I paid no heed at first. I simply wondered how fast she could write. But I was surprised when I saw the minutes of a meeting she had taken. The contents of the speeches delivered at the meeting had been recorded in full. Modern stenographers are said to write fast, but I have not seen one who could compare to her. She could file away all the discussions we had in a single night. We let her record the proceedings of important meetings.

She was as magnanimous as a man and warm-hearted; and at the same time, she was a woman of principle, faithful to the revolution. She would have hauled a boat over a sandy beach if I had asked her to do it. I sent her to the enemy-controlled areas on several occasions on various missions, and she worked efficiently there.

As a woman, she sympathized very much with me for having lost my parents. She took the same loving care of me she would have taken of her own younger brother, and I called her "sister." She would visit me before anybody else whenever I returned from the battlefield, slipping into my hands something she felt I needed. Sometimes she would sew up tears in my clothes and knit wool into underwear for me. If she did not come to Lishugou for a long time, I would go to see her.

We were so much like brother and sister that we would laugh and joke when we met. When she met old people in the village, she would address them in the dialect of Hamgyong Province. The words she used were funny and her intonation was even more interesting. Even when I mimicked the way she spoke and carried the joke too far, she did not get angry, but simply smiled. But broad-minded as she was, she would not accept jokes about her being pretty.

If I said she was a beauty she would explode, saying that I was making fun of her. I enjoyed it when she pounded me on the back with her fists, so I would joke and call her a beauty in spite of her awkward feelings. In fact she had a cherubic face, though she was not a woman of great beauty. But to me, women such as Choe Kum Suk in the guerrilla zone were much nobler and prettier than the girls and ladies in the big towns. I thought no women in the world were more beautiful than those in the guerrilla zone.

Even though they lived year in and year out among powder fumes, without once making up their faces, they did not complain nor became bitter; they simply devoted themselves to the revolution. I thought they were most beautiful. No doubt it was this attitude of mine that led me to call Choe Kum Suk a pretty girl. In those days I would spare nothing to make the women in the guerrilla zone look much more beautiful.

We often found face powder, cream and other cosmetics among the trophies we had captured. At first, when they saw these articles, our guerrillas would throw them into a stream or trample on them, saying that they were things used to make the faces of Japanese jades beautiful. For some time I did not interfere in the way the aromatic, high-quality trophies were disposed of. For I thought they were useless. Our women in the guerrilla zone did not paint their faces in those days. They all shared the view that to smell of face powder or perfume was a sin. Some women made up their faces once in a long while on holidays, but when they came to gatherings, they would take seats in the back corners, feeling sensitive to the others' views.

I regretted this. I thought it painful that they should live a hard life with their faces stained with soot and ashes, Smelling of powder fumes all the year round and not making up their faces even once. So I said to the guerrillas, "None of us must throw away cosmetics from now on. We have women among us, our women in the guerrilla zone. Where on earth are there women more wonderful than our woman guerrillas and women's association members?"

The soldiers replied in one voice, "You are right. There are no women in the world more wonderful than our women in the guerrilla zone. They did not go to the enemy-controlled area, but have shared their lives with the guerrillas for a year and a half, even though they are bereaved of husbands, children and lovers by the 'punitive' atrocities, live on herb roots and tree bark and shiver with cold out in the open in unlined clothes in the dead of winter. We feel ashamed and regret that we Korean men have not made it possible for them to dress in silks and paint their faces with rouge and lipstick so that they could show themselves off to the world. Let us send them all the best things we have captured, even though we don't eat enough and are poorly-clothed. Let us allow them to powder their faces if there are cosmetics."

One day we captured cosmetics from the enemy and took them to Choe Kum Suk to give to the women's association members. She was tremendously excited at the sight of a bundle of cosmetics. From that day the smell of face powder began to hang in the air in the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone. When I went to a club to enjoy a performance of the children's art troupe on one holiday, I could smell face powder and cream there.

Only Choc Kum Suk did not make herself up even after several days had passed. I was concerned, and I asked her why she did not. She only smiled instead of answering. There seemed to be some reasons I did not know. So I asked Lee Sin Gun what the reason was, and was told that Choe had given her share of cosmetics to a women's association member in Shiliping.

Later, we attacked the enemy behind his lines and again captured plentiful cosmetics. I gave some of them to Choc Kum Suk, saying that she should not give them to others this time, but make up her own face, for I wished to see her face powdered. She promised me that she would do this in gratitude to me for capturing the cosmetics at the risk of my life. A few days later on my way to Shiliping to give guidance to the work of Choe Chun Guk's company, I saw Choe Kum Suk, the head of the women's association of Dawangqing, sitting looking very smart at the edge of the River Dawangqing, looking down at the water with her back turned to the road.

I got my orderly, Lee Song Lim, to inquire why she was there. From a distance I saw the orderly approach and salute her. Then, all of a sudden he split his sides with laughter for some reason. Curious, I walked over to them quickly. No sooner did I reach the edge of the stream than Lee stopped laughing and pointed at Choe's face with his finger, "Comrade Commander, look at her face."

I could not help smiling myself. Her clean, good-looking face was spottily painted with rouge and cream. But Choe only looked up at us without understanding what was the matter. "Your face has become a world map, auntie," Lee said.

"Oh, my!" Choe Kum Suk exclaimed, and she plumped down and began to splash water on her face. Clumsy painting is no cause for guilt or shame, but she was totally at a loss, as though she had done something shameful. On a laundry stone close by I saw a puff-box and cream case I had sent to her a few days before.

I realized she had no skill at making-up and was very clumsy at it. But how could I make fun of that? She was making up her face for the first time in her life. Worse still, she had no hand mirror. So she had carefully put rouge and cream on her face as she looked down at her reflection in the water. It was neither surprising nor funny that she painted her face like a map of the world.

As Lee Song Lim approached her to tease her once again, I waved my hand to check him. If he had said a few words more at that time, she would have broken into tears and fled. I am sure that women who make their faces up with high-quality toilet articles in front of full-length mirrors or at dressing-tables with triple mirrors every morning, will sympathize with Choe Kum Suk when they read this part. I have heard that nowadays it is the fashion for girls who get married to take a dressing-table with triple mirrors with them among their personal belongings. This is material proof that our women wish to make their life more abundant and civilized.

But in those days when we had to eat gruel mixed with vegetables and lie out on the frozen earth, fighting desperate battles to defend the guerrilla zone, only a few of the women in Xiaowangqing had hand mirrors, and they could never dream of dressing-tables. So they went to the riverside, as Choe Kum Suk did, if they wanted to make themselves up.

That day I did not reproach Lee Song Lim for ridiculing Choe's make-up skill, but I chided myself for not having paid attention to obtaining mirrors for the women in the guerrilla zone. Our sympathy for them was nothing when compared to the affection they had for us. Our love for the people could in no way surpass the infinite affection with which they had supported us and attended on us.

This was the case with Choe Kum Suk. She nursed me all the time with a warm affection and sincerity worth many times more than the confidence I had placed in her. When my illness took a turn for the better, she ran to Tumen 25 miles away before going anywhere else. Tumen was a trading center for a range of Korean produce. She bought a bundle of Korean pears and apples there and returned to Shiliping.

I was moved to tears to see them. I even suffered from the hallucination that my mother in the world beyond had transformed herself into Choe Kum Suk and was giving me her love. It was indeed a love that only one's own mother or sister could give.

Inhaling deeply the fragrance of the fruits of my motherland which she had put in my hand, I said, full of gratitude, "Sister, how can I repay your kindness?"

"What kindness? If you are so eager to return it, then take me round the sights of Pyongyang after the liberation. I have heard Pyongyang is the most beautiful place in the world." Her reply was half serious and half joking and yet somehow very earnest. "Never mind. I am sure I can make your wish come true. Neither of us must be killed, but fight on in order to set our feet on the soil of Pyongyang when the motherland is liberated, sister."

"I shall not die. But I always feel uneasy for you, for you don't take care of yourself." In order to tempt my appetite she obtained some sesame pounded in a mortar and mixed it into my dishes and gruel. She took pains to serve me with delicious fatty foods, saying that I had fallen seriously ill through lack of nourishment. She made the utmost effort, but everything was scarce or running short at that time.

Kim Thaek Gun caught minnow in a stream and boiled them in soy sauce or broiled them to feed me. He would catch 70 or 80 of minnow a day. He was not only enthusiastic, but very skilful at fishing.

Ashamed of serving only those fish at every meal, Choe went to the village and got noodles. To the guerrillas who inquired after my health, she said, "The Commander must recover as soon as possible, but the trouble is that there is nothing to feed him, it upsets me to prepare his meal everyday from the fish caught by Thaek Gun, but the Commander says he enjoys eating them."

On hearing this, those members of my unit who were master-hands at fishing caught a sackful of fish with dragnet one day and came to visit me. Choe Kum Suk prepared it in various ways and produced a dish for every meal. When I got a little better, she told me I had continually called out the name of a woman she did not know when I had been in a coma and she mimicked it; it was a joke she had invented with Kim Thaek Gun's wife. It was quite absurd, but I was convulsed with laughter for the first time since I had fallen ill. Looking back upon it now, I see it was laughter through tears. I was well aware of that they were playing the fool in order to cheer me up after being bedridden for so long.

Choe Kum Suk's care of me even included telling me a false date to prevent me going back to Macun before I recovered completely. Whenever I came round from a coma, I asked her how long I had been unconscious, and each time she would reduce the real period. For instance, if I had been in a coma for two days, she said it was two hours and if it had been five days, she would say five hours. After recovering completely, I added up the days from what she had told me and thought that only ten days had passed since I fell ill. I felt quite relieved to hear that.

The lie she had told me was exposed when Choe Chun Guk came to visit me. This honest political instructor could never tell a lie. He told me that I had been bed-bound for a month. She reproved innocent Choe Chun Guk for his tactlessness, but I immediately gathered myself and returned to Macun.

A mountain of information was awaiting me at headquarters. The data illustrated various aspects of the Japanese imperialists' moves to bring Jiandao under their rule. During the month I had been ill, the enemy had completed the preparations for winter "punitive" operations. High-ranking officials dispatched from the Japanese Cabinet had come to Jiandao and reached a final decision on the plan for winter "punitive" operations against the guerrilla bases in east Manchuria, after discussing the matter with the brains of the army, gendarmerie-police and diplomats in the field. The issue had even been discussed at a Cabinet meeting in Tokyo.

At meetings the Japanese imperialists held to discuss the problem of Manchuria, they claimed that "Operations for public peace in Manchuria must begin with Jiandao!" They asserted that the conquest of Jiandao was inseparably linked not only with the great cause of building up the puppet Kingdom of Manchukuo but with the security of the frontier of the Empire of Japan; its conquest was therefore a matter of great urgency for the sake of Manchukuo as well as of Japan herself. They also alleged that this campaign should be blessed for the sake of the future of the great Kingdom of Manchukuo and that the commander of the Kwangtung Army, whose mission it was to invade the Soviet Union, should supervise the police institutions in Manchuria and that its provost marshal, charged with the control of the army, be in the forefront of the conquest of Jiandao.

After rigging up Manchukuo the Japanese imperialists had adopted several important measures to maintain public peace in the area. They committed a division of the Kwangtung Army to "punitive" operations as a replacement for the Jiandao task force, established an armed constabulary in each county, and established a secret service, judiciary police and industrial police; in this way they made the police structure three-dimensional and expanded it on a large scale.

Associations for the maintenance of public peace were organized throughout Manchuria as joint consultative organs of Japan and Manchukuo for the liquidation of insurgents and the pacification of public opinion. Each province and county was a unit, in addition to the center; furthermore, various spy organizations emerged and stretched out their tentacles towards the communist camp. Through the introduction of the collective security system which had existed in China in the old days and which had proved effective for Japan in the maintenance of public order in Taiwan and Kwangtung area, the Japanese and Manchukuo police bound the people hand and foot.

Large-scale colonization by armed Japanese immigrants who were reserve soldiers and the expansion of the self-defense corps forces helped to check the anti-Manchukuo, anti-Japanese forces which had deep roots in the three provinces of northeast China. The Japanese imperialists empowered local secret-service policemen engaged in the work with rebels to execute them on the spot.

All of these measures showed what painstaking efforts the Japanese imperialists had exerted to dominate and retain the colony of Manchukuo. A particular headache for them was the armed struggle in the Jiandao area, waged by Korean communists who struck at the face and back of the Empire in the northeastern corner of China, and the full-scale national liberation movement of which this struggle was a mainstay.

It was no exaggeration when a Japanese provost marshal said that the conquest of Jiandao would be 90 per cent achieved if the Korean communists' activities were suppressed. The so-called great Empire of Japan was so afraid of the Anti-Japanese People's Guerilla Army and the guerrilla zones, its strongpoint. The Japanese imperialists therefore made frenzied attempts to eliminate the anti-Japanese guerrilla zones in east Manchuria at any cost.

In the summer of 1933 the military authorities of Japan recalled to Korea part of the Jiandao task force which had suffered heavy casualties from the attacks of the AJPGA and dispatched in its place the Hitomi unit and many other crack troops of the Kwangtung Army to various parts of east Manchuria. The main forces of their occupation army in Korea were concentrated in the northern frontier region of our country, so that they could be promptly committed to "mopping-up" operations in the guerrilla zones. Large armed forces - over ten thousand men in all - encircled the guerrilla zones in Jiandao and began winter "punitive" operations.

Directing his main effort to the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone, where the General Staff of the Korean revolution was situated, the enemy hurled against this area forces of 5,000 men from the Kwangtung Army, the puppet Manchukuo army, the police and self-defense corps. The density of the enemy's troop dispositions in this battle has never been surpassed in any war except the wars of pre-modern days in which the belligerent armies contended for victory in square formation, and the battle fought in Lushun (Port Arthur) during the Russo-Japanese War, since the advent of skirmish-line warfare. The enemy even put his air force on alert. Special detective teams supervised by the Jiandao secret service were also dispatched to the areas surrounding the guerrilla zones.

Thus the whole region of east Manchuria became the field of the most fierce and bloody battle between the Japanese imperialists and the Korean communists. It was more a final showdown than a battle for the defense of a few guerrilla zones.

The guerrilla forces in Xiaowangqing were only two companies. Worse still, food reserves were low there. The guerrilla bases in east Manchuria found themselves in a critical situation that threatened their very existence. No one in the guerrilla zone was optimistic enough to believe that the two companies could defeat the powerful enemy armed with guns and aircraft. We were caught between two alternatives - fighting to the last man or abandoning the guerrilla zone and surrendering to the enemy.

We chose to fight to the last. According to the principles of guerrilla tactics, the best thing to do was to avoid a showdown. But if we did not fight, the enemy would swallow up the guerrilla zones on the Tuman

River in a single gulp. If we did not defend these zones the revolutionary masses who had been enjoying genuine equality and freedom under the care of the people's revolutionary government would be frozen, starved and shot to death in the dead of Winter. Furthermore, the people would no longer look up to us.

The autumn scenery of Wangqing was magnificent, but it was about to be ruined by the furious storm of the winter "punitive" operations. All of the guerrilla zones turned to us in tense anticipation. The people's countenances brightened or clouded depending on the soldiers' expressions.

I began to look for some ingenious scheme, but none occurred to my mind. There was no man at my side with whom I could discuss tactical problems. Park Hun, a graduate from the Huangpu Military Academy, was absent; Kim Myong Gyun, xiaogezi (little man?Tr.), who had served in the Soviet army for some years, and Lee Ung Gol, a graduate from a military academy of the Independence Army, had disappeared after being accused of being members of the "Minsaengdan."

Yang Song Ryong, too, had fallen a prey to the "Minsaengdan" nonsense.

I even thought how happy I would be if such a famous general as Hong Bom Do was with us. Hong was a Righteous Volunteers' Army general who had won a brilliant repute on the soil of Wangqing. The brilliant victories the Independence Army had won at Qingshanli and Fengwugou could be said to be the brainchild of Hong Bom Do. Some people belittled him by saying that he was a general who fought with an intuitive knack, without any strategy, but that was nonsense. What they had described as a knack was in the final analysis the product of strategic genius.

When he was alive, my father often said that Hong Bom Do was a man of remarkable resources. Had he not been a resourceful man, he would not have dealt such a telling blow to the Japanese army on the Gaoli Pass by employing skilful ambushes so cleverly and prudently. Those who could not discern the intelligence concealed beneath his woodcutter's appearance, should not have claimed that they knew him. Many years had passed since this commander-in-chief of the Korean Independence Army, who once had had the area around Haerbaling under his thumb, concealed his whereabouts. His image seemed to be fading from the people's memory with the passage of time. My distressed mind was tormented by a yearning for help from my forerunners.

As I was struggling day in and day out with the problem of strategy in the log-cabin of the headquarters, the old man Lee Chi Baek called on me with a pot of honey one midnight. Holding out the pot to me, he said, "I am sorry that I did not give you anything when you were suffering from fever. Please take this honey to help you recover.

"Wild honey is worth its weight in gold. You did wonders to obtain it."

"Old man Ma who lives at the entrance of Hwanggarigol got it. A few days ago he boasted that he had collected some wild honey, so I went to see him. He gave me the whole pot, saying he would sell even his house to obtain anything that was helpful to your health. I am on my way back from his house now."

I felt my heart overflow with gratitude for their consideration.

"Thank you very much, but I am young. You should take this honey."

"Please do not decline the kindness of old man. I have suffered constant regret for not nursing you. You look haggard beyond description, Commander."

He pulled at my sleeve, suggesting that we take pot luck at his house. I followed him without objecting. A meal with him was welcome, but I was more interested in spending a night in the house still scented by the presence of Pan. Even though I had moved my lodging, I left a large share of my affection with the generous, kind-hearted family who had taken care of me as warmly as if I was their own son.

We ate corn gruel mixed with kidney beans and pumpkin as a mid-night snack. The food tasted sweet, perhaps because I had just recovered from my febrile disease. The hostess, Mrs. So Song Nyo, was well aware of my likes and dislikes in food. The most notable food she used to treat me to was potato and maize roast. The potatoes in the Jiandao area were large and the year-old ones contained a lot of sugar. Such roasted potatoes with turnip pickle soup tasted wonderful on a day when it was snowing heavily.

After the snack I lay beside the old man in the room where Pan had stayed.

The old man could not sleep for some reason; he kept sighing continually. I thought he was yearning for his son who had passed away a few months before. His son, Lee Min Gwon, had been severely wounded in an attempt to disarm Guan's unit when it was about to surrender to the enemy in the spring of 1933; he had died while undergoing treatment in a hospital in Qiuyuegou. I myself participated in the ceremony held in the memory of Lee Min Gwon. In September 1932, a memorial service for the guerrilla, Choe Yun Sik, was held in this house. "Why do you keep sighing all night long, father?" I asked him, pushing aside the quilt and turning round on the bed to face him.

"I cannot go to sleep. How can I sleep in peace when I have heard that thousands of the enemies are encamped at the entrance to the guerrilla zone? They say that the guerrilla army will be crushed in this 'mopping up' operation. What do you think, Commander?"

"It is a false rumor spread by the reactionaries. But if we don't make full preparations, the guerrilla zone will collapse in two or three days. Frankly speaking, the destiny of the guerrilla zone is hanging in the balance. So I cannot sleep, either."

"It makes no sense for the guerrilla zone to be destroyed. How can we live without this zone? We would rather kiss the dust or give up the ghost."

"You are quite right. If we are to die, then we must fall in this guerrilla zone. But what should we do? The enemy numbers thousands, and our army defending Xiaowangqing is no more than one hundredth of the size of the enemy."

The old man puffed nervously at a cigarette and spoke in a serious tone of voice, pushing his pillow in front of my face, "If you are short of soldiers, I will become one for you. There are quite a few old men like me in Xiaowangqing who know how to fire a rifle. They will be able to fight much better than the Kanghwajin guard corps if each of them is given a rifle. I think there are rifles and ammunition that the Independence Army soldiers buried somewhere near Zhongqingli where we lived before.

If you can find them, you can surely arm the hunters and the old men who were Independence Army soldiers in the old days as well as the young people like my son-in-law, Jung Gwon, who is busy with some kind of youth work. Everyone should become a fighter and fight to the death fight. If we have no rifles, we must defend the guerrilla zone by clutching the enemy's throat and giving him a belly throw."

At the time when I was in despair over the disparity between our forces and the enemy's, his remark suggested to me that the only way out of the impending difficulties was an all-people resistance. I felt confident that we could seize the initiative in the fight if we fought a death-defying struggle in every quarter, by enlisting not only such paramilitary organizations as the self-defense corps and the Children's Vanguard, which I had intended to use to man the front line with the guerrilla army, but also the unarmed people.

The defensive battle at Xiaowangqing would have to be a battle between the enemy's army and every soldier and civilian in the guerrilla zone, rather than a battle between the enemy's army and the anti-Japanese guerrilla army. We could also count on the support of the people from the semi-guerrilla zone.

This talk with Lee Chi Baek encouraged me. I thought, "He is right. When the people say they will fight and they can win, they mean what they say. Victory in war depends on the will of the people and on how efficiently one enlists them."

Thus I received my first inspiration while listening to the calm voice of an old man who represented the opinion of thousands of people in the Wangqing guerrilla zone. The plan of operations we were mapping out had without fail to contain the people's will as expressed by the old man Lee.

I resolved that the defensive battle we were going to wage at Xiaowangqing should be made an all-out fight fought by all the people, young and old, men and women, in the guerrilla zone. This definition of all-out resistance was an expression of our supreme confidence in the people in the guerrilla zone, who had been sharing life and death, weal and woe, with the army for the past two years. The significant period for which fighting itself had been our routine in the guerrilla zone allowed me to feel such confidence.

The guerrilla zones could not have remained strong for two years after their establishment through the efforts of the army alone. One factor was the efforts of the people, who had played a considerable part in building up the army and defending the guerrilla zones. When we fought a hard battle with the enemy, who was ten or a hundred times stronger than us, we felt strong when we had the people in our rear. When we sensed their breath as they ran along the trenches, bringing hot water and rice balls, our combat efficiency increased a thousand times.

This faith in the people's strength underlay my decision to fight an all-out battle and my plan of battle. This determination conformed to the people's will to become an integral whole with the army under all circumstances and their determination to live in the guerrilla base, if they were to live, and die there if they were to die. An all-out effort by the people, when enlisted, would be a formidable force.

This was the reserve force of the guerrilla army suggested by the old man, Lee Chi Baek. But in fact the people of the guerrilla base were not a mere reserve force; they were a most reliable component of the main force.

We reaffirmed the tactical principles of attacking and destroying dispersed enemy forces by concentrated initiatives and of dispersing and harassing the enemy behind his lines when he came under attack from concentrated forces. We then called on all the people in Xiaowangqing to offer all-out resistance.

In response to the appeal, all the organizations and social strata turned out as one for the preparations for the decisive battle. The self-defense corps and young volunteers' corps advanced to the defensive position together with the guerrilla army and the young and middle-aged men without weapons piled up rock barricades on the steep heights along the line of defense.

The famous hunters Jang, Choe, Lee and others from Wangqing came to Macun, formed a hunters' corps with the veterans of the Independence Army, and then took the field. The women's stretcher teams and cooking units also went on the alert. Children set spiked wooden planks in the roads along which the enemy's convoy was expected. The infirm and small children were evacuated to safe places.

We made full preparations for the fight in the determination not to follow in the footsteps of the Independence Army under the northern political and military administration, which had fled, deserting Wangqing. We would rather fall in battle.

Wangqing had witnessed not only the victory at Fengwugou but also the bitter grief of the ignominious defeat suffered by the Independence Army under the northern political and military administration which retreated, leaving its compatriots to suffer unspeakable "punitive" atrocities.

In south Manchuria there had been an Independence Army organization called the western political and military administration; there had also been the northern political and military administration in the area around Xidapo, Wangqing County, in east Manchuria, which was expanding the area under its military influence with So Il as its president and Kim Jwa Jin as its commander-in-chief. It was said that the patriotic fighters affiliated with the administration numbered 500, and the organization had had one million rounds of ammunition as well as funds amounting to 100,000 yuan.

The cadet-training school (military academy) run by the organization in Shiliping had been a considerable size; it could accept more than 400 cadets. The processions of animal-drawn convoys carrying supplies of straw sandals and provisions contributed by the peasants in Wangqing and its vicinity to the political-military administration used to stretch back as far as Xidapo. This army, in cooperation with the Korean Independence Army of Hong Bom Do, had once annihilated a large force of the Japanese aggressors' army at Qingshanli.

When Kim Jwa Jin, in grey serge uniform, with a sword at his side, passed by on his white horse with bluish mane, the people in Wangqing, men and women, young and old, used to bow deeply, as if they were greeting the cortege of the Prime Minister or the King of feudal Korea. They did this to express their gratitude to the Independence Army for the victory at Qingshanli. But at the news of the imminent massive "punitive" attack on Jiandao by the Japanese army, the renowned General Kim Jwa Jin and his men had vanished, without offering the slightest resistance. Unaware of this, the Wangqing people had gone out on the road to have a look at the commander-in-chief, Kim Jwa Jin.

Only one company remained. For some reason this company had attended the graduation ceremony at the Tongil School just prior to the "clean-up" of Jiandao. In accordance with custom the school had prepared a sumptuous feast for the grand graduation ceremony. As soon as the ceremony was over, the soldiers had given three hasty cheers for independence, sat at the table and wolfed down unrefined liquor, rice cakes, cold noodles and other food. When the "punitive" forces arrived, they all fled. The pupils and their parents, too, had scattered in all directions. The scene was said to have been like a disturbed anthill.

The "punitive" forces had shot, bayoneted, and slashed with swords the defenseless people who were running helter-skelter for their lives. The Independence Army under the northern political and military administration had been routed. The people in Wangqing lamented over the sudden ruin of the army which had seemed so impressive. If such a tragic event were to recur in the land of Wangqing, where power was in the hands of the people, we would not have the face to claim that we were the sons and daughters of Korea.

We decided to strike at the enemy by employing elusive tactics - ambush, allurement, surprise attack and night storming - as guerrilla warfare required. We had evolved these guerrilla tactics ourselves in the course of defending the guerrilla zone from the enemy's repeated "punitive" offensives.

In the early days, when the Korean communists defined guerrilla warfare as the basic form of armed struggle and began to put it into effect, we had known practically nothing about tactics. We could have referred to the experiences of others and their manuals if they had been available, but we could not find them. So we sent a man to the Soviet Union to obtain some reference materials on war, including the combat experience of the Civil War; they had been of some help to us in understanding the concept of guerrilla struggle and the method of organizing ambushes and surprise attacks, but they had not been suitable for our actual situation.

As a first step to writing a manual of guerrilla warfare in our own style, I finished writing a pamphlet after the battle at Jiapigou at the end of March 1933. The pamphlet was titled Guerrilla Actions, and it brought together the initial military experience we had gained in our armed activities in the space of more than one year.

The pamphlet dealt with fundamental matters, ranging from the guerrillas' spiritual and moral qualities to the general principles of guerrilla warfare. It also codified all of the principles and methods, ranging from the organization of guerrilla combat actions such as raid, ambush, defensive battle, march and bivouac, to guerrilla skills such as firing, handling weapons and discipline. Needless to say, this was not a great book of military science such as Sun-tzu's Art of War or Clausewitz's On War.

But in the situation at that time, when we had neither renowned military theoreticians nor veterans of armed struggle, the pamphlet was a valuable handbook, representing the simple theory of our own style of guerrilla warfare. The officers and men of the guerrilla army studied it until it became dog-eared from being carried in their rucksacks, and they tried their best to apply the regulations specified in it to their military practice.

Guerrilla Actions, together with the Guerrilla Manual which was published later, provided prototypes for the establishment and development of our revolutionary armed forces and Juche-based tactics.

On November 17, 1933, the enemy attacked the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone from three directions in combined operations of infantry, artillery and air force. The descendants of the Samurai fell upon the guerrilla zone like angry wolves, growling and threatening to bite at everything, even at the trees standing there. These wild invaders seemed intent on swallowing up the land of Wangqing at a single gulp.

The hordes of "punitive" troops crawled in waves over the frozen ground, their aircraft continually bombing Macun and Lishugou where the military and political headquarters were located. The enemy's tactics had become more brutal. Previously, when frustrated in his attack he used to retreat to his camp and then resume his onslaught. But now he did not retreat even when his advance was checked, but stayed at the point he had reached, consolidating the line he had established before advancing again, step by step. Employing this murderous tactic, he destroyed every life and burnt down everything he came across.

However, our army and people heroically defended the guerrilla base in unbreakable unity. The fiercest of the battles was fought on Mt. Ppyojok and the outpost in the Ssukpatgol on Mt. Mopan, the gateway to the guerrilla zone. The 3rd company and the Anti-Japanese Self-Defense Corps manning these mountains mowed down the attackers with a surprise barrage of gunfire, grenades and rocks when the enemy had advanced to within 20 meters. The enemy attacked tenaciously in waves, but failed to penetrate the line of the outpost. The defenders on Mt. Mopan destroyed the enemy's highly mobile cavalry that was outflanking the defense at a bend of the River Dawangqing.

As the enemy committed large forces in the successive waves of attacks on Mts. Ppyojok and Mopan, we switched from an all-out defensive to a war of attrition, employing flexible maneuvers mainly designed as enticements and feints, in combination with positive defensive actions. This was a uniquely flexible tactic for destroying the enemy forces continuously by employing a variety of combat actions, and not allowing the enemy a moment's breathing space by constantly drawing him into engagement on our own initiative. Had we clung to a stereotyped defense, and not employed mobile tactics in good time, the guerrilla army would have been routed by the enemy's tenacious attacks based on numerical and technical superiority.

In line with our new tactics, the guerrillas, along with the members of the paramilitary organizations, withdrew from the outposts; they lured the enemy deep into the defensive zone and crushed him with constant ly-switching tactics-ambush, sharp-shooting, raiding the enemy's campsites and burying bombs in the bonfire.

Bombs could be buried in bonfires even by small boys, and the effectiveness of the measure was assured. Whenever we moved from one position to another we made sure that bombs were buried in the bonfires. As soon as the enemy soldiers reached the deserted position, they would gather around the campfires to warm themselves. Then the bombs would explode, blowing up the enemy. O Ryong Sok, the fourth younger brother of O Paek Ryong, working with the women of the self-defense corps, killed the enemy by this method at the central sentry post on Mt. Ppyojok.

We also organized frequent night raids on the enemy's camps. Raiding parties of two to five guerrillas would infiltrate the enemy's position, scatter leaflets to disillusion the enemy forces and fire a few shots before returning. Three or four shots fired at the enemy's tents or his campfires would transform his entire camp into bedlam. Such raiding parties were sent three, four, and even five times a night.

The enemy soldiers were unable to sleep all night; they trembled in fear and shot at random among themselves. The enemy was so scared by our constant raids that war lunatics began to appear among his ranks. Some enemy soldiers surrendered to us after reading such leaflets as "Appeal to the Japanese Soldiers!" and "Appeal to the Puppet Manchukuo Army Soldiers!" scattered by the guerrillas.

Hunters armed with matchlock rifles, also fought. Though they were old, their marksmanship was marvelous. Their admirable skill in shooting only enemy officers could be compared to that of modern snipers. The members of the women's association rushed to and from the trenches with rice balls and hot water on their heads. Children until 10 years of age came to the battlefields and beat drums and blew trumpets to boost the men's morale.

A conspicuous feature of Operation Macun was the showers of rock blocks from outpost positions, like those on Mt. Ppyojok. These piles of rock would roar down upon the attacking "punitive" forces, killing and wounding them en masse. The thunder of a rock-slide down on the steep slope and the clouds of dust like gun smoke struck terror into the aggressors' hearts. This method also proved very effective in halting the advance of the enemy's cavalry, vehicles and artillery.

One of the heroes shown up by these battles was a guerrilla with a nickname of "13 bullets." He had been known in the Wangqing area as an adventurous young man since the time when he had captured rifles from a tax office on the Tuman River on assignment from the YCL organization. When he arrived at the office he had said, "How are you, panjandrums? I am a Korean young man, a member of the Young Communist League." He introduced himself, then took out a revolver and took down three rifles hanging on the wall without any great hurry.

Then he rang up the police station and shouted, "What are you doing over there? There's a communist here. Come over here quickly, all of you." The police station had hastily dispatched mounted policemen to the site of the incident. He had returned, only narrowly escaping being killed. He had repeated similar adventures afterwards. I do not need to describe here the kind of criticism he received from the YCL organization.

This young man performed a great feat at the post in the valley of Ssukpatgol, a feat worthy of being recorded in the annals of the anti-Japanese revolution. A ten-man blocking party had been stationed at the post at all times. The head of that party was none other than this young man, "13 bullets." He was the platoon leader and was also in charge of the YCL group in that party. A large "punitive" force consisting of Japanese and puppet Manchukuo soldiers and self-defense corps men, surrounded the valley under cover of darkness one night and started attacking the post. The blocking party was involved in heavy fighting from dawn. They repelled the enemy's charge seven times until one corner of the log-cabin that was serving as a post had been burned down.

Calling a YCL group meeting in the thick of the battle, the young man said, "Comrades, behind us is the guerrilla base and our beloved brothers and sisters. If we fall back a single step from here, we will have no right to live in this world as young Koreans. Let us hold out to the last, even though it costs our lives, even though our bodies are torn to pieces!"

The blocking party members, ablaze with hatred, fixed bayonets to their rifles in order to fight hand to hand with the enemy. "13 bullets" was keen to fight in that way as well. But he calmed himself, in order to carry out his assignment. This brave fighter, who had been criticized for his self-opinionated attitude and adventurism, had grown into a seasoned commanding officer who could control and regulate himself in bloody battles.

When we reached the valley with reinforcements, he was lying at the post with 13 shots in his body. Hence his nickname?" 13 bullets." Members of the blocking party had been wounded in seven, three and two places. They were given the nicknames of "seven bullets," "three bullets" and "two bullets."

The people in Wangqing called him "13 bullets" instead of his real name. I also called him by his nickname. Eventually his real name faded from the people's memory. It is annoying that I cannot remember his real name. But I draw comfort from the fact that the nickname he earned in the anti-Japanese war will have a more lingering effect on the minds of the readers than that his real name would have.

The battle became heavier as the days went by. People were evacuated from Xiaowangqing which had been reduced to ashes by the gunfire of the Japanese army to Shiliping. The enemy killed everybody who came into their sight - soldiers and civilians, young and old, men and women. Hundreds of people were killed in Xiaowangqing during the winter "punitive" operations.

When we were fighting in front of a lumber camp at Wucidao in Shiliping, a Japanese army unit, which had passed a sentry post disguised as refugees, fired a machinegun at the backs of people who were moving from Macun to Dawangqing. This raid alone cost us scores of casualties. The enemy surrounded the village of Duchuanping in one night and killed all the sleeping people with volleys of machinegun fire. The family of Paek Il Ryong, a secretary of a district committee of the youth association who was a skilled playwright, were all killed. A great number of children in Xiaowangqing were killed during the "punitive" operations of that year.

When the situation in the guerrilla zone was at its worst, the refugees in the valley of Lishugou numbered more than 1,500. The guerrillas went to indescribable lengths to evacuate them to Dawangqing. Sometimes the procession of refugees moving to Dawangqing would be cut to pieces by a surprise attack from the enemy; then, they would wander about the woods the whole day trying to find one another. At that time I covered the evacuation of the revolutionary masses all day long, carrying babies in my arms. Other guerrillas, too, helped the old and the sick, while carrying on fighting. This heartbreaking picture was the initial point of unity between our army and people of today. It was a picture painted in blood and tears.

When I look back upon the scene of that day as we took the refugees from Lishugou to Shiliping, I feel a lump rise in my throat.

Many of the refugees had not eaten cereals for 20 days because of the enemy's "punitive" operation; they ate bean pods and dried turnip leaves for their meals. In Shiliping for lack of cereals they boiled cowhides and ate them.

If we show our younger generation the "foodstuffs" the people in the guerrilla zone ate during those years when they were too hungry to lift up their heads to see the sun in the sky, they will not be able to hold back their tears at the subhuman starvation their forerunners suffered.

Kim Myong Suk (from Yanji) lost her two children and she herself came within an ace of death, for she had not yet recovered from the period of spring food shortage before the barley harvest. As she had not eaten anything for a whole week, she could not think of burying her children outside, even though she saw them starve to death with her own eyes; she lay in the hut without moving, for she had no energy to sit up. Her neighbors came and managed to pull the bodies of her dead children away from the hut and bury them in fallen leaves; they, too, had eaten nothing for a whole week and were too weak to dig graves. When she ate boiled rice for the first time after her return to her liberated motherland, Kim Myong Suk wept, recollecting the spring famine in the guerrilla zone which deprived her of her two children.

In the Chechangzi guerrilla base there was a man who, in the battle at Yulangcun, had been wounded by eight machinegun bullets, his skull being split open to reveal his brain, but had miraculously survived. His tenacious grasp on life earned him the nickname of "eight bullets." Later he, too, died of starvation while working in the government office at Dongnancha. On his deathbed, he said, "If I had died when I was wounded eight times, I could have been remembered as a hero. How lamentable it is to die here of hunger!" The enemy besieged the guerrilla zones and starved the people to death or drove them out to freeze to death.

The Korean people endured unbearable trials in those years. The sacrifices imposed upon them still rankle as unhealed wounds in the heart of our nation.

The rulers of Japan are under a moral obligation to reflect upon the crimes they have committed in Korea and Manchuria. Repentance implies neither shame nor humiliation. It is a process of self-reform by means of reason in the effort to approach perfection. They may close their eyes, but time will never erase the facts of history. Japan must remember that her high rate of growth, the economic bed of roses in which she glorifies, is stained with the blood of the Korean nation. Japan, also, has experienced a national disaster in lives which were lost under foreign fire, and her beloved daughters were raped by occupation troops, hasn't she?

In spite of the heavy losses he suffered having invaded the guerrilla zone, the enemy tenaciously attempted to prolong the battle in order to make us die of cold and hunger, by denying us reinforcements and fresh supplies of weapons and provisions.

Effecting a decisive turn in the tide of battle was the only way we could save the army and the people in the guerrilla zone. Striking the enemy hard and harassing him behind his lines, together with continued efforts to destroy him within the defensive area was the only way we could save them.

Ever since my arrival in Wangqing, I had been opposed to the tendency that had restricted us to the defence of the guerrilla zone. In other words, my idea was to raid and destroy the enemy by concentrating efforts when the enemy's forces were dispersed, and at the same time to disperse ourselves and harass the enemy in many places behind his lines when he was already under concentrated attack. This was called the tactic of avoiding the enemy where he was strong and attacking him where he was weak. Only then could we defend the guerrilla zone and preserve our forces.

Most of the party cadres in the county and east Manchuria, however, insisted that we should concentrate our efforts in defense when the enemy was attacking us by massing his forces against the guerrilla zone, to save the guerrilla zone and the people.

These differences in opinions regarding a tactical issue resulted in a serious argument as to which of the opinions was in accordance with Marxist principles. They contended that my opinion was not an expression of Marxism but of escapism and capitulationism, while I asserted the correctness of the tactic of harassing the enemy behind his own lines.

I said that our forces, no matter how concentrated, would never be equal to the enemy's forces, so we should evacuate the population, and leave only a part of the guerrilla force to shoot at chosen points, while the rest of us should disperse and harass the enemy from behind; for instance, ten guerrillas equipped with rifles could take 30 or 40 unarmed young men with them to strike at the enemy from behind at his weak points, then they would be able to capture weapons and provisions.

Many comrades judged the situation correctly and supported me.

But some bigots would not listen to me. Boasting of seniority based on so-called activity, they said, "Young men should listen to experienced people. How is it conceivable for the army to leave the guerrilla zone when the enemy is falling upon us? This idea means deserting the people in order to save the army."

When the guerrilla zone had been reduced to ashes and many people had been killed in a short space of time, I met Tong Chang-rong, Lee Sang Muk, Song Il and other cadres of the ad hoc committee and county party committee, and insisted on conducting harassing operations behind the enemy lines.

"Things have reached a dead end. If we go on in this way, not only we, but also the people, will all be killed. Where can we retreat? If we retreat deeper into the mountains as we are doing now, there will be no houses and no food in the forest. Retreat will get us nowhere. You seem to think that you and the guerrillas can directly repulse the enemy, but that is hopeless. We should divide the guerrilla army into three or four groups and send them into the enemy-controlled area tonight. If we hit a few of the enemy's bases from behind, the 'punitive' forces will surely retreat from Xiaowangqing."

Hard battles were also being fought in other guerrilla zones in east Manchuria. The people in Hunchun were driven towards Jinchang and Huoshaopu, the people in Wangougou were driven towards Dahuangwai and Sandaowan, and the people in Helong towards Chechangzi. Even when things had come to this pass, some of the leadership hesitated to make a decision.

So I asserted once again the idea of harassing the enemy from behind and declared that I would fight according to my own decision because the army was under my command. Then I assembled the guerrillas and said, "We must not only hold on, but strike the enemy from behind. Who will go to fight behind the enemy lines? Any of you who will follow me, come along! I don't need many, only half of you, and the rest must stay here to protect the people. Those who want to go with me, must break the siege tonight. If we break through, we'll survive. If we attack the enemy bases and strongpoint one after another, the people will spread the news. Then the 'punitive' forces which are attacking this valley will fall back, afraid of being destroyed from behind."

The guerrilla army was thus divided into two groups - one, under the command of Choe Chun Guk, defended Shiliping, and the other, under my command, went to the enemy-controlled area. The YCL members evacuated 1,500 people from the guerrilla zone to Luozigou. We gave Choe Kum Suk the assignment of taking Tong Changrong, who was confined to his bed, towards Miaogou and nursing him there, and put all our food reserve in her knapsack. That was the last time I saw her.

That evening, in command of a detachment, I crawled through the line of siege and penetrated deep into the enemy-held area. As we had expected, the area behind the enemy lines was almost deserted. When we entered a village near a certain town, the villagers were preparing their feast for New Year's Day. They said they thought everyone in the guerrilla zone had been killed by the Japanese imperialist "punitive" forces, and they were happy to see us; they treated us to rich festive food like dumplings and millet cakes. That night Kim Saeng Gil, a guerrilla of O Paek Ryong's platoon, nearly died from a belly-ache after eating 140 dumplings.

My men felt so tired the next morning that I posted a sentry and let them sleep all day long. As they caught up on their sleep after shivering in cold without proper food or rest for months, their faces were radiant.

We began striking at the enemy the very next day. Our tactic was to attack primarily the small bases of the "punitive" forces and combine to attack considerably large bases. We struck at the enemy first in Liangshuiquanzi, destroying a puppet Manchukuo army unit and the self-defense corps, and then fell upon the barracks of the Japanese consulate police. And then, after a feinting maneuver far away from Liangshuiquanzi, we again raided an enemy convoy of trucks at Xinnangou, capturing a great amount of wheat flour and munitions. From there we slipped away to the mountainous area of Beifengwudong and made preparations for a new battle. On the night of February 16, 1934, we eliminated most of the puppet Manchukuo army soldiers, policemen and self-defense corps members in Beifengwudong, and captured some of them.

After winning a victory there, we crossed the Beigaoli Pass and advanced to Sidong; then we attacked the forest ranger base in Tonggol, killing and capturing all the enemy at their barracks.

The final battle which made a decisive contribution to frustrating the enemy's winter "punitive" operations was fought at Daduchuan, a site of strategic importance on the Tumen-Mudanjiang railway. Disguised as a "punitive" force, we raced over 25 miles of steep mountain pass by means of forced march, divided our force into three groups. stormed the police station and the quarters of the self-defense corps and set fire to the munitions depot.

After this battle the enemy began to lift the siege of the guerrilla zones and retreated to the position from which he had started 90 days before. He could not eliminate the "scourge." The "punitive" operations, which had threatened the very existence of the guerrilla zones for three months, had failed.

The battle in defense of the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone, which for convenience' sake was called Operation Macun, ended in victory for us. This was a miraculous event which passed almost unnoticed on the outskirts of a world preoccupied with the assumption of office by Adolf Hitler, the trials at Leipzig and the establishment of diplomatic relations between the Soviet Union and the United States. I greatly regret not being able to describe in vivid detail all the heroic efforts made by the defenders of the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone in the face of dire hardships.

We paid dearly for the victory. Hundreds of people lost their lives under the gunfire of the enemy. The loss of Choe Kum Suk and Tong Chang-rong caused me bitter pain. Among all the people in the guerrilla zone who came running to greet us with tears on their faces as we returned in triumph from behind the enemy lines, I could not see Choc Kum Suk, who cared for me as lovingly as if I were her own younger brother. The knapsack my orderly carried for me contained a hand mirror I had obtained as a present for her. There were also several sacks of trophies for the members of the women's association.

What harsh trials the members of the association had endured, shedding bitter tears as they defended the guerrilla zone that winter! How many meals they had cooked and how much root of grass they had gathered! Two women, Hye Suk and Yong Suk, lured the enemy who forced them to act as their guides to a place where there were no guerrillas, and caused him many problems before being killed. By shouting out that the enemy was coming, Choe Chang Bom's aunt lured towards her enemy troops who were crawling up the cliff on which the guerrilla command post was located. These were patriotic woman martyrs in the modern war against the Japanese, just as Kye Wol Hyang<sup>6</sup> and Ron Kae had been in the war against the Japanese invaders in the Middle Ages.

My gift to beloved Choe Kum Suk had come too late. The enemy had deprived of me the only woman I ever called "sister" and felt so attached to in my whole life, the woman who used to say she would not die and was more concerned for my safety than her own when I said that both of us must fight on and live to see the liberation of the motherland.

The death of Tong Chang-rong was also a heartbreaking loss to me. He was one of the most unforgettable of the Chinese comrades-in-arms who had taken loving care of me and respected my ideas. We had frequently argued about important matters concerning political lines. As he was somewhat obstinate, we had now and then failed to reach an agreement, but such differences had not affected our friendship. He had always respected me, saying that I was the only man in whom he could place his trust among the Koreans.

After the battle at Daduchuan we withdrew in the direction of Yaoyinggou, and then returned to Macun, where we reviewed the defence of the Xiaowangqing guerrilla zone. The people who had returned from evacuation were building their houses on the ashes. An old man told me he was building his house for the 70th time since he came to the guerrilla zone - such was the vital energy of the people in Jiandao who had decided to live in the guerrilla zone no matter where, and die there should they have to die.

But for the assistance and support of such people, our guerrilla army would not have succeeded in defeating the enemy's large-scale "punitive" operations. The victory of Operation Macun was the result of unity between the army and people and of resistance supported by all the people. The fighting spirit with which we attacked the enemy in spite of all our disadvantages, as well as the protean tactics which, supported by that spirit, we ourselves evolved were the decisive factors in the victory of Operation Macun.

Throughout the whole of Operation Macun the spirit of the guerrilla zone was displayed, a spirit that had thrived and soared aloft like giant trees on the soil of revolutionary power, on the basis of the unbreakable will and mettle of our nation. This spirit enabled us to defend every inch of Xiaowangqing with our blood, with a strength which guns and planes were unable to conquer.

Operation Macun proved to be a brilliant military, political and moral victory for our revolutionary army, enhancing its military authority. In this battle we created a variety of new tactics, which served as the backbone of future guerrilla tactics, and we laid the organizational and tactical foundations for the switch to large-force actions in the subsequent years. The Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army acquired rich experience which enabled us to repulse an enemy attack from any quarter.

Operation Macun ensured the successful defense of Xiaowangqing, helped towards resolving the critical situation in the guerrilla zones in the neighboring counties, and made a great contribution to promoting the overall Korean revolution centered on the anti-Japanese armed struggle. The spirit of the heroic soldiers who held out against the American invaders on Height 12118 in the war in the 1950s was derived from the spirit of the guerrilla zones in the 1930s. We still maintain this spirit as we advance along the straight road of our own style of socialism within imperialist encirclement.

No force in the world can ever break the spirit which was born and tried in the flames of the anti-Japanese war. As long as they possess this spirit, our army and our people will continue to advance along the road of constant victory in the future.

8.6. Arsenals in the Thick Forests

---

When I was in Macun I often visited an arsenal which manufactured arms and munitions. At that time we simply called the arsenal an ironworks. There was an ironworks of this kind in every county in Jiandao.

In the early days one or two people sent by the organization made small weapons such as swords and spears, heating with bellows the charcoal-fired furnace in the ironworks which was sometimes called Macun Arsenal or Xiaowangqing Arsenal.

Just before Operation Macun I visited the ironworks and found no fewer than seven or eight people working there. At that time Kim Sang Uk was managing the ironworks in place of Park Tu Gyong, who had been transferred to the post of head of the food department of the district government. Those I still remember among the people working there are O Hak Bong, Choe Sang Mun, Yang To Gil, Kang Hae San, Park Yong Bok and Lee Ung Man. Of these, Kang Hae San was the only man who had joined the ironworks already possessing the technical skill of a blacksmith.

The others had almost no experience of handling iron; they were rank beginners who had never repaired weapons before. But some time later these novices were manufacturing bombs, pistols, rifles and ammunition which we had thought could be made only in a modern munitions factory, and furthermore they made the gunpowder needed for them in a rural smithy which had no lathe, drilling machine, shaper or milling machine. This was a miracle achieved only in the war against the Japanese, a miracle worked by the unshakable will and the revolutionary self-reliant spirit of the Korean communists, who believed that victory in this war depended upon the independent efforts of our own nation.

The naive people of Jiandao once planned to build a hand-grenade factory in the guerrilla zone with the help of the Soviet Union. This was the time when communists all over the world looked to the Soviet Union in humble reverence as a beacon of hope for the emancipation of humanity. The thought of getting assistance from the country which had carried out a revolution before any other gave rise among the people to a spirit of dependence on others.

While the idea of depending on others and the aspiration to make a revolution with the support of others engendered the idea of adulation of capitalist powers among the nationalists, it was also the root cause within the communist mentality of reliance on the Soviet Union. At that time we considered it a natural internationalist duty for the communists of the Soviet Union, the first country to have succeeded in a revolution, to support the communists of the less developed countries.

But the Soviet Union sent no reply to our request, neither a promise to comply with it, nor notification that she could not do it or was not in a position to assist us. It was at this time that we resolved firmly to rely only on ourselves. The silence from the Soviet Union confirmed us in our belief that self-reliance was the only way to live, that the decisive factor in promoting the revolution was to enlist our own forces to the maximum and assistance from others was an auxiliary factor.

We therefore paid special attention to the work of the arsenal and concentrated our efforts on it. When Park Tu Gyong was the manager of the arsenal, we had made sure that the arsenal was equipped with such tools as anvils, hammers, pliers, sledges, bellows, files and a boring machine. With these tools the workers in the arsenal repaired damaged weapons or made new weapons for the guerrilla army and the paramilitary organizations.

The most noteworthy of the weapons manufactured in the arsenal was a single-loaded pistol made by cutting down the barrels of shotguns and Model 38 rifles that had been damaged. These pistols were not supplied to the army, but to the members of the self-defence corps or the Children's Vanguard. Single-loaders made by the Yulangcun guerrilla unit were supplied mainly to the political workers, and they enjoyed a great popularity among their users. Cartridges were also renovated by removing the detonation caps from the empty cartridges used by Model 38 rifles, putting new caps in their places and charging them with powder.

Gunpowder was the most urgently required of all the materials necessary for the manufacture of munitions, and it was difficult to keep up with demand. At first the arsenals in the guerrilla zones made bombs and renovated bullets with powder sent by miners and underground workers. But this route of acquisition was always dangerous and exposed the revolutionary organizations we had formed with much effort in the mines to considerable risk. Many people lost their lives in their attempt to obtain this gunpowder. A typical example is the incident which had occurred at a pond near Longshuiping, a village close to a mine in Badaogou. Kim Chol Ho, Choe Hyon's wife and comrade-in-arms, had developed into a revolutionary in this village, in front of which there was a deep pond with thick reeds.

The people living in Longshuiping cultivated rice by using the water from this pond, but this pond, the lifeline of the peasants in the area, was turned into a sea of blood in a single day. When the fiendish Japanese military police discovered 20 miners from the Badaogou Mine who had sent gunpowder to the guerrilla zone, they killed them mercilessly at the pond.

This incident forced the leaders of the guerrilla bases and the workers in the munitions sector to reconsider the conventional method of acquiring powder solely through organizations in mines and to seek out a new way. Each gram of powder with which the arsenals in the guerrilla zones charged the bombs and cartridges was the crystallized flesh and blood of the fighters.

We decided to produce our own powder. Some people said this was like building a castle on sand, but I thought that if a man was determined enough he could do anything, and we could surely succeed, just as our ancestors had succeeded before us. With this thought I began studying in earnest the history of gunpowder manufacture and everything relating to it. In the course of this study, I came to the conclusion that nitro, the basic raw material of gunpowder, could be made manually.

Nitro could be made in any place inhabited by people, and we could see it every day. One sunny day I took the workers of the arsenal to the yard of Lee Chi Baek's house, where ashes and compost were piled up. I pointed to a substance like white salt which had formed on the pile of compost, and told them that it was nitre. When they heard this, they burst into laughter, saying that they had been like an old man looking for the pipe he was holding in his hand. We could obtain nitre from the sites of old toilets and from the earth at the bottom of cowshed and stable manure piles.

It is well-known that in the Koryo period Choe Mu Son invented gunpowder and thereby made a great contribution to the defense of the nation. The firearms he manufactured were installed on warships. The naval forces of Koryo inflicted wholesale slaughter on marauding Japanese when they used these firearms in the sea-battle off Jinpho. It is said that he refined ashes and dust he gathered around his house to obtain nitre for making gunpowder. Some people have claimed that the gunpowder of the Koryo period was not the invention of Choe Mu Son, but a product he made by applying a method learned from a foreigner. They alleged that our country offered no theoretical or technical foundations on the basis of which he could have invented gunpowder. I did not regard it as a fair assessment. Historical records show that, at the time of the Three Kingdoms, Silla already used firearms.

Our self-respect has been injured by the flunkeyistic and nihilistic attitude of those who, on hearing of an invention of another country, would praise the exceptional brain-power of the people of that country, but shrug their shoulders in doubt when they heard that a Korean had invented something.

The workers in the arsenals obtained nitro by a simple method. They used earthenware, tin and ceramic containers with perforated bottoms. They filled these containers with dirt collected from the floors of stables and toilets and from underneath manure piles, and then poured water into them. They caught the water dripping out through the holes at the bottom, and then boiled it down in a cauldron. The white crystal remaining was pure nitro. The upper layer of crystals obtained in this way was called the horizontal formation, and the lower layer, the vertical formation. The vertical formation of crystals, which was deemed to have the characteristic of exploding in one direction, was used for the cartridges of rifles and pistols, while the horizontal formation, which was thought to explode in all directions, was used mostly for bombs.

The raw materials needed for making gunpowder were obtained through the efforts of the masses. Sulfur, an essential material, was obtained from the insulators on the enemy's telephone poles. Gunpowder must contain an inflammable substance like alcohol; Chinese white spirit was substituted for pure alcohol.

Our first experiments were not successful, but we were not dispirited by failure; we repeated the experiments and at last discovered the ideal proportions for compounding the powder.

I cannot forget the people who had participated in the manufacture of gunpowder at that time. One of them was Son Won Gum. I was not acquainted with him, nor had I met him before. And yet I knew his per friend.

Park Yong Sun was the first man to acquaint me with Son's accomplishments. When he came to Macun to give a short course on bomb-making techniques, he and I spent a few days together, talking about the events taking place around us everyday. Every now and then he would mention the name of Son Won Gum with warm affection and respect. I began to listen with curiosity whenever Son became the subject of our conversation. Park was his comrade-in-arms and had supplied a reference for his admission to the party.

A man can achieve sudden fame for his exploits, his talent or for an incident in which he is involved. In 1932 Son Won Gum was well known among the revolutionaries of the Jiandao area for his escape from a police station. He was arrested by the police while acting as a messenger traveling from village to village carrying a fiddle and disguised as a drug peddler. He escaped from the station through a manhole of a sewer waist-deep in effluent, painfully dragging a body injured all over by torture, and then spent a full day in a river. It was amazing that he managed to escape safely through the strict enemy cordon; even more admirable was his endurance in supporting his bleeding body in the water for an entire day.

He later joined the guerrilla army and the Communist Party, and his sincere efforts made him a conspicuous figure. A rise in the Suribawigol valley of Xinchengde hill in Jingucun was the site of the Helong Arsenal, managed by Park Yong Sun. The workers of this arsenal were the first to produce a bomb known as the noise bomb. The noise bomb was later developed into a chilli bomb and then into a powerful bomb called the Yongil bomb. The production of Yongil bombs required a lot of materials, and the workers of the arsenal had to go to considerable extremes to obtain these materials. Son Won Gum always led his company in their efforts to find solutions to this knotty problem.

"We once encountered great difficulty in making the noise bombs, because we were running short of the paper and cloth to make the powder holders. Everyone racked their brains to find a solution. Then Son hurried to the village before anyone knew what he was doing, and returned with the paper he had torn away from the doors of his house and cloth from his only quilt. I felt rather ashamed, when I saw him returning, panting, to the arsenal at midnight." Park Yong Sun told me this in Macun.

"If this is true, then he is a true revolutionary with wonderful qualities," I said, frankly expressing what I felt about him.

Park went on to say, "Son always led the others in doing everything. Once the manufacture of bombs was interrupted for lack of wire, so he traveled many miles to Nanyangping and brought back 300 meters of telephone line he had cut there. He also obtained sulfur, scraps of iron and tin plates."

One snow-stormy night Son came to the arsenal carrying a heavy load of tin plate and iron pieces, followed by a strange old woman who was carrying an iron cauldron on her head. The old woman's unexpected appearance startled the workers.

As he helped the old woman set down the cauldron, Park Yong Sun asked him, "What's all this, Won Gum? Why on earth did you bring this grandmother all the way here when the Siberian wind is cutting our flesh to pieces?"

Setting down the load from his back, Son shook his head and said meaningfully, "I did not bring her, she followed me on her own accord."

Park Yong Sun asked the old woman, "How come you followed him, grandmother?"

"He's an old acquaintance of mine. We got to know each other when I was living in Neifengdong. When we could not afford to buy any medicine for my daughter-in-law who was seriously ill, this young man, who was selling medicine and advertising it by playing a fiddle, gave us some medicine and rice for nothing. So my daughter-in-law was saved. I was sorry that I could not repay him for his kindness. Then, as luck would have it, he came to our village today and asked every household for scrap iron. So we thought this was our chance to repay his kindness. This is the largest cauldron we have. I hope it will be of some help."

She looked down dubiously at the cauldron she had set beside the furnace.

Feeling embarrassed, Park Yong Sun told her, "Thanks for your offer, grandmother, but we don't take new cauldrons; we only accept the damaged ones. Please take this back." This made the grandmother angry. She said, "Don't say that. The Japanese swines burnt my two sons to death. I won't regret giving up this piece of iron."

The workers of the arsenal made no more attempts to persuade her.

On hearing Park's story I felt the urge to go to Helong there and then and see Son Won Gum. The essential element of his image which so captivated me was his iron-willed spirit of self-reliance.

I said excitedly to Park Yong Sun, "You should have brought him here now. His experience is a good lesson. How happy everyone would have been to hear about his experience! You should tell them about it for him."

After the short course in Macun, Son Won Gum became known throughout east Manchuria. When Park Yong Sun was leaving Macun after the short course I said to him, "When you're back in Helong, tell Comrade Son Won Gum that his experience had a very good influence on the participants in the short Course. And tell him that one day we will meet and talk about our feelings."

But I never did meet him. In fact, he lost the sight of both eyes in an explosion in the course of his work.

Manufacturing gunpowder was always dangerous. One could even lose one's life. The most dangerous work was charging the bombs and cartridges. Park Tu Gyong, Park Yong Sun and Kang Wi Ryong all suffered serious wounds while making gunpowder. And yet, in spite of this, they did not leave their workplace.

Though deprived of his eyesight, Son Won Gum neither lost heart nor became pessimistic. Instead, he inspired his comrades, by saying, "Don't feel sad, comrades. I've lost my sight, but I still have my heart, two arms and two legs." As he cut wire and assembled bombs by touch, he sang the Internationale. He had buried his father, elder brother and sister in the wilderness and now he himself was blinded - a young man who had not yet lived half his lifetime. When the guerrilla zones were evacuated, he left his unit lest he should be a burden to his comrades-in arms, and went to Jingucun.

Everyday he heard the enemy propaganda slandering the guerrilla army and the Communist Party, claiming that "The guerrilla army has been annihilated in the mountains," "The people in the guerrilla bases have all been starved to death," "Go to Chechangzi, and you will find nothing but skulls there," and "The Communist Party's politics is destructive. You'll get nothing from that party."

Son's blood boiled in fury. He went from house to house, telling people, "It is not true. The guerrilla army is still alive. It has advanced over a wider area. It is eliminating the enemy in various parts of north and south Manchuria. The guerrilla army, which at first had only a few dozen soldiers, has now grown to a force of hundreds and thousands of men armed with heavy guns and machineguns. Compatriots and brothers, do not be deceived by the enemy's propaganda. Let us give stronger support to the Korean People's Revolutionary Army. The war against the Japanese will surely end in victory for us."

His journeying carried him as far as Yanji and Longjing, hundreds of miles away beyond the boundary of Jingucun. The Japanese army and police did not pay any attention to this "blind beggar" who felt his way with a cane as he walked and carried a fiddle on his back?as he had done before. When he heard the news of the battle at Pochonbo on the road, he went around the streets and alleys in Yanji, shouting excitedly; "Korean compatriots, General Kim Il Sung and his army raided Pochonbo on the fourth of June.

The Korean People's Revolutionary Army crossed the Yalu River and advanced to the homeland which we long for waking and sleeping. The enemy, scared out of his wits at the revolutionary army's strength, is now screaming in distress and terror. Japanese imperialism is doomed." His fiery speech set the whole town of Yanji afire. But he was arrested by the Japanese police and burned alive.

"Listen, everybody! I have no eyes, but I can see the bright, liberated motherland. I beg you, stay firm until the day of victory. Long live the Korean revolution!"

These were his words before he was executed. This pioneer of the spirit of self-reliance ended his days at the age of 25. Whenever he recalled Son Won Gum, Park Yong Sun used to say, "Won Gum died, without even knowing what it means to be married."

If he was still alive he would have many good things to say about the spirit of self-reliance to the younger generation. His career itself would become a living textbook of self-reliance.

The development of gunpowder production brought about a great change in the production of munitions.

As powder became available, the production of bombs increased quickly. A bomb consisted of a fuse and a tin. Tins were sent by the underground organizations in the enemy-controlled areas and semi-guerrilla zones, and into them was inserted something like an oil bottle charged with powder, the gap between the tin and oil vessel being filled with broken pieces of damaged ploughs and other steel splinters for shrapnel, and then the fuse was connected. This made a simple bomb.

Since it was produced manually, the bomb was neither convenient nor attractive to the eye. Clumsy handling could easily cause an accident - one guerrilla army soldier lost an arm through igniting the fuse too slowly during an assault on the enemy in Liangshuiquanzi. But this bomb was much more effective than a hand grenade. The Japanese were terrified of our guerrilla army's bombs.

Once gunpowder became available, we were able to make wooden guns. Wu Yi-cheng's unit fought using guns similar to the anti-tank guns nowadays which we could not afford. We made wooden guns instead. Shortly after the battle of the Dongning county town the people in Wangqing made the first such wooden gun from an ash tree. We tested the gun during the assault on Daduchuan, and its blast produced thunderous results. It would be only natural to doubt the effectiveness of a handmade wooden gun. But after our first shot from this gun, the enemy fled in horror. The people in Helong also made wooden guns at the arsenal in Moguyuanzi, Yulangcun.

When they fired one of these guns on Qianli Hill the Japanese soldiers and policemen in Erdaogou, eight miles from the hill, would create a hubbub - they were frightened out of their senses! When the revolutionary army fired its wooden guns the enemy was stupefied, for it was beyond the limits of their common sense and imagination to believe that we could make guns in the guerrilla bases, which had no technical equipment.

The revolutionary zeal, indefatigable spirit and creative initiative displayed by the workers of the arsenals in making and repairing weapons should indeed inspire admiration in the people's hearts. At that time the arsenals of the guerrilla army had hardly any modern machines or tools. The people in Wangqing had only one boring machine, and the workers of the Helong Arsenal managed by Park Yong Sun had one hand-operated drilling machine they had obtained through a man in Dalazi who worked as a steel forger. My memory is unclear as to whether the Toudaogou and Nengzhiying Arsenals in Yanji County had any such machines or not.

Apart from the boring machine and hand-operated drilling machine, files were the best tools they had. The workers of the arsenals used their files to repair everything. They repaired the cartridge extractor and firing pin of a rifle by filing, grinding, hammering and tempering them in fire, water and clay. Soon they were even able to repair machineguns without any difficulty. There were numerous talented people among the workers in the munitions sector, such as Park Yong Sun, Son Won Gum, Kang Wi Ryong, Park Tu Gyong, Song Sung Phil and Kang Hae San. They were skilled enough to set the eye in a needle.

The secret of all these miracles was quite simply the spirit of self-reliance. If the Korean communists, from the early days, had not thought solely of relying on themselves, but remained captive to an illusion of help from communists in other countries, and if they had not cherished the unshakable belief that relying on themselves was the only way to survive and to revive Korea, the arsenals would never have sprung into being in the guerrilla zones, and such powerful weapons as wooden guns and Yongil bombs would never have been produced.

We could have appealed to the people for war funds as the Independence Army did, or gone to other countries begging and entreating for help. Once you begin to beg, you begin to fawn on others, sinking to the despicable depths of licking the soles of the others' feet or plucking the mucus from their eyes if they tell you to.

The slogan of self-reliance that we raised in the early days of the anti-Japanese war, and the strenuous efforts we had made to implement it ever since were also in accord with the prevailing revolutionary situation. The Japanese imperialists' invasion of Manchuria had aggravated the contradictions between Korea and Japan and between China and Japan, and these contradictions inevitably presented the Korean communists with a task of high level combat - an armed struggle.

If we had clung to mendicant diplomacy, begging other countries to help us, instead of relying on ourselves, we would not have started the war against Japan immediately after Japan's invasion of Manchuria, nor would we have developed our guerrilla army into a powerful force within a few short years.

Self-reliance was the slogan which most correctly reflected the people's aspiration and the demand to liberate the country by enlisting the nation's own independent efforts and its own strength. It was no accident that people quickly accepted this slogan, transforming smithies into arsenals and building new weapons-repair works in all sorts of places.

Self-reliance and fortitude was the basic spirit underlying not only munitions manufacture and repair but every aspect of the anti-Japanese revolution; it was the criterion by which to measure one's loyalty to the revolution. We did not regard any man who was not self-reliant and did not strive hard as a true revolutionary, no matter how ardent his patriotism, or how committed he might be to communist ideology, because self-reliance was the key to success in the revolution. The leaders of the nationalist movement in the past had been attached to dependence on external forces; they accepted the illusion of Wilson's theory of national self-determination because they were devoid of the spirit of self-reliance.

In Yilangou, Yanji County, there is a village called Nanyangcun. After the harvest and spring struggle the Japanese army and police descended on this village, mercilessly slaughtered the innocent people and young men, and burnt down their houses. The political workers dispatched to the village gathered the young people and stirred their spirits by saying, "We conduct a non-violent political struggle, but the enemy resorts to arms.

We cannot defeat the enemy with bare hands. The time has now come to take up the life-or-death armed struggle against Japanese imperialism. What do you think we should do, comrades?"

One young man, shaking his fist, said, "Let us make spears out of scrap iron. If each of us had a spear, we could stab the enemy and capture his weapons, couldn't we?" The young man had an old father, Lee Thae Sun, who had been a blacksmith. He went on to say that the tools his father had used were still kept in his shed, and that they could surely be used to make swords and spears.

The young people immediately agreed, saying, "That's right. First let's make swords and spears, and then capture rifles with them."

Using the hammers and pliers with which the old man, Lee Thae Sun, had forged farm implements, they began to forge spears out of the metal hoops of cart-wheels over charcoal made from the roots of birch trees, in a valley beyond the common people's reach. They put an edge on the forged spears by whetting them on a stone.

The unaccustomed sound of hammering ringing out beyond the village attracted the curiosity of the old smith, and he came to the valley. The young people hid the spears they were making in the grass and pretended to be making steel for tinderboxes.

The old man cast a dubious glance over the young people and asked, "What are you making?" "Steel for tinderboxes, sir," they answered in one voice.

"You don't seem to know what you're doing. Give that hammer to me."

In an instant the old man made steel for ten tinderboxes, and then returned home with the tools.

Next day the young people took the tools again when the old man was away in the field, and began forging spears. He appeared unannounced at the young men's open-air smithy as he had the previous day. He asked them sternly, "What have you done with the steel I made for you yesterday, you children, and why are you making new steel?"

His son replied on behalf of his friends, "Other people have taken them."

This scene was repeated several times. The old man soon realized that the young men were not making steel for tinderboxes. Why would they take up smithying in the busy farming season just to make steel? One hot summer day the old man approached them unnoticed along the furrows of the maize field and found them forging spears, learning the skill from his son.

"I was wondering just what you were doing all the spring and summer, and you were making preparations to get killed, you stupid."

As he fussed and objected collecting the tools together, the embarrassed young people grabbed him by his clothes, saying, "Why should we sit with folded arms when the enemy is killing young people like flies?"

Dumbfounded, the old man nodded his head and thought for a while before saying with dignity, "You hammer and I will hold the pliers. And keep a strict watch."

That day he made spears for more than ten young people. But then the young men in the neighboring village came with scrap iron and damaged cart-wheel hoops and exchanged them for all the spears, saying that they should show kindness to people who had no blacksmith. The old man said that spears could not be made of carbonic steel and ordered them to dump the pieces in the furrows of the field. Instead, he forged scores of daggers and spears from the high-intensity steel of scores of octagonal chisels which he had been concealing.

Armed with the daggers and spears the old man had forged, 20 young men of Nanyangcun raided a small unit of the puppet Manchukuo army moving from Yanji to Jiulongping, capturing lots of weapons and ammunition. The old man praised their victory delightedly. Under his management the secret smithy in Nanyangcun went on to produce many swords and spears. Eventually, even bombs were produced in the smithy. The old man devoted his life to producing and repairing munitions until he was captured and killed by the enemy.

This is only a single instance demonstrating the vital force of self-reliance. In this fashion, self-reliance opened a new era in the history of the national liberation struggle in our country, the era in which everything was created from nothing. These vital phases may be regarded as living proof of the correctness and power of the communist method of solving all problems by allowing full scope to the people's strength and wisdom.

Self-reliance was the most important method by which the Korean communists established the principle of Juche in their struggle, and they could neither think of nor speak about Juche apart from self-reliance, nor could they imagine the development of the Korean revolution without this quality.

Only self-reliance was capable of eradicating once and for all the worship of great powers which was still a great fetter on the spiritual life of our people in modern times and allowing us to pave a new way to victorious national resurrection by following the ideal of independence, self-development and self-sufficiency. Self-reliance was the touchstone with which to distinguish a man equipped with the spirit of Juche from a man who was not.

We therefore consistently inculcated the revolutionary spirit of self-reliance in the masses from the very first day of the war against Japan. The idea that, while help from others would be welcome, we must and could liberate the country through our own efforts even without others' help; the idea that, while help from higher echelons in solving our problems would be welcome, we must find the solutions to all our problems through our own efforts and wisdom, even without such help - this idea easily won the sympathy of the masses. But quite a few people still retained remnants of the outworn ideas, and either did not believe in their strength or underestimated it.

Some of those who had welcomed our appeal to carry through the revolution by placing our faith and reliance in the strength of our people became dubious and perplexed in the face of a minor problem such as arming ourselves.

One day, when we were absorbed in the military training in Antu which was part of the preparations for the founding of the guerrilla army, Lee Yong Bae and Pang In Hyon broke a rifle's firing pin while cleaning it. In view of the conditions at the time, when each rifle had to be captured at the cost of blood, this was a serious case which could not be allowed to pass with impunity.

After examining the broken pin carefully, I said to them, "I will give you one day; repair it by this time tomorrow!"

They both stared at me wide-eyed. They clearly had not expected me to make such a preposterous demand.

"How can we repair a rifle manufactured in a modern munitions factory? We can fight a battle or risk our lives, but this is something we cannot even imagine doing with our poor skills, isn't it?"

"How can we call our undertaking by the sacred name of revolution if it is something that can be achieved simply by picking out the easy jobs to do? I think that the true meaning of revolution and the pride of a revolutionary lie in doing those things nobody dares to do." "But the broken pin is made of steel. Can it be repaired with theory alone?"

Pang In Hyon looked gloomily at the bolt with pin in his hand. Until that moment he regarded my demand to repair it as absurd and unreasonable. What would be the consequences of a commander revoking his orders at such a moment? Though I knew my orders were unusual, I told them again coldly, "If you cannot repair it, you are not entitled to be guerrillas. How can you carry through the complicated enterprise of social transformation when you cannot repair a little pin? If you do not intend to repair it, you may not participate in drill from tomorrow."

When I threatened them in this way, they were all startled; they promised me to repair it and asked me to teach them the method.

"I don't know the method, either. You must discover it yourselves."

They left the training ground with the bolt with the broken pin, their faces stained with tears.

Next day they appeared at the training ground, their faces beaming, for they had repaired the pin. It was not repaired perfectly, but it worked as it was meant to. The other comrades were all surprised. Even I, who had given the orders, could not believe my eyes. How could they, who had said they could not even imagine repairing it because they had no skill, repair it with so little difficulty?

Pang In Hyon hastily explained the repair process:

"At first we thought of making a new pin with wire, but we could not get proper steel wire. So then we heated the broken pin and extended it by beating it out. We whetted it on a stone and managed to shape it, but the problem was to make it hard again. We went to Xiaxiaoshahe to see an experienced smith who lives there. He told us to temper it in oil. We did as we were told and this steel is the result."

Their experience greatly excited the others. Everyone greeted with excitement the lesson that any one could work wonders if he had faith in his strength and made effective use of it.

I still remember the bright smiles covering the faces of Lee Yong Bae and Pang In Hyon as they ran to the training ground with the repaired pin in the hand. The smiles were doubtless an expression of immeasurable pride in their own strength. What ecstasy on earth can be more powerful than the pleasure and joy a man feels when he finds a strength he thought he did not possess?

A rifle's firing pin is not such a big thing. One could easily capture 10 rifles in the time it takes to repair it. But the lesson learned from repairing it generates a power greater than that of a hydrogen bomb.

Marx and Engels defined the history of the development of mankind as the history of class struggle and, needless to say, this is a correct proposition. The history of mankind can also be said to be the history of man discovering, creating and perfecting himself. In other words, it is the history of the creation of the human being who continuously discovers and develops in himself the powers and skills peculiar to himself and, at the same time, the history of the struggle to defend the independence of the popular masses.

It can also be called the history of innovation by a human being who has steadily refined himself in the political and ideological, cultural and moral, scientific and technological dimensions. Through the effort of creation and innovation, mankind has ushered in the age of the rocket, computers, genetic engineering and the green revolution.

From this point of view we can say that self-reliance is a powerful force which has driven the development of history. If people had lived simply believing in the grace of God, the "Lord of Creation," without developing their own strength, they would still be lost in the Paleolithic Age.

When we were operating the arsenals at full pressure in various parts of east Manchuria, Shi Zhong-heng hinted to me that there was a munitions works which had once been managed by Wang De-lin's national salvation army in the Dongning county town. This information increased my interest in the town. According to Shi Zhong-heng, the works was organized in the spring of 1932 as an ordnance repair shop equipped with a few lathes, casting facilities and sewing machines.

From the latter half of 1932 this shop developed into a comprehensive munitions factory with more than 200 persons involved in manufacturing hand grenades, mortar shells, 25-cartridge automatic rifles, and the guns known as hog-guns. Since that time the factory had been equipped with new machine-tools and other means of production.

The weapons manufactured in this factory had been supplied mainly to the NSA units in Dadianzi, Wangqing County, and the Ningan region. Following the Japanese occupation the factory was dissolved, but its equipment and machines were left intact. If we had succeeded in taking the town completely into our control in the autumn of 1933, the factory would inevitably have become ours and we could have armed ourselves more adequately with up-to-date light and heavy weapons.

The experience gained in the munitions industry in the guerrilla bases in the first half of the 1930s was applied and developed in the arsenals built in the bases on Mt. Paektu during the latter half of the 1930s.

We organized a sewing unit in each of the guerrilla bases and thus solved the problem of military uniform by our own efforts. The cloth was obtained, dyed and sewn by ourselves. We boiled down the bark of oak, black walnut and Amur cork trees in a large cauldron and soaked the cloth in the water to dye it khaki. Sometimes the colour of the cloth varied a little with the proportion of the barks from various species of trees.

The first members of the Wangqing sewing unit were Kim Ryon Hwa and Jon Mun Jin, who had once been a nurse at a hospital in the village of six households. There was also a male designer, but I cannot remember his name. The unit was later reinforced with Lee Ii Pha, Kim Myong Suk and Kim Sun Hui. It also employed temporary workers when it was short of hands. Jon Mun Jin made my uniform in the days in Xiaowangqing. When I went from Antu to Wangqing, the women in the unit said they would make a fine uniform for the young general and they sewed a full uniform set, including an overcoat, for me. The material was ordinary cotton cloth dyed by hand, but each stitch eloquently declared warm and delicate care of the makers' hands.

The Xiaowangqing sewing unit, with only two or three sewing machines, made all the uniforms needed for a battalion or a regiment and even full-dress uniforms to the order of battalion or regimental headquarters for the officers and men of the Chinese nationalist units. A full-dress uniform included coat, trousers, cap, puttees and cartridge belts. The amount of work assigned to the unit by far exceeded its capacity. When they were overburdened with work, the diligent and faithful sewing-unit operatives would press on with their work without sleeping at night. When they were sleepy, they dipped their faces in water and sang to keep awake. They sang so much that they all learned scores of revolutionary songs by heart.

The first leader of the Xiaowangqing sewing unit was Kim Ryon Hwa. The people in Wangqing called her a hoyden. Some even called her a tomboy, since she occasionally smoked a cigarette. But this frivolous woman was very skilful at knitting and sewing. She began to learn sewing after she got married. Her husband was a misfortunate one-legged man. The first most significant means for earning a livelihood she had found in her hopeless struggle with poverty was doing needlework for others. Her skill in sewing had developed since then. She not only made smart uniforms, but also fine Chinese clothes. Those who had accused her of being a tomboy would now bow their heads in the direction of the valley where the sewing unit was situated, saying, "Please accept my humble greeting, sister," when once they had tried the clothes she made for them.

Many of the members of the sewing unit were forerunners of the culture of self-reliance with no less enthusiasm than the arsenal workers. Kim Myong Suk, Jon Mun Jin, Han Song Hui, An Sun Hwa, Choe Hul Suk, Kim Yong Gum, Kim Su Bok, Choe In Suk, Park long Suk, Jo Yong Suk, Park Su Hwan, Ma In Ok and Kim Son were all master-hands who accompanied us and worked hard to produce tens of thousands of uniforms. I cannot find the words to describe adequately the well-known last moment of An Sun Hwa, and the heroic death of six members of the sewing unit at the secret camp in Ganbahezi.

We built hospitals in each of the guerrilla zones to treat the wounded and ill. All the medical appliances used in the treatment, such as scalpels and tweezers, were made by the technicians in the arsenals and most of the herb medicines were obtained and produced by the medical workers, with the help of the masses. There were only a few modern medicines.

There was nowhere we could turn for doctors and nurses, so we had to train them for ourselves. A few pioneers who had been doctors of Koryo medicine trained a great number of assistants. Lim Chun Chu and Lee Pong Su were not only famous doctors with distinguished records but also qualified teachers who rendered meritorious services in the training of our medical reserves. How many people's lives were saved by their treatment, so that they could return with joy to their units!

We also solved the problem of food grains by relying on our own resources. It was not in our style to solve this problem by setting the people an amount of food to be delivered and then collecting it from them. We proposed the aim of attaining self-sufficiency in food for the army and the paramilitary organizations such as the Red Guards, Anti-Japanese Self-defense Corps, Children's Vanguard and the young volunteers' corps, and issued a strong demand to them to cultivate crops & wugh their own efforts on the arable land in the guerrilla zones. In the latter half of the 1930s, when the Korean People's Revolutionary Army expanded over a wide area and was conducting large-scale guerrilla warfare we sent troops to the rear to farm at the foot of Mt. Paektu, away from the battle fronts.

Self-reliance was thus essential to the survival of the revolutionary army in the long-drawn-out war against the Japanese. The realization that one could survive only by relying on oneself became a part of the thinking of all the guerrillas; self-reliance became their motto. Those who made this motto their very lifeblood upheld their honor even on an isolated island, and those who did not surrendered to the enemy or left their ranks, abandoning their principles halfway.

The seed of self-reliance nurtured by the anti-Japanese forerunners in the snowstorms of Paektu was implanted in the minds of the people of the whole country after liberation, serving as the motive power that kindled the flames of the effort to build a new Korea and gave birth in this eastern corner of the world to the legendary Chollima. When we began a project to manufacture an electric locomotive at a small factory which had been a repair shop, a foreign ambassador to our country said that he would pass through the eye of a needle if the Koreans made electric locomotives by themselves. The pleasant whistle of the electric locomotive Pulguni-1, which our workers and technicians made by relying on their own ability, shattered the ambassador's complacent prediction.

The spirit of self-reliance that rang out in the hammering of the arsenals in the guerrilla zones drove the pulse of the era of the Workers' Party and provided the powerful force that propelled this era forward.

The spirit of self-reliance, born of the tempest of the war against the Japanese, still pulses in the slogans, "Let us live our own way!" "Let us meet the requirements of Juche in ideology, technology and culture!" - slogans devised by the Secretary for Organizational Affairs, Kim Jong Il - and in the slogan, "When the Party decides, we do everything!" In the final decade of the turbulent 20th century our people are advancing towards new heights singing the March of Self-reliance, as they go.

8.7. An Immortal Flower

In the year 1933, the revolutionary organization in Wangougou sent Kim Kum Sun (Kim Kum Nyo ) and Kim Ok Sun, pupils of the Beidong Children's Corps school, to Xiaowangqing, according to the decision of higher echelon.

These two girls were talented members of an art troupe who were held in special affection by the people of the Yanji area. They came to Macun on an assignment from the revolutionary organization to spread songs and dances in the Wangqing guerrilla base, where there were many revolutionary people. In those days the revolutionary organizations in east Manchuria used to send many talented people to Xiaowangqing, the strategic center of the Korean revolution. The people in east Manchuria rendered every assistance to Xiaowangqing, just as our people nowadays spare nothing to support Pyongyang.

On their arrival at Macun the two girls, guided by the caretaker of the Beidong Children's Corps school who had accompanied them, came directly to the army headquarters to see me. I found them very young, not much over 10. At first I guessed they were sisters. But they were not only their names were similar.

The caretaker of the Beidong Children's Corps school introduced the girls to me in turn, explaining with humor the children's records and their family backgrounds. That story was very impressive. While the caretaker was telling me about her, Kim Ok Sun wept. I, too, was close to tears, for the 13 years of her life were full of tragic events.

When she was nine years old, she was engaged to a landlord's son who was more than 20 years old. The engagement was arranged by fraudulent means without her knowledge or her parents'. In those days a young man over 20 was regarded as an old bachelor, and his parents were anxiously searching for a good match through the offices of go-betweens. The young man was apparently a dim-wit or cripple, with no hopes of getting married by fair and just means.

In fact, his parents, unable to find a mate for their son who was now on the wrong side of 20, had hastily forged the engagement by treating the girl's father to a heavy drinking bout and forcing the drunken man to sealing the agreement with his thumb. According to the contract Kim Ok Sun was obliged by law to marry the bachelor when she was 15 years old. Her father remained unconscious of the outlandish contract for two days. When he came to himself back at home he cried bitterly in discovering in his pocket a document promising his daughter in marriage, sealed with his fingerprint, and 80 yuan of money of doubtful origin.

The money was a present from the family of the would-be bridegroom in return for the agreement. When she learned of this, Kim Ok Sun's life had been filled with tears. But her father, Kim Jae Man, who had sealed his daughter's future by means of this piece of paper, soon bought a straw-thatched house, a kitchen garden, an ox and a pig, and lived in quiet prosperity. He seemed to think there was no use crying over spilt milk, no use protesting against the power of the rich, and that the best thing to do was to turn the money to good account, to turn the misfortune into a blessing. Whenever his daughter wept over her future, he would soothe her, saying:

"Don't cry, my dear. That 80 yuan has breathed life into our ruined family. Anyway, this is better than dying of hunger. You will feel easier if you think that your engagement has saved your family from destruction.

The ignorant and simple man did not understand the revolution. He was so naive that he thought he could free himself from poverty, and even become a millionaire, if only he worked his fingers to the bone. This led him to harbor illusions about the landlord who was exploiting him. Now and then the landlord brought something to eat to the house, so Kim Jae Man thought there was no kinder landlord in this world than his. His daughter once went to the yard of her school to listen to a speech by an underground operative. When he learned about this, he beat her cruelly, for he was afraid that his daughter might become involved in the revolution.

Only when his village had been reduced to ashes for the fifth time by the enemy's "punitive" invasion was his class consciousness aroused. His family lost their house and draught animal at the hands of the invaders. Some of his neighbors were killed in fire. On the night when he sent his daughter to the Wangougou guerrilla zone, he said, "We must stake our lives now on a life-and-death struggle with the enemy, my dear. I was too ignorant of the ways of the world. Now you must join in the revolution and do away with those devils."

Later Kim Ok Sun made her home at Kim Kum Sun's house in Songlindong; together with Kum Sun, she attended the Children's Corps school in Beidong and as a member of the district, and then of the county art troupe, she participated in the work of enlightening the masses. Korean children like Kim Ok Sun at the tender age when they should have been complaining of their lot to indulgent parents, had to launch headfirst into the struggle with poverty, tugged to and fro by the tough waves of a world which made no allowances for them.

Our children rose in resistance against this cruel world, which was equally oppressive to young and old. The Korean children in Jiandao formed revolutionary organizations such as the Children's Corps, the Children's Vanguard and the Children's Expeditionary Corps in various areas, and participated in the struggle as an organized force. All our boys and girls, educated and trained in the revolutionary organizations, played their parts as more than mere small cogs in the wheel of the revolution against the Japanese.

Kim Ok Sun was one of these children, and so was Kim Kum Sun. When I heard her story I could not but feel pity for Kim Ok Sun. The misfortune of this little girl was the epitome of the misfortune suffered by millions of Korean children.

How laudable and honorable their determination and mettle were, when they left their dear homes at such a tender age and came to the guerrilla base to work for the revolution! They had walked hundreds of miles from Wangougou to Macun by way of Dahuangwai and Yaoyinggou in order to support Xiaowangqing and how thankful we were! How admirable and praiseworthy for these two girls to have come all the way to Xiaowangqing, making their way along the thorny path with the help of their canes, carrying heavy knapsacks on their backs and wearing work shoes made for adults!

Thinking that I should exchange those work shoes for canvass or rubber shoes, I asked them, "Who sent you to Xiaowangqing?"

"Mr. Yun Pyong Do did," the girls answered cheerfully, standing to attention, their hands on the sides of their skirts. Not only were their eyes as bright as stars, but their voices rang with refreshing vitality.

I was very glad. Being with children was one of the great pleasures of my life. Their laughter relieved me my sense of hardships and mental torment. Mix with children, share their feelings, and you will feel a strong urge to live, and you will understand that they bring beauty and variety to people's lives. You will also feel inspired with a sense of the noble duty of bringing them to full bloom and safeguarding the ideals glowing in their eyes.

Feeling pity for Kum Sun, with her calves and face covered in scratches, I asked her: "It must have cost you a great deal of trouble to come all this way. Didn't you find it hard to cross so many high passes?"

"We had a hard time of it with the blisters on our soles. But we did not give any sign that we felt tired, in case the man who was bringing us might send us back to Wangougou." "Wouldn't it have been nice to stay at home with your parents?"

"Yes, it would, but when will we become grown-ups like that? Our instructor in the Children's Corps said we had to experience hardships to become grown-ups. I want to grow up as soon as possible, through many hardships."

"Why do you wish to grow up quickly?"

"We will liberate Korea. Please don't send us back home, for mercy's sake, Commander Kim." I was surprised at her manly way of thinking. Young as she was, she was unusually advanced in her determination to devote her life to the liberation of Korea.

"Don't worry about that. You two girls are among the few talented children in Jiandao - why should I send you back? Stay with us in Wangqing from now on. Taking part in the Children's Corps life here will not be too bad at all."

Kum Sun did not hide her joy; she clapped her hands.

I asked the leaders of the YCL in the county and district to admit them to the Children's Corps school in Macun, so that they could continue their organizational life in the corps, and requested they be provided with lodgings in kind-hearted households, so that they would feel at home in this strange place so far away from their parents.

That year the guerrillas and the people of Wangqing held a grand May Day celebration in the playground of the Children's Corps school in Macun. The celebration was attended by all the soldiers in the Wangqing area. The two girls from Wangougou won first place in the running and high jump respectively that day, receiving warm applause from the people of Wangqing. Kum Sun was small in build for her age. When she walked, with a knapsack on her back, moving her legs quickly in her light gait at the head of the art troupe, everybody smiled at her pure cute image.

I, too, derived much strength from this image. By nature, I preferred optimists. In the days when we were fighting arduous battle in the mountains and surviving on grass root, one optimist gave more strength than dozens of guns. Kum Sun was an outstanding fighter and optimist, representing the youngest generation of the alliance of the three organizations - the Communist Party, YCL and Children's Corps.

Some days after I met Kum Sun, I called the pupils of the school to the headquarters to learn how they were getting along.

From the outset the Children's Corps members were always supposed to carry a week's emergency rations with them in knapsacks. But many of the children I examined had eaten the parched-rice flour supplied by the school. Only Kum Sun had kept her rations quite untouched. After examining their knapsacks I praised her by giving the thumbs up sign, saying, "The other children have eaten theirs all, but Kum Sun, the youngest, has resisted temptation splendidly. She is the best!"

She only smiled, looking shy, and then said, "I, too, have taken out the powder pouch several times. I was scarcely able to suppress the temptation to eat it." "But how did you do it?"

"While the others were eating the flour, I kept my eyes shut. If I still felt like eating, I went outside. And when I could not bear it any more outside, I went to the well and drank a dipperful of water. Then I felt as full as if I had eaten the flour."

I was moved to admiration by her fluent answer. This child's sorrowful mind mirrored the destitution of the people in the guerrilla zone, and the noble aspiration of these young indomitable eagles to develop the revolution staunchly in spite of crushing poverty. That day we gave each of the children ten cups of parched-rice flour and some corncakes, and put matchboxes in their knapsacks. A few days later we sent their school two cartloads of supplies, including new padded clothes and quilts, shoes, notebooks and pencils. We fought frequent battles, and had kept some of the captured goods in reserve. Food and clothes were scarce, but we sent a large share of the reserves to the Children's Corps school.

"All the best things for the children!" - this has become an immutable principle of our life nowadays; even in those difficult days when we were fighting in a foreign land we would give the children everything we could, according to this principle. In order to obtain food, clothes and other things we needed for them, we would not hesitate to take the army into battle.

We promoted the slogan, "Let us always be ready for the independence of Korea and the liberation of the world's proletariat!" among the Children's Corps and educated them in the spirit of patriotism and proletarian internationalism.

They performed truly great exploits, no less significant than those performed by the adults, enlightening the masses, giving artistic performances, standing guard duty, delivering messages, reconnoitering enemy movements, capturing weapons from the enemy, and defending the guerrilla zone. When we were rebuilding the log-cabins burned down during the enemy's "punitive" atrocities we could always see them at work, these young eagles, running with rice balls along the trenches where revolutionary soldiers were embattled, singing revolutionary songs amid the flames of the battle fought to defend the guerrilla base. In the farming season they weeded and harvested in the fields.

Sometimes they would pick wild fruits and send them to the guerrilla barracks. One day I saw the pupils of the Children's Corps school standing sentry at the central sentry-post on Mt. Poyojok. With a heavy grenade on each of their waists, they stood on guard, each holding a 1.5-metre pole tipped with an iron spearhead. They said they were relieved every hour. They changed the guards when half of a joss stick the length of two matchsticks was burned away. They told me the stick burned for two hours, and I thought this method of measuring time quite ingenious.

These children once came to see me with a suit of clothes consisting of lined Korean jacket and trousers, trouser-leg ties, grey silk waistcoat, riding breeches, leather shoes, boots and black rubber shoes. It was a token of their thanks to me for sending trophies to their school on many occasions. In those days we sent the Children's Corps members all the Korean apples we captured from the Japanese convoys. Many of the children were born in this foreign country and had never been to Korea or seen a Korean apple. Kim Ok Sun, who witnessed the event, often recalls with warm affection the tears full of earnest gratitude, which the children shed when they received the crates of apples.

Park Kil Song, the head of the children's department, visited their school one day and told them, "Boys and girls, Commander Kim takes loving care of us just as a father cares for his own children. We are the beneficiaries of his love, unable to repay his kindness. We have to show our thanks to him. What do you think we should do?"

As soon as Park finished speaking, Kum Sun stood up and said, "Let us have some fine clothes made for him. They say he wears unlined clothes even in the winter cold."

Park Kil Song smiled at her words.

"Kum Sun has suggested making some fine clothes for him. What do you think of the idea?" The children answered in chorus, "It's a good idea."

"Alright, then. I, too, had thought of making warm clothes for him as Kum Sun has suggested. Let us obtain some cloth and have some good clothes tailored by the women's association members or by the sewing-unit members. But you must remember that cloth does not simply fall from the sky."

Kum Sun stood up again and spoke freely:

"Let us pick mushrooms, dry them and sell them. They say mushrooms are expensive. Once we have money, we can buy cloth."

The other children echoed her words enthusiastically, "That's it, that's it. Let us pick mushrooms and sell them to landlords."

Starting the next day they went to the mountains with Park Kil Song, carrying baskets. I saw them several times marching in line past the valley in Lishugou, singing as they carried the picked mushrooms, but I did not know the secret contained in those baskets. I only thought they were going to all this trouble to gather tasty food for the wounded in the hospital. Those mushrooms had now been transformed into money and then into the clothes which appeared before me.

After making the Children's Corps salute Kum Sun said, "We had a suit of clothes made for you, since you wear unlined clothes even in the winter cold. Please accept it."

It was true that I used to wear unlined clothes in winter. Taking the clothes I felt like weeping, without knowing why. I said to them, "Though I wear unlined clothes, I am in the prime of my life. I will not forget your kindness all my life long. I am going to give these clothes to a grandfather who is the oldest person in Xiaowangqing; please don't feel disappointed."

They looked at me regretfully, tears on their unhappy faces. They were very sorry that I had not accepted the clothes for myself. I had to speak to them two or three more times before they would smile.

After the mass meeting was over, Kum Sun came to me and whispered, as she felt the sleeves of my uniform, "The cloth is so thin that the wind will blow right through it to the bone." Even now, when the winter cold arrives, those words spoken by Kum Sun in Xiaowangqing ring in my ears.

At first the Wangqing people used to call her "black eye." They gave her that nickname because her eyes were black. Some time later she was given another nickname - "Macun hawfinch." The women from the Kilju and Myongchon areas gave her this nickname because she was small and yet lovable like a hawfinch. When people called her "Black eye!" she simply answered "Yes!" and the same when they called her "Macun hawfinch!" She was not offended even if they used her nicknames dozens of times a day.

It was a red-letter day for the Wangqing people when Kum Sun gave a performance of tap-dancing. She always danced with Ok Sun and this dance received the greatest applause of all the items in the performance program of the art troupe of the Children's Corps. When she repeated the turn in which she wove a kerchief between her legs while beating out a quick rhythm on the stage with her feet, the audience would cheer and stamp.

During my days in Wangqing in the mornings I used to ride up and down the valley of Macun on my white horse to learn about the situation in the guerrilla zone, and think up new plans. The morning ride was an essential part of my daily routine. The bugler of the guerrilla army, Song Kap Ryong, and my orderly, Jo Wal Nam, accompanied me on these rides. I always came across a singing squad of Children's Corps members on the road, and their song delighted and refreshed my mind.

How can I adequately describe the feeling of satisfaction I felt as I sat there on horseback and looked at those healthy, vivacious faces with pink cheeks! I did not skip my ride even on snowy or rainy days for I wanted to see them. I thought how they would miss me if they did not see me on the road, when they had come out in spite of the rain and snow. Their feelings were the same as mine, they took their stroll in all weathers. Kum Sun always led the chorus. In that unharmonious ringing chorus made up of scores of voices we could easily single out Kum Sun's peculiar chirping voice. And when I heard that voice I felt a sense of security, and a rather superstitious belief that everything would go smoothly in the guerrilla zone, although I could not say why.

But one day I did not hear her voice among the chorus of the pupils of the Children's Corps school shaking the valley in Lishugou. Feeling that I was listening to a strange song sung by children from some other region, I went out into the yard of the headquarters. The singing squad was just passing a small lane near the headquarters. Kum Sun was standing at the head of the squad as always. She was plodding along without singing, with her head lowered for some reason. Lee Mm Hak, the head of the Children's Corps, was leading the chorus that morning in her place. The singing squad without Kum Sun's leadership was just like a chorus troupe deprived of its leading singer.

That day I could not settle down to work. I went to the school shortly before sunset to see her, and there I heard the sad news that her family in Wangougou had all been killed by the enemy. I realized why she had marched with the singing squad with her mouth closed and why Lee Mm Hak had to lead the chorus in her place. That day she rested her head on my lap and cried so bitterly that she nearly fainted. Trembling like a Sparrow soaked in water, she said, "What can I do? What is the point of living when my father, mother and younger brother have all been killed?"

It was difficult to console her. I stayed at the school until it became dark, trying to calm her down.

"Steady yourself, Kum Sun. If you waver, and give in to grief, the enemy will try to kill you as well. The Japanese swine are trying to wipe out the Koreans in Jiandao. But we cannot let them take our lives so easily. In spite of everything, you must grow up to be a fine revolutionary and take revenge on the enemy."

Only then did she stop crying and look up at me, wiping away the tears.

"I will have my revenge on the enemy, as you have said."

After this she became a girl of few words, and she did not laugh easily. Indeed, she seldom laughed aloud or raised her voice to chatter as before. When leading the chorus she no longer chirped like a sparrow as she had done in earlier days. Her lovable nickname, "Macun hawfinch," disappeared from use in Xiaowangqing. The young girl's thoughts of vengeance were expressed in her redoubled devotion to the life of the Children's Corps and the activities of the art troupe.

The art troupe of the Children's Corps, with Kum Sun as its main pillar, conducted brisk activities in such enemy-controlled areas as Shixian and Fluimudong in Tumen. The fame of the Wangqing children's art troupe extended as far as north Manchuria and beyond the boundaries of east Manchuria.

In those days the communists in east and north Manchuria maintained close contact with each other across the Laoyeling Mountains. The natural barriers of the mountain terrain could not prevent the communists in the two regions from constantly visiting each other, and assisting each other.

The guerrilla bases which had transformed Jiandao into a stronghold of the struggle against Japan had become a model of the ideal land for which all the people yearned and the new society and order established in these bases aroused the neighboring people's admiration and envy, they dreamed of a similar life. In particular, the battle of the Dongning county town was a turning-point in raising the prestige of the communists among the people and armed units in Manchuria.

After this battle, the NSA soldiers began to call me "Commander Kim," and in general it was from that time that people began to call me "General Kim" and "Commander Kim." All the policies and democratic measures we put into practice in the guerrilla zones were addressed to the primary concerns of the times, and enjoyed the blessings of all the people.

On several occasions the party organizations and military departments in north Manchuria sent visitors' groups to the guerrilla zones in Wangqing and its vicinity in order to learn about the experience of the people in east Manchuria in building guerrilla zones.

The center of Wangqing in those days was not Xiaowangqing; it was Yaoyinggou. Kum Sun and the other members of the children's art troupe left Macun when, after the enemy's large-scale "punitive" invasion, all the structures of the guerrilla zone moved simultaneously to Yaoyinggou. I also moved there with some army units in the spring of 1934.

In the summer of the same year a visitors' group from Ningan County, consisting of underground organization members and guerrillas, and led by Im Yong Ju, a woman secretary of the YCL, came to Duitoulazi from Badaohezi via Sheaxiandong. The local people and guerrillas in Yaoyinggou gave the visitors a warm welcome. The Children's Corps members shouted, "A warm welcome to the visitors' group from north Manchuria!" and waved triangular red flags.

In the evening a bonfire was lit in the yard of the guerrilla quarters and a performance was staged for the group. The children's art troupe staged a varied program for the guests, for they had many Children's Corps members with exceptional artistic skills. Lee Mm Hak was good at dancing and playing the harmonica. When he played a humorous part in a drama the audience split their sides laughing. Kim Jae Bom was also a talented dancer. He was especially skilled at imitating the gait of a duck or a rabbit while he was dancing. These children staged their performances and disseminated songs, roving through every revolutionary organizational district in Wangqing County.

We made dancing-dresses for the art troupe from the best silk cloth among the trophies we had captured, and also solved the problem of providing other stage costumes for them. While staying in Yaoyinggou for some days, a small unit of the Anti-Japanese Allied Army, sent by Zhou Bao-zhong, learned of the experience gained by the Wangqing guerrilla unit. This was not a simple tourist trip, more like training which combined drill and practice. Throughout the days of their stay they followed the daily schedule we had defined, and engaged in military drill, political study and cultural activities, just as the Wangqing unit did.

We gave the YCL and Children's Corps organizations assignments to pay visits to their quarters regularly. When, after much practice, the children's art troupe managed to teach the soldiers revolutionary songs in Chinese, the soldiers in turn taught the children some interesting Chinese songs. On some days the children would visit them, having prepared a drama in the Chinese language.

The guests from north Manchuria were impressed by the activities of the children's art troupe, and would invite the children to their quarters whenever they cooked delicious food.

On returning to north Manchuria, they publicized the children's art troupe very widely. In the summer of 1934, Zhou Bao-zhong invited the children's art troupe of Wangqing to north Manchuria. We readily complied with his request. I told Park Kil Song that he should make good preparations for the tour in order to delight the soldiers and people of north Manchuria. Then I framed a detailed itinerary for the art troupe's activities in north Manchuria.

We sent the art troupe to north Manchuria in order to bring the Chinese people some happiness and further consolidate our solidarity with them.

Zhou Bao-zhong's invitation to the children's art troupe was aimed at educating the men and officers of the Chinese nationalist army units which were then under the influence of the communists. Zhou Baozhong, who was working as the chief administrative officer of the Suming Anti-Japanese Allied Army, which was organized in the area around Ningan, was making tireless efforts to rally the anti-Japanese forces that had dropped out of Wang De-lin's national salvation army.

After sending the art troupe to north Manchuria I felt ill at ease for some days. My mind was never free of the worry that the young ones might not reach their destination in safety, though they were well used to battles, hunger and all sorts of hardships. It would be difficult for all of the children, but how could the young ones like Kum Sun negotiate the steep Laoyeling Mountains? However, I need not have worried. All the members of the art troupe were young eagles trained in the maelstrom, indomitable fighters who had many times braved the threat of death.

They easily crossed the mountains which I had considered an impassable barrier, and passed safely through the area infested by bandits. When it was raining, they marched on, wearing pine twigs or the birch-bark on their heads instead of umbrellas. At night they would cook rice for themselves in canteens, took a light meal and then slept in the open air by the campfire, with guards posted. Some children suffered serious stomach troubles deep in the mountains.

Worse still, their route of march was not the highroad between Wangqing and Laoyeling, along which ox-carts and sleighs had passed, but a steep short cut used only by the guerrilla army messengers. And yet not a single straggler appeared among them on the hundred-mile-long journey. I was told that even Kum Sun, the youngest in the troupe, climbed over the mountains by herself, singing as she went and rejecting the other children's offer to take her knapsack.

In later years Kim Ok Sun, who went to north Manchuria with her, used to amuse me with tales about their activities among the NSA units, whenever she had an opportunity. The curtain rose on the children's art troupe's premiere at Chai Shirong's unit, stationed in Machang. Chai was the man most under the influence of the communists among the leaders of the Chinese national salvation army units. If we educated him in a somewhat more efficient way, we could easily make an ally of him, and there was even a chance of making him into a communist.

The premiere in Machang began with a speech by Kum Sun. As many as 150 officers and men enjoyed the performance together with Chai Shi-rong and they were most impressed. As Kum Sun finished her speech, they could not conceal their excitement, and said, "How well that little girl speaks! We must fight against Japan all the more bravely for the sake of that girl."

Commander Chai was so moved that he took her to his room, set her on his lap and put earrings and bracelets on her ears and wrists. He even provided two coaches for the art troupe so that they could travel to their performances.

The tour of performances, which had been scheduled to last for one week, was prolonged several times at the request of the Chinese nationalist soldiers. The art troupe also staged a performance at Zhou Baozhong's unit.

Chai Shi-rong presented them with two cartloads of gifts, including padded coats, dabushanzi, scarves, pork, chicken, dried starch noodles and wheat flour. He also gave each of the children a satchel and presented them with some rifles.

When the art troupe returned to Yaoyinggou from the tour, I was in another region with my unit. As soon as I returned to the guerrilla zone, the children came and stood around me in a circle and boasted of the gifts they had received in north Manchuria.

"These were all given to us by a man called Commander Chai. He had a beard like Lenin, and he was very kind-hearted. I went to his room and had some trotters. Mr. Zhou Bao-zhong also gave us many gifts."

This was how Kum Sun praised Commander Chai and Zhou Baozhong; she set a 7-shooter at my side, saying, "You should keep this revolver, General. We've decided."

She emphasized the word "decided," but as soon as she had finished she laughed at herself for some reason I did not understand. I carried the revolver for a few days in case the children should feel disappointed; then I quietly gave it to the leader of the young volunteers' corps.

I also ensured that all the other arms were handed over to the young volunteers' corps, and the other gifts dealt with as the children's art troupe wished. That autumn a miraculous rumor that Kum Sun's mother was still alive spread throughout the Yaoyinggou guerrilla zone. When she heard the rumor Kum Sun romped about the valley in Yaoyinggou with scores of daisies in her hair; the people in the guerrilla base who knew her family's story were delighted to see this.

The Children's Corps organization decided to help her to realize her wish to see her mother. At first Kum Sun who knew only too well what her duty was and had a high sense of collective responsibility, was not willing to accept the assistance of the organization, saying that she alone could not enjoy such special favor, when many other children also wanted to see their parents.

I saw her for the last time in the autumn of 1934 when our unit was taking preparations for the north Manchuria expedition in Zhuanjiaolou. The children's art troupe came to that region and staged an art performance. I think it was a special performance bidding farewell to the expeditionary force. After the performance we caught a roe deer and made dumplings to treat the art troupe members.

As I was going outside after looking around the house in which they were taking their meal, Kum Sun pushed aside the dishes she had been eating, hurried over to me and whispered in my ear as if telling me a great secret, "I have heard that my mother is alive, General." "It's true. All the guerrillas are delighted at the news. I am very happy, too." "I was so happy that I sang a solo three times today. And I wanted to sing still more. "Then sing as much as you can."

I picked a fine-toothed bamboo comb and a coarse comb from among the trophies I had brought with me to give the children in Zhuanjiaolou and put them in her hand.

"Thank you, General."

She clung to my sleeve as if she were my little child. It was heartening to observe jubilation in the behavior and speech of this lovable young girl who had never played on other people's affection in spite of her young age.

"Well, you must go to see your mother soon. I am afraid I cannot see you off, for I have to go to north Manchuria."

That was the last conversation I had with Kum Sun.

When she returned to her school after the art performance in Zhuanjiaolou, the revolutionary organization in Yaoyinggou was looking for a suitable person to transmit a classified document to an enemy-held area. The organization was discussing seriously on the problem of who would be safest and most appropriate as a messenger. Eventually, Kum Sun was selected.

When the organization entrusted her, and nobody else, with this important task, the young girl readily accepted it as an expression of the greatest trust.

On the day she was to leave on the mission, Han Song Hui took the girl to the waterside and washed her face, combed her hair, fastened her shoes, and smoothed down her skirt as she would have done for a bride. She pierced three acorns with a pin and set them in her hair instead of a ribbon. That day the Children's Corps members accompanied her to the edge of the village to see her off.

*Where are you going to?
I am going to Yanji.
Which hill are you crossing?
I am crossing Jiqing Pass.
Why are you going there?
I am going on a mission.
Whom are you going with?
I am going alone.*

She walked with short steps through the forest, humming a song. She made up the words as she walked along. The others laughed, clapping their hands, to hear the song, and echoed her words in a chorus which reverberated across the valley of Yaoyinggou.

After delivering the message she was arrested, together with several adults, by Japanese gendarmes while on her way to see her mother. They were surely delighted to learn that she was from the guerrilla zone, and thought that the "kid communist" would let out important information. Apparently they discovered that she had come from Yaoyinggou, and thought they might be able to drag confidential information out of her, since the leadership structures of east Manchuria were situated in Yaoyinggou.

It was in fact true that she knew secrets about many aspects of the guerrilla zone. She knew a great deal about the movements of the revolutionary army, the activities of the leadership, the secret routes connecting the guerrilla zone to the semi-guerrilla zones, the living conditions and attitudes of the people in the base, and so forth. Since, as a member of the art troupe, she had performed on many occasions in enemy-held areas, they might be able to squeeze information out of her about the underground organizations if they could break her. Aware of their opportunity, they did their best to extract valuable information from her. At first they treated her to delicious foods and cajoled her with sweet words. Then they intimidated her and tortured her.

I once read a foreign story about a boy living in a village on an island who was executed by his father because he was tempted by a silver watch and revealed the whereabouts of a man who had been hiding in a haystack. As the story suggests, it is easy to persuade a child. Children can be tempted by things or give in to threats or torture.

But children who have been trained politically through the organizational life do not disgrace their honor. Not a single member of the Children's Corps ever abandoned his or her political creed for a penny. So Kang Ryom, Lee Hon Su and Lim Hyong Sam, who grew up under the care of our Party after liberation, were all young boys of 13-15 years, but they did not reveal the secrets of their organizations even when threatened by the enemy's bayonets during the Fatherland Liberation War.

Kum Sun was an indomitable young fighter tempered like steel in the flames of the anti-Japanese revolution. This young daughter of Korea refused to speak even under cruel torture. She only opened her mouth to condemn and curse the hangmen.

The provost officer who was interrogating her said, "We will kill you if you don't say anything."

"How nasty you are! I will not speak with bandits," Kum Sun answered.

The merciless hangmen decided to kill young Kum Sun for the sole reason that she would not confess the secrets of the revolutionary army. All the people, who saw the young girl from the guerrilla zone, covered in blood and gore, dragged to the place of execution, gritted their teeth in indignation. That field in Baicaogou became a sea of tears. But Kum Sun shouted to these mothers, fathers, brothers and sisters who felt such sympathy and pity for her, "Why are you crying, dear fathers and mothers? Don't cry. The revolutionary army soldiers will surely wipe out the enemy. You must fight staunchly until the day when the motherland is liberated!"

Her fiery speech summed up the nine years of her life. The execution site rang to her sharp cry, "Down with the Japanese imperialists! Long live the Korean revolution!"

After hearing that she had been killed, I did not visit the Children's Corps school for some time. I somehow felt afraid of going to the school. It was too sad and depressing to think of the Children's Corps school and children's art troupe without Kum Sun. The enemy had deprived me of the butterfly spirit of the art troupe and the skylark voice of the guerrilla zone, who had been loved so well by the Wangqing people.

Who would now sing as sweetly as Kum Sun and who would dance as briskly, lightly and gracefully as she for the people in the guerrilla zone as they fought bloody battles and combated grave difficulties? Who would enchant the officers and men of the Chinese national salvation army with fluent Chinese songs, as Kum Sun had done, and who would cast me such a lively, bright and lovable smile as she did when I Went for my morning ride?

The sad news of the death of Kum Sun perturbed the revolutionary masses in the Wangqing area. A solemn ceremony in her memory was held in Yaoyinggou. Enraged young men and women from all the counties of east Manchuria joined the Korean People's Revolutionary Army in swearing to take revenge upon the enemy.

A magazine connected with the Communist International and Chinese and Japanese publications vied in reporting the achievements of this young heroine unprecedented in the history of the liberation struggle of the oppressed nations in the world. Her heroic life was retold under the title of Short Biography of a Young Girl Martyr. The skylark of the guerrilla zone, Kum Sun, who had tirelessly crossed many torrents and mountains on her tiny feet, thus shook the world at the age of nine.

In the modern history of our country there is a famous patriotic girl martyr, called Ryu Kwan Sun. The mention of her name recalls the March First Movement of the year 1919. The girl was a scholar at the Rihwa School in Seoul, but she went back to her native district in Chonan, South Chungchong Province, when the school was forced to close in the wake of the March First Movement; there she organized a demonstration for independence and led it from the front before being arrested by the Japanese gendarmes.

The court sentenced her to a heavy penalty of 7 years' imprisonment. In view of the fact that the terms of servitude given to 33 people who had initiated the movement were 3 years at the maximum and 1 year at the minimum, and the fact that some of them had been found not guilty, we can see how seriously the Japanese judiciary regarded the 16-year-old girl's case of felony. Even the peasants in remote areas were aghast, saying that seven years was the longest term of penal servitude in the history of the March First Movement. When she had died in the Sodaemun prison, our nation dubbed her the "Joan of Arc of Korea" and she is still remembered with warm affection.

No such a title has yet been conferred on Kum Sun. For there are no girl heroines of her age and no other girls who have performed exploits comparable to hers. That our nation has a girl heroine such as Kum Sun in addition to Ryu Kwan Sun, the heroine of the March First Movement, is our nation's distinctive source of pride and glory. A novel and film depicting Kum Sun have been produced recently, but this is not enough to preserve all her exploits for posterity. It would not be too much to erect a gold or bronze monument to young heroes or heroines such as Kum Sun.

Kum Sun died at the age of nine, but she is immortal. Though her life was short as a flash of lightning, she had reached the acme of mental development and set a perfect example of an honorable life. While there are many people in the world who have lived for a hundred years and left nothing worth mentioning to their nations, at the age of nine she performed an undying exploit that will be enshrined in the hearts of coming generations.

It can be regarded as a meritorious deed of the Korean communists to have raised this young heroine of world renown. In the flames of the anti-Japanese revolution we communists trained many children into young heroes and heroines, including Kim Kum Sun, Jon Ki Ok, Mok Un Sik, Kang Ryong Nam, Park Myong Suk, Park Ho Chol, Ho Jong Suk, Lee Kwang Chun, Kim Tuk Bong and others. They were all young martyrs thrown up during the tempest of the anti-Japanese revolution.

"Don't kill me by shooting, but with bayonets, and send the bullets to the guerrilla army." This was what Jon Ki Ok, a member of the Children's Corps in Munchun, who was arrested by the enemy while transmitting a message, said to the puppet Manchukuo policemen in the last moment of his life at the execution site. Even the firing squad was moved by his noble revolutionary spirit in placing the guerrilla army and victory in the anti-Japanese war above his own life and health even amid the dreadful tension and fear of death just prior to execution.

This brilliant feat by the mere boy, Mok Un Sik, is worth broadcasting to the whole world. On his way from Yongchangdong to Pinggang, carrying a secret message in his straw sandal, he was interrogated by the enemy at a guard post on the Jiqing Pass. The guards who were desperately searching his body for secrets suddenly tried to pull the straw sandal off his left foot. At this he pushed aside the self-defense corps man who was interrogating him and rushed straight into the post, where he thrust his right leg into the oven - the message was in the straw sandal on his right foot.

The enemy, realizing the reason for his action, beat him to a pulp in the attempt to draw him away from the oven. But despite the enemy's kicks and blows, he kept a firm grasp of the oven and did not take his foot out of fire. His straw sandal, his foot and his trouser leg were all burned. The enemy took him to a hospital and gave him an injection to bring him round, for he had lost consciousness. Their attempts to extract secrets from him were truly unrelenting. But Mok Un Sik breathed his last without revealing the secret he kept in his mind.

All the members of the Children's Corps and the Children's Vanguard who assisted in the anti-Japanese armed struggle were heroes and heroines, representing the youngest element of the first generation of our revolution.

Our revolution still regards the Children's Union, along with the League of Socialist Working Youth, as a dependable reserve for the Workers' Party. This is why we build our palaces for children with all the precious things in the country and spare nothing for the education of the younger generation. I still tell the officials today to take loving care of the younger generation, and emphasize time and again that the children are the kings of our country. A revolution which does not love and care for the children has no future. It is foolish to expect that such a revolution will attain its glorious ideal.

Today an epidemic of hedonism is cutting a wide swath across the rest of the globe. The extreme egoism of caring only for oneself and not thinking about the younger generation has encroached very far upon the minds of many people. Some of them do not have children, alleging that they are a nuisance, and others give up the thought of marrying. Needless to say, it is a matter of personal choice whether one gets married or has children. But what pleasure is there in living without the younger generation?

The revisionists, who are addicted to extreme egoism and hedonism, are not taking care of the younger generation; they are disarming them spiritually and exposing them to all sorts of social evils. If the teenagers wail and lament at the chaos of reality, and bear a grudge against their parents, people in power and the world in general, then the revolution of that country has no future or its prospects are at best gloomy.

But when the officials spare no time, money, passion or effort for the sake of the future generation, our revolution will produce more children like Kim Kum Sun, Jon Ki Ok and Mok Un Sik.

As the family of a famous revolutionary, Kum Sun's family suffered terrible ordeals in the maelstrom of the anti-Japanese war. Her father, who was the head of the underground revolutionary organization in Wangougou, was falsely accused of being a member of the "Minsaengdan" and was killed. Her mother died a heroic death in the battlefield, fighting with a rifle in her hands to defend the guerrilla base. When her father was alive I gave him many difficult secret assignments. He was a man of strong will who carried through the tasks he had been entrusted with to the end. Five members of her family, including herself, were killed. How very similar their fate is to that of Ryu Kwan Sun's family!

This cruel and merciless destiny, however, did leave an heir to the lifeblood of this laudable family. The girl's two-year-old younger brother, whom her mother had left in the care of villagers before she went to her death in the battlefield, miraculously survived. It was Kim Jong Il, Secretary for Organizational Affairs, who identified Kim Kum Sun's younger brother and reported it to me. At that time her brother, Kim Yang Nam, was working as a music compiler at the documentary film studio after graduating from the university of music and dance. He had read in some publication that his father was executed on a charge of involvement in the "Minsaengdan," and this knowledge had distressed him. He had been afraid that his father's dishonorable death might cause a public scandal.

I assured him that his father had been a faithful revolutionary, not a member of the "Minsaengdan."

From then, he worked as an official of the Party Central Committee, giving guidance in the field of art and literature and energetically assisting Secretary Kim Jong Il in his work. Like his sister, he was endowed with musical talent and intense ardor. The cowboy of yesterday, who plaintively lamented the surging sorrow of a mined people on a grass harp, devoted his heart and soul to creating operas from the original revolutionary musical art.

Kim Yang Nam was one of the people who rendered distinguished service in the creation of the Mansudae Art Troupe and its development into one of the world's first troupes under the personal guidance of Secretary Kim Jong Il. In February 1971, the Mansudae Art Troupe gave a historic first performance in the Western Hemisphere, in Cuba, thousands of miles away from our motherland. At that time, Kim Yang Nam was guiding the troupe as deputy head for political affairs.

Secretary Kim Jong Il always felt pity for Kim Yang Nam's sad past: as the only heir to Kim Kum Sun's family, who had been nourished on other women's milk and spent his childhood and boyhood as other's servant. Kim Jong Il took particularly loving care of him, as though he were his own flesh and blood. When he contracted a fatal disease, Kim Jong Il organized an efficient medical team to provide him with intensive medical treatment round the clock; he also transmitted his diagnosis to our embassies in foreign countries in order to obtain adequate supplies of expensive medicines, and sent special airplanes to countries which were said to have a developed pharmaceutical industry.

Kim Yang Nam underwent operations 10 times and this intensive care lengthened the span of his lifetime by almost two years.

Kim Yang Nam died at the age of 40, which means he lived more than four times as long as his sister. But measured with the standard of our times, when there are so many people who live to a great age, his lifetime was short and he died too early. The ancient philosophy which says that "The good die young" must be regarded as out of keeping with the principles of life for the sake of many Kim Kum Suns and Kim Yang Nams who are still living in this world. Kim Yang Nam's second son recently graduated from the faculty of composition of the Pyongyang University of Music and Dance, which his father attended, and began creating musical pieces for the Mansudae Art Troupe. He is now singing the same revolutionary songs his grandfather, grandmother, aunt and father used to sing.

In this way our revolution, pioneered in blood by the forerunners, is inherited and wonderfully improved through the generations. Though Kum Sun is dead, her mettle and soul are still alive pulsating in the minds of the younger generation powerfully as they did in the days of her innocent childhood when she was romping about the valleys in Macun and Yaoyinggou.

9.1. The Korean People's Revolutionary Army

---

It is elementary political knowledge that where there are people, there is a state and where there is a state, there is an armed force. Except for a few such special countries as Monaco, nearly all countries, large and small, have their own national armed forces for self-defense. The reason why many small and weak nations surrendered their sovereignty under the threat of a few volleys of gunfire from the colonialists and were obliged to become their slaves for hundreds of years was that they had had no armed forces or very weak ones.

The armed force of Lee dynasty, too, was annihilated, it was incapable of defending the country. This armed force, which had been so heinous in the suppression of rebels, reviled the foreign aggressors for some time, but did not fire a single gun before yielding. The ruin of our country can be ascribed to this inefficient armed force as well as to the corrupt government.

In order to win back the sovereignty of the country, the patriots of Korea organized the Independence Army. It is inevitable that the nation which has been deprived of its sovereignty will organize its armed force for its restoration. The nationalists organized the Independence Army and conducted armed resistance for many years, and the Korean communists organized the guerrilla army and dealt a heavy blow at the Japanese imperialist aggressors. Our small secret armed force, which started the long march of the anti-Japanese struggle, had now developed into an army with a regimental force in each county in Jiandao.

After repulsing the enemy's winter "punitive" operations, we realized very keenly the need to reorganize the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army into a people's revolutionary army and we discussed this matter seriously with the commanding officers of the guerrilla units in other regions. In the light of the prevailing situation merging the guerrilla regiments in the different counties into a single command was a pressing need, and the natural course of development of the AJPGA itself. Reorganizing the AJPGA into the Korean People's Revolutionary Army was a revolutionary measure which would improve its combat efficiency and counter the large-scale offensive of the Japanese imperialists more effectively by providing a unified command for the enlarged guerrilla forces.

At the meeting at Mingyuegou the need for a large revolutionary force became the subject of our discussion. When discussing the future of the AJPGA there, we agreed that at the initial stage we should organize guerrilla battalions, develop their quantity and quality for some time, and then in due course reorganize them into a larger revolutionary force. Of course this matter was not a major item on the agenda at that meeting. However, the delegates had heated discussions about the future of the revolutionary armed force both within and outside the meeting. The most ardent proponents of the idea of large revolutionary forces were O Pin and Park Hun.

It is a common practice in colonies or semi-colonial countries for the armed forces of resistance to be organized on a small scale initially, expanded with gradual stealth and, when conditions are ripe, unified into a command. At the initial stage, when it returned from exile in Mexico, Fidel Castro's unit had 82 soldiers, of whom only 12 men survived. These people, equipped with seven rifles, went into the Sierra Maestra Mountains, developed their strength by expanding their ranks, and then attacked Havana, toppling the pro-US dictatorial regime of Batista as swiftly as lightning.

In the latter half of 1933, the merger of the guerrilla forces in Jiandao into a unified command became a major topic of discussion as a result of the lessons of Operation Macun for repulsing the enemy's winter "punitive" operations and the heroic battle fought in defense of tens of thousands of square miles of territory.

At the meeting to review operations, it was not the commanders of the 2nd company and 3rd company, who had fought with us throughout the 90-day defense of Xiaowangqing, but company commander Han Hung Gwon, who had been far away from the zone of operations, who spoke fervently about the need for cooperation between various companies and the merger of units. Han Hung Gwon said that the mission of his company in Operation Macun had been to contain a possible enemy advance to east Manchuria across the Laoyeling, but his company had not fought a single battle with the enemy, rendering no assistance to the main force in fighting. In other words, he implied that his company had not been able to attack the enemy from behind as it should during the enemy's "punitive" attack on the guerrilla zones. I thought a lot as I listened to his speech. His speech was self-critical, but he was not to blame in any way. He was an efficient commander who had carried out his mission in a responsible way.

Why did he criticize himself as being a commander lacking in dedication, revolutionary principle and insight? In short, what was he attempting to emphasize during the review? While he accused himself of shortsightedness, I, as his superior, drew a serious lesson from Operation Macun. The lesson was that, in order to organize harmonious cooperation between companies in accordance with the ever-changing combat situation, we needed an adequate command and staff structure and this required a unified system of command. His opinion was, after all, that 'people's guerrilla forces against the Japanese should be merged into one well-regulated command system.

Throughout the fight to frustrate the enemy's attack the guerrilla forces, operating separately in many places, fought separately, without any cooperation with their neighbors or any assistance from them.

In Helong County, for instance, the enemy was said to have launched his "clean-up" of the guerrilla base in Yulangcun in early November 1933. His first attempt had been checked for some time by a fierce counterattack and his second "punitive" operation had lasted only for three days, from the end of November. That was all the fighting they had there. As the time of action shows, the enemy's "punitive" operations in Yulangcun had started about 15 days earlier than his attack on Xiaowangqing. If at this time the guerrillas in other counties, who had not been engaged, had attacked the enemy's rear on the principle of mutual assistance, it would have been much easier for the guerrillas in Yulangcun to repel the enemy.

The circumstances in Yanji and Hunchun Counties were much the same.

What did this mean? It showed, though belatedly, that since the guerrilla zones were subject to enemy attack at different periods, all the guerrilla forces could have made their struggle easier by coordinating their actions through efficient cooperation, if only they had had a unified command and staff system for the guerrilla units in all guerrilla zones and counties.

However, in the circumstances of that time, when the guerrilla units were directed within the framework of each county and each district, such voluntary, active cooperation was impossible. The command system of the guerrilla army at the time of the enemy's winter "punitive" operations was therefore limited in its response to the demands of the situation. Until that time the guerrilla units were under the command of the military departments of the party committees at various levels. Since the battles in the early days of the guerrilla movement, when only one or two companies existed in each county, were fought on a small scale, this system of commanding the army on a district and county basis was not so bad.

However, as the ranks of the guerrilla army expanded and the enemy's "punitive" forces multiplied from hundreds to tens of thousands, it became impossible to choose to fight only small-scale battles. A battle is not always fought by the choice of one of the belligerent forces. When the enemy provoked us to battle by continuously reinforcing his forces, we could not but fight against him.

While the enemy was attacking us in large numbers by mobilizing this or that division, this or that brigade and this or that regiment from several directions, we were scattered in this valley or that one and we fought, without either combining our forces or helping our neighbors; should we be obliged to continue to fight in this way in the future, too? When attacking a large city or a town, we concentrated our forces by selecting men from each county; why should we fight defensive battles with a county or guerrilla zone as our unit of force? This was the idea that obsessed me before and after Operation Macun.

In a nutshell, the guerrilla movement required a new form of armed force corresponding to the content and scope of the movement. It was necessary for us to take radical measures to bring the armed units dispersed in the counties and districts under a single system. The quickest way of meeting this requirement was to merge the anti-Japanese people's guerrilla forces into a large revolutionary army.

A letter from the commander of the 4th company in Yaoyinggou also - seemed to suggest this. Circumstances prevented the commander from attending the summing-up meeting of Operation Macun, so he reviewed the work of his company in a letter and sent it to Macun. O Jin U the company commander's orderly, brought that letter to us. During the review of Operation Macun I gave deep thought to the matter of merging the anti-Japanese people's guerrilla forces. I discussed it with Ju Jin, Yang Song Ryong and others on several occasions.

Once I went to Yang Song Ryong's house and played the guitar there. I did not do it because I was merry or free from anxiety. Frankly speaking, I felt gloomy at that time. Though Operation Macun had ended in victory for us, the guerrilla zone was suffering heartbreaking anguish. Many people who had shared their life and fate with us had been killed. It was not easy to rebuild houses on the ruins and make a new life.

When I visited Yang Song Ryong to discuss military matters, he greeted me with a gloomy face. The battalion commander of yesterday was still furious with anger for he had been detained on a false charge of being a member of the "Minsaengdan." Thanks to our guarantee, he had not been given a prison term, but he had also not been reinstated in his former position. He was operating between Xiaowangqing and Luozigou to obtain food grain; after being bereaved of his wife and mother by the enemy's "mopping-up" operation, he had become a man of few words.

When I brought up the matter of organizing a large-scale revolutionary army, he immediately lit up and expressed exceptional enthusiasm. He said, "I think the point in question is just how to merge the units."

He said nothing about whether he agreed or disagreed with me, but he expressed his approval by bringing up the possible means and forms of merger for discussion. What worried him most was whether some people of a chauvinistic mentality, who were crazy about the anti-"Minsaengdan" struggle, would accept the idea.

It was no wonder that he should feel uneasy about it. This was the painful position the Korean communists found themselves in, and the special circumstances required that the difficulties be smoothed over prudently.

In those days "international lines," formulated on the basis of their own principles and according to their own yardsticks for assessing all the problems of the communist movement and the national liberation struggle, were imposed upon us as authoritative, while national traditions and aspirations were sharply attacked as a nationalist tendency, in the name of so-called class interest and international solidarity. In this situation, it was not easy for the Korean communists who were building up their revolution in a foreign country to put into practice a plan for establishing their own independent armed force.

Ju Jin also approved of the idea of merging and reorganizing the anti-Japanese people's guerrilla forces into a large revolutionary army. As soon as I broached this matter, Ju Jin, who was open-hearted and generous, gesticulated forcefully and said that we should merge our units and fight big battles. I was very much pleased by his words about "big battles." It was very pleasant to hear such words from Ju Jin, a gallant man whom the Korean people in Jiandao loved and valued as one of their own. He went on to say that when the Koreans organized an independent revolutionary army by merging their armed units, they would be accused "extending the revolution to Korea," but they should push ahead with this work as quickly as possible without paying any heed to such accusations.

Tong Chang-rong also supported our plan. He said: The AJPGA Organized in east Manchuria is an armed force formed on the initiative of the Korean communists and Koreans form the overwhelming majority of its ranks; though it was organized on the territory of China, it should ultimately develop into a Korean revolutionary armed force for carrying out the Korean revolution.

Tong Chang-rong's evaluation was very fair and progressive at a time when the very mention of the Korean revolution was stigmatized as EMlOnalism.

As he rightly pointed out, the Korean communists, such as Lee Hong Gwang and Lee Tong Gwang in south Manchuria and Ho Hyong Sik, Kim Chaek, Lee Hak Man and Choi Yong Kun in north Manchuria, to say nothing of those in east Manchuria, had played the roles of pioneers, advocates and leaders in the building up of armed force in the region of Manchuria, just as they had taken the lead in building up the party organizations there. And the overwhelming majority of the commanding officers and men of the armed force were Korean communists.

Tong Chang-rong advised me that, when forming an army, we should employ appropriate forms and means so as to support and supplement each other and consolidate our cooperation with the Chinese communists and that, by doing this, we would bring benefits both to Korea and China.

Pan, the inspector from the Comintern, gave full support to our idea, saying that it was a correct policy in keeping with the line of the Coin-intern.

Everyone capable of logical reasoning, from Yang Song Ryong, who led the Wangqing battalion with me, to Ju Jin, who later became the commander of the 1st Independent Division of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, Tong Chang-rong, from the east Manchuria ad hoc committee, and Pan, inspector of the Comintern, reached a full consensus on the policy of merging and reorganizing the anti-Japanese people's guerrilla forces into a large revolutionary army. And we were in general of the same opinion concerning the name and nature of the armed force which would be reorganized.

In March 1934, we formally proposed the policy of reorganizing the AJPGA into the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, in full accord with our objectives and the character of the political force which would struggle for them.

The names used by the AJPGA in some areas of east Manchuria in its early days - the Worker-Peasant Guerrilla Army - had placed extreme emphasis of its class character, and it did not conform with the character of our revolution, the primary task of which we had defined as national liberation and independence before social emancipation, nor did it conform with the character of the revolution in northeastern China directed by the Chinese communists.

As a preparation for reorganizing the anti-Japanese guerrilla forces into the people's revolutionary army, the Korean communists in east Manchuria, shoulder to shoulder with the Chinese communists, developed the guerrilla battalions in each county into regiments. In this way, all the guerrilla forces in Jiandao were regrouped into five regiments. In every regiment we set up a political department, whose mission it was to give party guidance to the army, a staff in charge of operations, reconnaissance and communications, and a supply department dealing with clothing, food and medicines.

The Wangqing regiment was the first to be reorganized and this was followed by others in east Manchuria. That was the first stage of reorganization. The objective we set at the second stage was to form divisions.

During the days of Operation Macun we had felt very keenly the need to form divisions. Offering resistance to a large armed force of 5,000 men with only two companies was a feat unprecedented in the history of war. As we broke through the difficulties created in the guerrilla Zone by harassing the enemy with a small unit behind his lines, I used to think how happy we would be if we had forces on the divisional level, if not on the corps level, and how high our spirits would be if we conducted activities with large units and fired thousands of guns as one force!

Since regiments had already been organized in each county and their ranks were expanding quickly, the next thing to do was to form divisions without delay. That was the most important task of the moment.

Our objective was to organize first two divisions and one independent regiment under the Korean People's Revolutionary Army and then build on this success more divisions in the future. With this objective in mind, we organized a division out of the regiments in Yanji and Helong, and another division made up mainly of regiments in Hunchun and Wangqing.

In the course of this reorganization, the party committee of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army was established as a new party guidance body. The party committee was entrusted with the onerous task of giving guidance to local party organizations as well as those in the army, because the local party organizations could not protect or maintain themselves if they were not supported by force of arms. In earlier times local party organizations had guided the party organizations in the army.

The work of reorganizing the AJPGA into the Korean People's Revolutionary Army was carried out in a very short space of time from March to May 1934.

When they heard about this, the people in the guerrilla zones vied with each other in helping the army and prepared grand celebrations in every zone. The women in Wangqing made congratulatory banners and sent them to us; the YCL organization there staged a congratulatory performance by the children's art troupe and organized an athletic meet. In Sandaowan guerrilla zone in Yanji, a mass meeting and a demonstration attended by more than 1,000 people were held and delegates from the enemy-controlled areas participated in those events. The people were even further convinced of the bright future of national liberation by the formation of the KPRA, and they firmly resolved to rise up as one body with the army in the anti-Japanese revolutionary war.

The reorganization of the AJPGA into the KPRA opened up a broad highway towards the development of large-force operations in a wider area. Had we not reorganized the AJPGA into the KPRA, or had we not created in good time the large units of regiments and divisions, we could not have lit the torch in Pochonbo, which illuminated the darkness of the motherland, nor won victory after victory in the battles fought in Fusong, Jiansanfeng, Hongtoushan, Limingshui, Taehongdan, Hongqihe and in other places in the homeland and in Manchuria, when we annihilated the enemy's crack troops. Nor could we have smashed the notorious siege imposed by the enemy upon the guerrilla zones after his "punitive" operations.

Through this reorganization we clearly demonstrated at home and abroad the will of the Korean nation to liberate their motherland by an armed resistance, no matter what the cost. If circumstances required, the KPRA operated in the name of the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army. We were of the opinion that the word "northeast" did not suggest the name of a country, but, to all intents and purposes, was suggestive of a region. That the KPRA operated in the name of the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army, not in the name of the Manchurian People's Revolutionary Army or the Chinese People's Revolutionary Army, was also compatible with the objectives of the Chinese comrades who were struggling against both Manchukuo and Japan. After all, the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army performed its mission as the KPRA and, at the same time, as a revolutionary armed force rendering support to the anti-Manchukuo, anti-Japanese cause of the Chinese communists.

The KPRA developed into the most powerful armed force in Jiandao, the eastern frontier region of Manchuria, and the region of the Korean peninsula centering on Mt. Paektu.

The principled stand and prudent political magnanimity the Korean communists had shown in the course of reorganizing the AJPGA into the KPRA contributed greatly in subsequent years to the development of the joint anti-Japanese struggle of the Korean and Chinese peoples, and particularly to the development of the armed struggle against the Japanese in northeast China. If we had insisted on an inflexible form and name corresponding only to the Korean revolution, in disregard of the prevailing subjective and objective situation of that time, the Korean communists would not have launched the anti-Japanese armed struggle in such an effective way, with the extensive support of the Chinese people.

When in later years we organized the Northeast Anti-Japanese Allied Army, we called it by this name when operating in the northeastern region of China as its character required and changed its name to the Korean People's Revolutionary Army in conformity with the specific situation when operating in areas inhabited mostly by Koreans or in the homeland, so that we lived and fought under the care and protection of the Korean and Chinese peoples everywhere we went.

Even from today's perspective, we consider it a matter of honor and pride that we placed greater emphasis on the essential content of the movement than on any of its formal aspects. Thanks to this principled view and magnanimous stance, we were always able to hold fast to the national character and independence of our struggle, while fulfilling our duty as internationalists and, for this reason, we enjoyed the respect and support of the Chinese comrades and the Communist International.

Publications of those days called the people's revolutionary army organized in Jiandao the Korean People's Revolutionary Army, not as the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army. The Dongfang Zazhi (Oriental Magazine?Tr.) published by the Shangwu (Commercial) Publishing House in Shanghai in 1935 wrote, in connection with the guerrilla struggle in northeastern China, that there was a 3,000-strong Korean People's Revolutionary Army in Jiandao, and this was faithfully reprinted in the Lives of the Anti-Japanese Martyrs in Northeast China, published by the National Salvation Publishing House in Paris, France.

It is therefore no wonder that the KPRA was called the 2nd Army Corps after the Northeast Anti-Japanese Allied Army was formed in the later years. The KPRA was, by its nature, an international body of the anti-Japanese allied front of the Korean and Chinese peoples, and the Koreans in the 2nd Army Corps supported the liberation struggle of the Chinese nation under the banner of internationalism, while carrying out their own task of struggling for the independence of Korea.

It was the Japanese imperialist forces of aggression which most feared the formation of the KPRA and its victories in battles in Jiandao, and clamored most loudly about the danger its existence would cause. In most cases they called our anti-Japanese armed force in east and south Manchuria "Kim Il Sung's army" instead of using its official name.

After the AJPGA had been reorganized into the KPRA, the Anti-Japanese Volunteers' Army in Jiandao, led by Kong Xian-yong, Chai Shi-rong, Shi Zhong-heng, Li San-xia and others, was united with the KPRA, which was renamed the 2nd Army Corps, in order to achieve success in the anti-Japanese joint struggle; this new formation was also called the "Northeast Korean-Chinese People's Revolutionary Army."

In the course of these events, a solid alliance of the anti-Japanese armed forces of Koreans and Chinese was virtually realized in east Manchuria in the first half of the 1930s.

In one of his articles, Zhou Bao-zhong wrote, "The 2nd Army Corps of the Anti-Japanese Allied Army was, at the same time, the 'Korean People's Revolutionary Army.... In the course of the anti-Japanese guerrilla war the Chinese and Korean peoples maintained ties sealed with blood for the sake of their common cause.'" Thus he recognized the entity of the KPRA and extolled the alliance of Korean and Chinese armed forces against the Japanese that existed in the course of the historical common struggle.

In this sense the Japanese called the guerrilla army organized in Manchuria, and in Jiandao in particular, the "pure Korean partisans."

According to the data uncovered by one of our comrades, V Rappoport, a famous expert on Chinese and Korean affairs in the Soviet Union, contributed an article under the title of "The Partisan Movement in the Northern Area of Korea" to the Soviet international political magazine The Pacific in 1937, in which he stated: "The partisan army in Korea has mostly been merged into a unified command, has its own center and calls itself the people's revolutionary army.... The expansion of the existing relationship and contact between the Korean and Manchurian partisan armies is setting the Japanese militarists atremble with great unease and, for this reason, Japan is paying serious attention to the border area of Korea."

The reorganization of the AJPGA into the KPRA did not mean a mere change of name or a technical restructuring. It meant a new stage of army-building, of improving the command system of the guerrilla army and strengthening its ranks both in quantity and quality by following up on its successes and drawing on its experiences after reviewing the path of militant advance traversed by the AJPGA. After reorganizing the AJPGA into the KPRA, we launched unceasing military actions to frustrate the enemy's siege.

The headquarters of the Kwangtung Army and the military authorities in Tokyo, who had suffered defeat in the winter "punitive" operations which they had flaunted as the final "mopping-up," made a great fuss over determining the cause of their failure and deciding who would be answerable for it; then in the spring of 1934, they re-examined their previous scorched-earth tactics and proposed a plan which they called a siege, an even more notorious, new plan for "clean-up." It was an atrocious operation intended to wipe out the guerrilla zones for good by combining military siege and attack, political suppression and economic blockade. We regarded this new invention of the Japanese as a replica of the blockade policy Chiang Kaisek had pursued when attacking the Soviet zones in China.

While Chiang Kaisek's blockade policy had been aimed at denying the communist army clothing and food "by producing a subhuman world filled with political terror and economic crisis," the Japanese siege was aimed at killing all the people and soldiers in the guerrilla zones by shooting and burning and imposing on them death from hunger and cold. To this end, they tried to separate the army and people by building concentration villages and to detect and eliminate all the forces of resistance through the introduction of such medieval collective security systems as the ten-household joint responsibility system and the five-household joint surveillance system.

The blockade policy and siege were similar to each other in their tactical aspects. Chiang Kaisek's tactics were to refrain from hasty pursuit or from deep penetration after encircling the enemy but to occupy a position and consolidate it slowly, studying the means of holding it, then proceed to an attack of another position. The tactics of "step-by-step occupation" invented by the Japanese can be compared with Chiang's tactics.

Commenting on this, our comrades said, "How wretched the Japanese are! They have to learn from Chiang Kaisek." This comment was more than just a joke. In his preparations for the siege from the spring of 1934, the enemy moved a greater number of crack troops of the Kwangtung Army and his occupation army in Korea to the areas around the guerrilla bases and reinforced them with puppet Manchukuo army troops.

To cope with a threatening situation in which the enemy was deploying his forces for the purpose of siege, we ensured that the KPRA forces forestalled his attempt by assaulting his military and political Strongholds one after another from behind in large-scale operations, while fighting in defense of the guerrilla zones and, at the same time, Expanding the guerrilla zones to more favorable areas. This enabled us to manage the difficult situation on the basis of our initiative, consolidate the victories won at the cost of our blood, and maintain the people's high revolutionary spirit.

The KPRA launched a spring offensive. We raided the areas in Wangqing where the enemy forces were concentrated and the constructing sites of the concentration villages at Xiaobaicaogou, Daduchuan, Shitouhezi and Zhuanjiaolou. Our comrades in Hunchun, Yanji and Helong also attacked the construction sites of the concentration villages, smashing the enemy's attempt to establish a siege in its very first stage.

In order to consolidate the success achieved by the spring offensive and, maintaining the initiative, turn the enemy's attempted siege into a fiasco, we immediately launched a summer offensive. The main purpose of this effort was to expand the guerrilla zones to the northwestern area of Antu County and northeastern area of Wangqing County. Defending a few fixed guerrilla zones while the enemy surrounded us would mean falling into the trap laid by the enemy and assisting his efforts.

The task of expanding the guerrilla zone to the northwestern area of Antu County was entrusted to the 1st Division and the Independent Regiment of the KPRA and the task of expanding it to the northeastern area of Wangqing County to the 2nd Division of the KPRA. While the area of guerrilla activity which connected Dadianzi and Fuerhe was the lifeline of Antu County, the area including Luozigou, Laomuzhuhe, Taipinggou and Sandaohezi was the lifeline of Hunchun and Wangqing Counties. Being adjacent to the Mudanling and Laoyeling Mountains, these areas were considered ideal for guerrilla activities, and had been developed by veteran soldiers such as Hong Bom Do, Choe Myong Rok, Lee Tong Hui and Hwang Pyong Gil since the days of the Independence Army movement.

We made a plan under which Ju Jin, commander of the 1st Division, and Yun Chang Bom, commander of the Independent Regiment, were to attack the Dadianzi-Fuerhe area first, so as to draw the enemy's attention, and then we were to advance in the direction of Luozigou. While the attention of the Japanese Kwangtung Army was focused on the area around Dadianzi, Antu County, as we had planned it should be, a part of the 4th and 5th Regiments of the 2nd Division of the KPRA and the Chinese nationalist army units advanced to Luozigou and occupied Sandaohezi and Sidahezi. In Sandaohezi a joint meeting of the KPRA soldiers and 1,500 officers and men of the Chinese units was held. The meeting was in the spirit of an ideological campaign for victory in the battle at Luozigou. Participating in the battle from the side of the Chinese nationalists were units led by Kong Xian-yong, Shi Zhong-heng, Chai Shi-rong and Li San-xia.

Luozigou was a strategic area for the enemy, for it connected Baicaogou in Wangqing County and the Dongning county town. Hundreds of puppet Manchukuo army soldiers led by Wen Chang-ren, a battalion commander, were stationed there. It had originally been a moderate-sized town of about 500 households, but it had rapidly developed into a military stronghold of the enemy after the September 18 incident, and had become an important base for the Jiandao task force since the spring of 1932. When the task force was withdrawn, the Japanese imperialists shipped a heavily reinforced battalion for use in their siege operation.

Occupying the Luozigou area by means of a preemptive attack was the fundamental link in the overall chain of our efforts to create the conditions for lifting a corner of the siege and expanding new guerrilla zones. At the house of old man Lee Thae Gyong in Sandaohezi we held a meeting with the leaders of the Chinese units to discuss the plan of operations.

Lee Thae Gyong was a man of high patriotic spirit who had served in both the Righteous Volunteers' Army and the Independence Army. Working with Choe Ja Ik, he had once been a general affairs director of the northern political and military administration. It was said that So Il had nominated him, a simple rank-and-file soldier, as director, because he had been charmed by Lee Thae Gyong's exceptional marksmanship and calligraphy. When So Il had preached the Taejong faith, worshipping Tan gun, the old man had become a faithful follower of the faith; when Kim Iwa Jin had insisted on the struggle against communism, the old man had supported him and received a revolver from him as a reward for his support. When Kim Jwa Jin had evacuated his forces to north Manchuria just before the large-scale Japanese "clean-up" in Jiandao, Lee Thae Gyong had followed his seniors as far as Mishan. But after Kim disappeared into the deep forest in Daomugou, Yanji County, he had come to Sidaohezi with his colleagues, buried his weapon, and taken up farming.

The impression of the old man that I can still recall is from when I unfolded a sketch map of the streets of Luozigou to explain the operational plan to the leaders of the Chinese units, and he put a stone on a corner of the map, the corner by the window of his house, lest the map should flap in the wind. The family of Lee called it a blessed stone. It was a peculiar stone, shaped as smooth as an egg. The old man said that when he was a director of the administration in Shiliping a friend of his had given that stone to him before he died, left a will saying he would be blessed if he kept it for a long time.

That stone is now kept in the Korean Revolution Museum. Before he died, the old man handed the stone over to his son to keep as a family treasure, saying that General Kim Il Sung had put it on his operational map and touched it and that he should keep it well. When a group of visitors to the old battlefields of the anti-Japanese armed struggle went to the northeastern region of China in 1959, his son handed the stone over to them. Though he said he disliked communism, the old man spared nothing to help us.

I met this old man for the first time in the summer of 1933 through the introduction of Choe Jong Hwa, the head of the Anti-Japanese Association in Luozigou. I had gone to Sandaohezi on horseback and was conducting political work among the people there. At that time I had organized an Anti-Japanese Association in Sandaohezi and accepted the old man, who was the elder of the village, as a member of the association. After joining the association he had educated the villagers well and all the villagers had done what he, the elder and the most influential man in the village, had told them to do.

It was more easy to transform a village on revolutionary lines if at least one or two members of the Righteous Volunteers' Army or the independence Army were living there. For the most part, former soldiers of the Independence Army who, like Lee Thae Gyong, had given up the tight halfway and buried their weapons, retained their patriotism. When they, the hardcore elements, went around one household after another, calling on people to help the revolutionary army soldiers who were suffering in the mountains, everybody responded positively. When the people were asked what they should do when the soldiers came to their village, they replied, "We should cook rice cakes," or "We should kill a calf." Some of the former Independence Army soldiers had betrayed their cause, but such people were few.

The vast majority of them led an honest life to their last moment. For this reason, I was careful not to neglect work with the influential veterans of the Independence Army wherever I went. Before anybody else I visited such Independence Army veterans as O Thae Hui in Shixian, Choe Ja Ik in Xidapo, Lee Chi Baek in macun, Kim Tong Sun in Dongricun and Lee Thae Gyong in Sandaohezi, greeting them and lying down, heads on wooden pillows, beside them to talk over current affairs.

After liberation some people gave the cold shoulder to the veterans of the Independence Army, alleging that their ideology was different from ours. In those days people with ideologies other than communism were rejected out of hand. At times, narrow-minded people in the area of personnel administration would give them a wide berth, and such rash responses acted like a wet blanket on the united front policy we had consistently adhered to. Whenever I encountered such people, I would say to them, "It is wicked to ostracize the Independence Army veterans on the grounds that they have different ideology. It is their limitation, but not grounds for guilt, that the soldiers of that army did not become communists. Are you trying to make communists of Chun Hyang and the young nobleman Ri9?

Even if we are in power, we communists must not fail to appreciate our patriotic seniors. The trend of thought differs from age to age; then why do you ostracize them, guard against them and avoid them? Are they guilty for fighting for Korea's independence at the risk of their lives when others were living with their families in warm houses, eating hot rice? I think that the veterans of the Righteous Volunteers' Army and the Independence Army who fought under arms are more laudable patriots than those who had led a comfortable life in their own houses while earning their own bread. You should realize that you will be forsaken by the people if you ostracize the Independence Army veterans.

On the basis of this view, we enrolled the sons and daughters of the martyrs of the Independence Army in the school for bereaved families of revolutionaries which was built at Mangyongdae. We appointed veterans of the Independence Army who actively supported our line of building a new Korea to official posts according to their abilities. Mr. Kang Un Gon, the first Chairman of the Central Committee of the Peasants Union of North Korea, and Mr. Lee Yong, the Minister of City Management of the first Cabinet of the DPRK, were veterans of the Independence Army.

While we were preparing for the battle after the meeting, our recon naissance party informed headquarters that the enemy had rushed out of the walled town in order to forestall our attack. We lured the enemy out to a point favorable to us and then destroyed his main force, and by pursuing the fleeing enemy we launched our attack on the walled town. Our combined forces had to fight a hard battle in the pouring rain.

The greatest obstacle in the battle at Luozigou was a fort on a west bill just as in the battle in the Dongning county town. The battle went on for three days because of the enemy's desperate resistance from the fort. As we were holding a meeting at the headquarters of the Chinese units on the third day, a mortar shell from the fort caused wounds, some of them serious, to some of the commanders of the Chinese units, including Zhou Bao-zhong. Zhou was participating in the battle as the chief of staff of Kong Xian-yong's unit. Dispirited by the wounds suffered by their commanders, some of the Chinese units began taking to flight in a disorderly manner, running directly away from Luozigou.

If this retreat were not checked, the battle would end in failure. The capture of the fort on the hill would be decisive to the outcome of the battle. Not only mortars but several heavy and light machineguns were mounted on the fort. Shots from this fort fatally wounded the company commander, Han Hung Gwon, in the abdomen, so that his intestines came gushing out, and JO Wal Nam was also put out of action. Han's wound was so appalling that he himself requested us to shoot him.

To the KPRA soldiers who were pinned down so that they could not approach the fort but only grind their teeth in vexation, I shouted, "Comrades, we must seize the fort at any cost. Let us fight for the revolution to the last drop of our blood!"

Then, mowing the enemy down with Mauser fire, I charged forward. The rain of machinegun bullets from the fort grazed my ears. A bullet pierced through my cap. But I dashed forward without pause for health. The men sprang to their feet and followed me. The fort which was boasted to be impregnable fell into our hands in 30 minutes and a red flag was hoisted on top of it.

The soldiers of the Chinese units who saw that flag turned round and launched an all-out charge in high spirits. The self-sacrificing spirit of the Chinese communists, including Zhou Bao-zhong, was highly influential in arousing them from apathy and frustration to charge. Though wounded heavily, Zhou blocked the soldiers' flight with open arms and shouted at them to look at the red flag flying on the fort on the west hill. The soldiers who saw him stopped their retreat and assaulted the enemy position, raising a loud battle cry.

The battle ended in victory for us.

Wen, the battalion commander of the puppet Manchukuo army, and the Japanese instructor, who were defending Luozigou, said in the last despairing message they sent to the commander of the Kwangtung Army that they had been surrounded and under attack by 2,000 troops of the combined forces of Kim Il Sung's army and other units for six days and five nights and that they were on the brink of being annihilated. They wailed, "Our ammunition has run out and our fate will be decided in a moment. But we are proud of having done our best for the sake of Japan and the building of Manchukuo. Mr. Commander, please understand this and forgive us."

Our victory at Luozigou and Dadianzi was the greatest of all the victories the KPRA won in the early days of the anti-Japanese war. The KPRA's attack on Luozigou dealt a heavy blow at the enemy in his attempt to besiege us and struck mortal terror into his heart. After this battle the enemy's large and small "punitive" forces deployed in the vicinity of the guerrilla bases were paralyzed with fear.

Indeed, the battle at Luozigou reduced the enemy's power in the northeastern region of the Wangqing guerrilla zone, creating a situation favorable for expanding the guerrilla zones and making a great contribution to the further consolidation of the allied front with the Chinese nationalist armed forces. After the battle we continued brisk political and military activities to thwart the enemy's attempts at siege. When the guerrilla zones were evacuated many of the revolutionary people in east Manchuria were able to settle down in the areas around Antu and Luozigou because we had turned this region into an invisible revolutionary base through intense military and political activities from the early days.

The KPRA sacrificed much blood during the summer offensive in 1934. The victory in the battle at Dadianzi was stained with the blood of Cha Ryong Dok, a popular commander of working class origin, who was one of the organizers of the Helong guerrilla unit and the political commissar of a regiment. He was the first political commissar to fall in action after the formation of the KPRA.

9.2. The Haves and the Have-nots

---

The guerrilla base was my home and secure nest, but I did not always stay there. An army which is cooped up behind a fence will invite tactical self-destruction. Consuming the people's provisions and gadding about the Xiaowangqing valley went against the grain. We were also disgusted by the doings of the Leftists and chauvinists who destroyed innocent people on their own side by labeling them as "Minsaengdan."

I used to go to fight behind the enemy lines in command of my unit whenever the situation permitted me to do so. After the semi-guerrilla zones were set up, I did this more frequently.

The people liked us to do this because they knew well that our actions behind the enemy lines would bring them rice and clothing. However the enemy might slander communism, the people did not believe him if we once stayed with them overnight. The personalities of the communists, expressed in their morality and manners had a stronger effect on the people than the enemy's propaganda.

Men who had had interesting experiences in the enemy-held area vied with one another to accompany me.

I used to take the 5th company with me. Taking too many men could mean problems with food and attract too much attention to our activity, so I kept my company between 50 and 60 men. When more men were needed, I used to call on the 1st company. As I frequently operated behind the enemy lines, Choe Chun Guk, who was in command of the 2nd company, and Jang Ryong San who was in command of the 3rd company, earned the burden of defending Wangqing. The 4th company defended Yaoyinggou.

The 5th company was the crack unit in Wangqing. If they were ordered to march with an interval of three steps between men, they did so; when ordered to suppress the sound of their breathing, they did so. We used to hit a moderate target and then withdraw five or a dozen miles like lightning, avoiding major commitment.

Our harassing operations behind the enemy lines prevented the enemy from committing all his forces to the attack on the guerrilla base.

Some officials in charge of Party propaganda work after liberation gave no publicity to the experience of the Korean communists in fighting behind the enemy lines during the war against the Japanese. Instead, they propagandized only the traditions and experience of a foreign country. The flunkys fever spread by these people developed to such an extreme that immediately after liberation our people were not even aware that there had been a heavy battle fought for the defense of Xiaowangqing during the anti-Japanese war, though they knew all about the battle of Stalingrad and tank battle at Kursk. At one time the Hero Lee Su Bok was called the "Korean Matrosov."

At the time of the Fatherland Liberation War our people believed that Matrosov of the Soviet Union was the first hero in the world ever to block an enemy pillbox with his own body. They were totally ignorant of the fact that Kim Jin, one of the anti-Japanese martyrs of their own country, had done this much earlier than Matrosov.

If we had educated people in our revolutionary traditions immediately after liberation, many of them would not have been killed during the temporary wartime retreat. They could have formed small units of five to six people or 15 to 20 people, each carrying an axe and one or two mal (a mal approximates to two pecks) of rice, and moving from mountain to mountain, firing several shots now and then and posting up leaflets; in this way they could have endured one month or two in mountains. But such education was not given in advance, so during the war we incurred losses that could have been avoided.

Most of my activity behind the enemy lines was conducted in the rural villages in the area on the Tuman River. In one year I traveled by rail in the area along the Tuman River and I could recognize the mountains and ravines across the river, which looked exactly the same as in the old days.

As the saying has it, the darkest place is under the candlestick - it was a good choice to operate under the very nose of the enemy. Our unit advanced to a mountain at the back of Tumen. We all operated in plain clothes there. We posted a sentry on the top of each of three hills, and carried on our operation without haste, reading and sleeping in the forest. The enemy had no idea there was a guerrilla unit operating under his very nose. In the summers of 1933 and 1934 we operated around Tumen and Liangshuiquanzi on the Tuman River.

While I was conducting mass political activities in the vicinity of Liangshuiquanzi following my return to Wangqing after the negotiations with Wu Yi-cheng, I had sent some of my men to the Tumen area and I myself had talked to the local inhabitants with a view to finding a suitable place for my headquarters. In general, they recommended three places, Mt. Songdong, Beigaoliling, and Caomaodingzi, as ideal; in fact, these places provided safety for the headquarters but were unsuitable for the purposes of our activity.

Something attracted me to the mountain at the back of Tumen. As I travelled to and from Onsong, I had thought it resembled Moran Hill in Pyongyang. I examined the place on the map and found it ideal for our purposes.

It had several ravines and dense forests, which made it an ideal place to spend the summer in improvised grass-thatched huts. Our organizations had been active in many places around this mountain since 1930, but there were still many villages where we had no organizations. Our intention was to turn these virgin villages into revolutionary ones.

I had intended to go to the mountain at the back of Tumen as soon as the Luozigou battle was over. But I had to put off my departure and stay at Xiaowangqing for a while, since I had to obtain food and clothing for a Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army unit. It was already the beginning of hot period but the men of the Qingshan unit were still wearing worn-out cotton-padded clothes and barely managing to survive on potatoes the size of sparrows' eggs. In consequence, the potato fields around the place where the troops were stationed had been all ravaged. The owners of the fields resented the Qingshan unit.

Relations between officers and men, who were ill-fed and ill-clothed, had naturally deteriorated, and the unit was turning into a gang of bandits. Some of them showed signs of wishing to surrender. The state of affairs in Kaoshan and Shi Zhong-heng's units was much the same. At that time Kaoshan unit had not yet been admitted to the KPRA.

We attacked Gayahe in cooperation with the Qingshan unit and divided the captured food and clothing among the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units and made another raid on the enemy in Diaomiaotai before we set off for the mountain behind Tumen. On my arrival at the mountain I found Han Hung Gwon, the company commander, had arrived before me. In the battle at Luozigou he had been wounded in the belly so heavily that his guts had fallen out of his abdomen, and he had been sent to guerrilla hospital. Now he had slipped away from hospital and had been secretly following our company.

The wound in his belly had almost healed up during the past month, but the marks of the suture were still reddish. Afraid that his scar might split again, I ordered him go back to the hospital. This giant of a man pleaded with a tear-stained face not to be sent back. So I instructed the acting company commander, Comrade Wang, to take good care of him even on the mountain, so that the wound would not be aggravated.

The original name of Tumen was Huimudong. It was a village where the Koreans had built huts and baked lime. The place was surrounded by limestone mountains.

The Japanese imperialists who occupied Manchuria after the September 18 incident extended the Jirin-Hoeryong railway from Chaoyangchuan to Huimudong and named the terminal Tumen. They built houses around the station, set up a branch office of the Japanese consulate, built a police station and a customs house and stationed a garrison there. Thus they had turned the quiet village which had existed on limestone into a crowded town of consumers constantly pestered by army and police. The new street was named Tumen and the old village at the foot of the mountain to the west retained the old Korean name of Huimudong. A railway was soon built across the border between Tumen and Namyang. From then on, Tumen was an eastern gate protecting the Japanese concession in Manchuria. On the opposite side of the river lay Namyang, an important town on the route connecting Korea and Manchuria.

In the latter half of the 1930s, Japanese intelligence services involved in preparing for aggression against the Soviet Union made their base in this town. As we have seen above, Tumen was a place of considerable military and political significance.

In many respects it was an advantage for us that Tumen became a base for our activity and an important point on the route to the semi-guerrilla zones in the homeland. We had formed an organization in Huimudong in the early days of our activity. This organization was under the influence of Oh Jung Song.

When I crossed the river to Onsong in September 1930 I was helped by the comrades from Huimudong and when I went to Jongsong in May the next year I also received assistance from them. It was with the help of this organization that Choe Kum Suk had obtained apples and pears to tempt my appetite when I was ill.

Tumen, a transit point which connected us with Onsong, could in effect be called a supply base for the guerrillas.

The objective of our operations on the mountain at the back of Tumen was to frustrate the enemy's scheme of "severing the people from the bandits." In those days the enemy called the revolutionary army "communist bandits." The Japanese imperialists made it their policy to isolate the revolutionary army from the people and strove frantically to achieve this. They devised various schemes, namely, an ideological conversion operation, the policy of concentration villages, the ten-household joint responsibility system, the five-household joint surveillance system, and surrender operations.

Under the tyrannical policy of "severing the people from the bandits" many of our organizations were destroyed and the people began to panic. Some people went so far as to sign surrender applications. This tendency was most glaringly evident in the southern part of Wangqing on the Tuman River.

We promulgated a slogan - Let us frustrate the enemy's isolation scheme by the unity of the people and the army! - and to implement it we set out to restore the organizations among the masses. We restored the organization in Nanyangcun where Oh Jung Hup was living, and we also formed new organizations with the Choes, based in Dalazi. After completing this work in the adjacent villages, we gradually moved towards Liangshuiquanzi, working among the masses, and infiltrating the lumberjacks and peasants. Once I led a small group to Xiongjidong, Mijiang, Hunchun County by way of Solgol, and re-established the organizations in Kyongwon (Saeppyol) and Hunyung across the Tuman River. As we did this, those people who had been distressed by the enemy's isolation scheme became active as their ties with the revolutionary army were strengthened.

During our operations from the mountain behind Tumen, I frequently visited the area of the six towns in the homeland in order to improve the guidance system of grassroots-level party organizations and other revolutionary organizations in various parts of the homeland and extend the work of building the party deep into Korea.

Since the formation of a party organization on Turu Hill in Onsong County in October 1930, a number of basic party organizations had also been created in the areas along the Tuman River through the efforts of hardcore members of the party leadership such as Oh Jung Hwa, Kim Il Hwan, Chae Su Hang, O Pin and the political workers, Lee Pong Su, An Kil, and Jang Kum Jin. Many basic party organizations had been set up in Hoeryong, Yonsa, Unggi (Sonbong), Musan, Kyongwon (Saeppyol), Rajin, Puryong, Sinam-dong in Chongjin and other places.

In August 1933, a training course on underground party work was given in Paksokgol, Kyongwon (Saeppyol) County. The two-day training course, which was conducted under a tree near a charcoal kiln in Paksokgol, was attended by political workers and those leaders of underground revolutionary organizations who had been working in the northern region and other parts of Korea. The lectures on the building of underground party organizations were given by me, on questions of YCL work by Jo Tong Uk, on women's work by Park Hyon Suk, and on Children's Corps work by Park Kil Song.

It was about this time that a meeting of representatives of party and other revolutionary organizations in the homeland was held under our guidance in Onsong. The meeting took place in Jinmyong School in Phungin Workers' District (the present name of the place), Onsong County in February 1934. The main topic of discussion was expanding party organizations into wider areas of the country, and establishing the system of guidance for party organizations. The meeting also decided to establish regional organs of guidance such as district party committee.

As a result of this decision the Onsong district party committee headed by Jon Jang Won was formed. The meeting was important because it marked a turning-point in expanding the work of party building in the homeland in the first half of the 1930s.

At that time Choson Ilbo (the Korea Daily) reported that "The party meeting held in Jinmyong School decided on a few radical slogans and circulated them in print." The report gave a brief impression of the meeting.

The operations on the mountain behind Tumen gave rise to many amusing anecdotes. I still remember one story about a stingy landowner who was made to pay dearly for his niggardliness. I do not remember the name of the village where the landowner lived, but it was certainly a Korean village.

One day I let the soldiers take a rest on the mountain at the back of Tumen and went down in plain clothes to the village where this landowner lived. At that time civilian wear was not a suit in the western style but Korean clothes. We always carried these clothes in our rucksack. Without wearing these clothes it was impossible to work in the enemy-controlled areas. Those who spoke fluent Japanese carried Japanese clothes.

That day I was accompanied by my orderly Lee Song Lim and two other men.

It was late afternoon, and we had a few hours till sunset. I wanted to sound out the feelings of the people in the village, which we had not visited yet. I was also feeling bored after living in the mountain for days at a time. I intended to ask for help and form an organization in the village if the villagers were well-disposed. There were no Japanese soldiers or policemen there.

We made for the largest, most imposing house with a tiled roof and I asked if the master was in. There was no answer and the door was locked from the inside in the middle of the day. We took the handle of the gate and rattled it. Only then did we hear someone coming out, dragging his shoes lazily. A middle-aged man opened the gate and cast a frowning glance at us. This was the landowner who would be taught a lesson.

"Sir, we are travelers. It's getting late and we're looking for lodgings. Will you be kind enough to let us stay overnight at your house?" I asked him politely.

The master spat abusive language at us, calling us crazy. He was unpleasant and ill-tempered.

"Why have you chosen to come to this house in the village? There is an inn a little over a mile from here. Do you think this is the village mill?" His manner of rolling his eyes and shouting abuse betrayed an ugly temper. Without any preliminaries he denounced us as crazy and treated us with contempt, as if we were beggars. I felt indignant. But I was tolerant and said politely once again, "Sir, I have pain in my legs and blisters on my feet. So I can walk no farther. Let us stay overnight here, please."

He yelled back at us, foaming with rage, "I say the inn is not far from here. Why do you cling to me like a leech? I haven't even met you bastards at a fair."

My orderly, standing behind me, begged for the man to have mercy on me. "Master, we have no money to pay for the inn. It is said that God blesses the kind-hearted. You could pretend that you are treating us to a feast, you may....

"Do you want me to give you money?" he cut the orderly off in mid-speech and spat, "What nonsense!" He shut the gate and disappeared inside.

This was the first time I received such treatment in ten years of revolutionary activity. There were many rich people in central Manchuria, where I had been engaged in underground activity. None of them was as cold-hearted as this landowner.

My orderly was quivering with rage. He had never imagined that his commander would be treated so badly by such a worthless country landowner. He suggested shooting the brute. He said he would at least like to fire a blank in his ear to scare him into fainting.

I, too, was on fire with rage. It is only natural that fellow countrymen should become more friendly when they meet in a foreign land. Even people whose lives set them against each other in their own land share a feeling of fellowship in a foreign land. This is the nature of human beings. The landowner who insulted us by calling crazy had not an iota of compassion.

Could human nature become spoilt in this way because the country had been ruined? There is a saying that misery loves company.

No nation is so compassionate as the Koreans. That is why we have the saying: an evil spirit cannot resist ritual prayers, a human being cannot resist compassion.

Koreans are especially hospitable to visitors, and this is a virtue. It is the kind-hearted custom of our people to accord cordial hospitality to their visitors. Although the head of our family was only a grave keeper, our family had always been kind to its visitors. If we had a visitor when our provisions had almost run out and we had to live on gruel, my mother used to add a bowl of water to the gruel pot so that the visitor might share the meal with us. In those cases, my mother and my aunt used to eat the thinnest portion of the gruel.

Even though the women of my family might skip one or two meals, they never complained about the family's poverty or misfortune. This was the true image of the Korean nation, which was engraved in my heart in my boyhood.

Since ancient times people in this country had been so hospitable that even a penniless man could have traveled throughout the country if he had chosen to. That is why foreigners who have been guests in an ordinary Korean home have spoken highly of our country as an eastern country of great courtesy.

Was it not Korean blood, then, running in the veins of that wicked landlord? How could he be so cold-hearted towards a fellow man?

He was immoral.

A nation whose power has decayed can be dispossessed of its country. A people without a country can be deprived even of their written and spoken languages and their surnames. But how can they discard their kind hearts? If all of the people were to become brutes like this landowner, the Korean people could never win back Korea.

It is fortunate, however, that only a tiny handful of Koreans were like the landlord. I was obliged to revise my views of the rich.

In the summer of 1933, a unit of the Chinese national salvation army stationed in Shiliping made a raid upon Shixian and, as one of the operations for collecting economic contributions, held a wife of a Chinese rich man for ransom. She had had her feet tightly bound to keep her feet from growing according to Chinese custom, and she had been detained for a few days in her simple underwear in Shiliping.

The unit sent a notice to her husband informing him that if a certain amount of money was brought before a certain date, his wife would be sent back home. The rich man, however, did not show up in Shiliping, saying that with that amount of money he could get married to a prettier woman. It was her own father, instead of her husband, who ransomed her. This showed what the ill-tempered rich people were like.

We went around the village again to find a lodging. We decided to ask for help at a thatched house instead of a tile-roofed house. We saw a thatched house not far from the landowner's house: the members of the household were having supper with the doors of the rooms wide open.

I spoke to the master of the house just as I had done to the landowner. "Good evening, we are travelers. It is late and we are seeking a lodging. Can we stay overnight at your house?"

He rose and looked out at us, resting his hand on the upright of the door. "Come in and sit down. Join us in this humble gruel. We apologize, but it is our only meal. Please, come in, though the room is not in good order."

"Don't mention it. We are in no position to complain."

He led us into the room. Even though the room was shabby, his words and deeds showed how kind-hearted he was.

The husband asked his wife if there was another bowl of gruel. She said yes. At this the thought came to me that people who live in poverty were quite different. The common people possess good hearts but the rich do not. Their sincere invitation to join them at supper moved both of us.

"What will you do if we eat your supper? All we need is a lodging." We declined the offer with thanks, thinking it too much to eat their supper.

The man chided me for my refusal.

"There's no such rule of etiquette in the world. Guests are supposed to accept their host's kindness. I'm afraid you are declining it because it is not very tasty. But this is all we can offer. Wife, bring a few more roots of leek and a plate of bean paste."

The mistress did as told by her husband.

We were moved almost to tears by the warmth of their hearts; they were treating us as if we were their own kinsfolk. I sat at the table but the thought of the comrades standing guard on the outskirts of the village prevented me from taking up my spoon.

"Thank you, master! I'll eat it later. Help yourself first. Our comrades are outside the village."

"How many of you are still to come?" He looked worried as he asked this. Naturally he was worried about more visitors coming, because there was only one extra bowl of gruel. "There are two more comrades and they have blisters on their feet, they cannot walk. Master, they say there is an inn around here, is it true?"

"Yes, certainly. It is about two miles away. How can they walk all that distance with blistered feet? You should stay here tonight and go there tomorrow morning, though you'll have to share gruel with us. Please bring the others here, too."

I asked him what sort of a man the landowner was.

He replied that, in a word, he was miserly and ill-tempered and added: "He has turned his back against the villagers but he is fairly friendly with policemen and officials. A few days ago, a young man who came from Korea to visit his relatives here, was arrested for no particular reason and tortured almost to death at the police station before being released and going back home. I suspect this was the landowner's work."

Meanwhile, it had become dark.

I ordered the orderly to send the men on guard duty to bring the men from the mountain, because we were going to stay the night in that village.

Some time later, the company commander, Han Hung Gwon, led the unit to the village. At the sight of 60 to 70 soldiers entering the village, the landowner realized something was happening and presented himself to our comrades, flattering them and saying, "How can I help you, sirs?" Then he fussed over the guerrillas and invited them to his house. How can a man live that way, spending his energy on double dealing?

Han Hung Gwon, not knowing his true motive, was very moved and said to me, "Comrade Commander, that landowner is kind-hearted, just like the landowner Jang in Xiaowangqing and the one in Tumen." The landowner Jang had given sincere assistance to the guerrillas, but had been banished from the guerrilla zone to Daduchuan by orders of the Soviet government. The Tumen landowner was a conscientious man who had responded to our request for cloth and cotton wool and other materials sufficient to make 500 uniforms for the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army, which was a difficult problem for us at the time. We made clothes with that materials for all the soldiers of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army in Xiaowangqing.

The Tumen landowner used to come to Shiliping to visit his relatives. Once our comrades somehow found out when he was coming and detained him in order to collect funds. When we returned from our operations behind the enemy lines, the comrades in the headquarters had released him, saying that the method was wrong. I sent for the landowner, who was fleeing from the guerrilla zone and frankly explained to him the situation with clothing for the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army and appealed to him for help. He promised to help us and went back home, and later he kept his word.

I briefed Han Hung Gwon on what had happened in the village.

"Comrade Han, don't be deceived by flattery. He is an ill-natured man who refuses to open his gate to a visitor."

When he heard this he gave a hollow laugh of blank dismay. Then, with his fist clenched in rage, he said:

"I see he is a wicked fellow. Such a man should not be forgiven. Let's try him and shoot him." I waved my hand to calm him down and stop him trembling with rage.

"No, don't do that. What is the use of executing a landowner? That will only upset the public pointlessly. It would be better to tell him not to lose his conscience as a Korean." "Then we must teach him a good lesson. That son of a bitch should not be allowed to get away with it."

"But you must not behave like bandits," I warned him lest he should go too far. When Han Hung Gwon came to his house, the shrewd landowner pressed himself close under his jaw and asked him who was the commander. His intention was to let the commander and a few other officers stay in his house, and do nothing for the other men, because they would have to be billeted on several villagers anyway. This cold-hearted man was quick in his calculations.

Han Hung Gwon introduced himself as the commander and suggested slyly.

"This household seems to be fairly well off. I think we can stay here for a month or two eating your rice. Even if we do, you will not run short of food, will you?"

"Well, I cannot guarantee two months, but I can afford to take care of you for a few days." The landowner's face turned pale for fear that the guerrillas might really stay in his house for two months.

With an air of indifference to the landlord's anxiety, Han Hung Gwon went on to say something that would really stun him.

"Master, how many pigs do you have in your house? Our men have not tasted meat for several months. I think you have a pile of a hundred sacks of rice in reserve, haven't you, though I am not sure about other houses?"

"Oh, my God, a hundred sacks you say? I've never had that much. Even though the other houses pretend to be poor and eat gruel, they all have enough rice."

"Whether the others have rice or not, you should treat us. You are rich, so you don't need to worry about it. If you have any conscience as a Korean, you must contribute your share to achieving the country's independence. You mean that we should eat the rice of the poor people who are short of food? How can the peasants farm if we eat up their seed grain?"

Intimidated by Han Hung Gwon, the landowner butchered pigs and offered the men rice. The men who had been billeted on peasants also ate rice brought from the landowner's. If he had treated us properly, he would have not suffered this misfortune.

After teaching him a good lesson, Han Hung Gwon returned to me, bringing a rush mat and a quilt from the landowner's to make up my bed. He was a man who enjoyed playing such jokes on people.

That night at the good-natured peasant's house we had rice which Han Hung Gwon brought from the landowner's.

"Will there not be trouble if we do this?" the peasant asked me apprehensively.

"Master, don't worry," I assured him, "there is nothing for you to worry about. You have only lent us your cooking pot. If the landowner finds fault with you later, tell him that you had nothing to do with what the guerrillas did."

"If you are guerrillas, I can set my mind at ease. It was foolish of me to recognize you as guerrillas."

The man and his wife had not known who we really were. Out of their simple kindness as Koreans they invited us to share whatever they were eating, whether it was gruel or bean paste. But the landowner was devoid of such courtesy. If a Japanese policeman had come to see him, however, he would have flattered him, offering him a cushioned seat.

This was how the rich differed from the poor. But not all the rich people were cold-hearted or totally lacking in love for their country. Chiang Wan-cheng, Chiang Wei-hua's father, was a wealthy landowner, but he was an ardent patriot of high reputation. I must also speak highly of the wealthy widow Paek because she was a renowned patriot who spared no money for the enlightenment and development of our nation. That is why she was later named Paek Son Haeng (virtuous deeds).

Most of the rich people, however, were miserly and cold-hearted, like the landowner we met.

There is some truth in the saying that charity comes from the granary, but it does not always apply. Was the peasant who treated us to barley gruel hospitable because he had a large stock of rice? In fact he had nothing but one sack of early-harvested barley in the corner of his room.

No matter how much money a man may have, he will be forsaken by the world if he has no compassion. Even though one lives in a hut, one can be morally rich, have many friendly neighbors and be held in high esteem by everyone, if one is kind to one's fellows. If a man's worth is judged by moral excellence, the landowner who turned us away must be called a miserably poor man not worthy of human respect.

In this case true virtue was found in a hut in which ordinary people lived, not in a grandiose house.

Lee Pong Su and his wife once contracted an eruptive typhus when they were working in Machang. At that time Lee Pong Su was the head of a hospital, and his wife An Sun Hwa was working in the hospital. She crawled out to bury their child, who had died of starvation, and covered the body with oak leaves.

Lee Pong Su had a feeling that soon he might also die just as his child had. He took off the new clothes which his comrades had brought him a few days before, folded them neatly, and set his last will and testament on them.

"These clothes have not been worn for long and I ask the comrade who finds this testament to wear them in my place."

This incident shows how superior the compassion of the revolutionaries was to that of the landowner.

Lee Pong Su miraculously survived and continued to work for the revolution, but his testament remained as proof of his humanity and still moves the people's hearts, an example of the noble and warm world of humanity which only communists can create.

When we returned to the guerrilla zone from the mountain behind Tumen, we gathered the soldiers together and told them about our experience in the village.

"Look! This is a clear example of people's class character. The poor peasant invited us to share his gruel, whereas the rich landowner drove us away from his gate, let alone inviting us to share his meal. He is a wicked man, isn't he? We must overthrow the exploitative society in order to do away with such wicked men."

The incident was good material for class education. This story about the rich landowner and the poor peasant became a common topic of conversation in the villages on the Tuman River. People who were told the story condemned the landowner as a wicked man and praised the peasant as a kind-hearted man. When our plain clothes squads approached the Vicinity of a village, the young people from the village came out to them and informed them which households were rich and which families had cattle belonging to the "People's Association."

In those days the cattle of the "People's Association" were raised in rural villages. After Japan occupied Manchuria, the "People's Association," a reactionary organization, had distributed its cattle among peasants to be raised. The animals were raised by peasants but did not belong to them; when they were fully grown, they had to be returned to the association. It was a mechanism for exploiting the peasants' labor. These animals had seals on their horns.

When they said that certain families had these oxen, the young people of the village meant that the guerrillas could slaughter them for meat without damaging the people's interests. The guerrillas picked out these oxen and butchered them. The Japanese became frantic at this, saying that the villagers were all bad people: How could the communist army know which houses had been raising the cattle of the "People's Association"? The people of the village must have informed them.

The peasants would answer them, "How could we know? We know nothing about it. They have a list. We could do nothing to stop them, they picked them out from the list."

Long experience had bred in my bones the feeling that the richer people were, the more cold-hearted they were, the more devoid of virtue. Wealth which is opposed to goodness and morality itself is not a source of virtue but a trap which swallows and destroys virtue. The landowner in the village on the Tuman River hurt me deeply. Because of him, my impression of the village was not good.

The incident hardened my resolve, when the country became independent, to wipe out the old society of immorality and corruption, in which the landowners and capitalists lorded it over others, and to build a beautiful and sound society where all the people would live in harmony like one family, with no gulf between the poor and the rich.

We are striving to make all our working people rich, not to have rich people who live in luxury, growing fat on others' sweat and blood, but materially and morally rich people who are honest, industrious, and create social wealth by their own labor. We cannot tolerate a capitalist society in which money is all-powerful. When an era in which everyone enjoys equitable material and moral wealth is ushered in, humanity will be free from all social evils for ever.

9.3. Crossing the Laoyeling Mountains

---

We returned to the guerrilla base when our activities in the enemy-controlled area were over, but we had to leave Wangqing with the knapsacks still on our backs. Zhou Bao-zhong in north Manchuria sent a messenger to us, requesting our assistance.

I took his request very seriously. He was a Chinese friend and comrade-in-arms who had fought for the common cause in close liaison with me since we had worked together on the anti-Japanese soldiers' committee. The Luozigou battle had deepened my friendship with Zhou. He was ten years older than I. I regarded it as a noble internationalist duty to meet his request and made hasty preparation for an expedition to north Manchuria.

One day in late October 1934, when snow was falling in large flakes, the 170-strong expeditionary force of three companies selected from the soldiers in Wangqing, Hunchun and Yanji, left Duitoulazi and set out to cross the Laoyeling Mountains.

Nature is a mysterious force. Mountain ranges bound countries, and divide provinces and counties. Sometimes a mountainous barrier marks off differences in the levels of development of politics, economy and culture.

Laoyeling is a steep mountain range that demarcates east Manchuria from the north and south of Manchuria, north Jiandao from east Jiandao, and east Jiandao from west Jiandao. The features of the terrain on its northern and southern slopes present a sharp contrast. The southern side is a series of steep hills, whereas the northern side is a boundless expanse of vast plains such as can only be found in the Honam area, the southwest of Korea. Most of the people living in east Manchuria south of Laoyeling were from North Hamgyong Province, whereas many of those living north of Laoyeling were from North and South Kyongsang Provinces.

From the point of view of the level of ideological consciousness, the people in north Manchuria rather lagged behind those in east Manchuria. Consequently, the revolutionary enthusiasm of the people was also not as high as it was in east Manchuria. One day Zhou Bao-zhong confessed that the work of enlightening the north Manchurian people politically was more difficult than that of awakening the east Manchurian people. This was a serious problem faced by the north Manchurian communists in their activities. If we lightened their burden even a little, it would be conducive to the harmonious development of the revolution in northeast China.

We had planned large-scale operations in the south and north of Manchuria, as well as in east Manchuria and the homeland. Giving our best efforts to cooperation with neighboring units was the policy which we had maintained from the very start of our struggle. This was why we considered a meeting with Lee Hong Gwang and Lee Tong Gwang to be one of the main objectives of our march into south Manchuria and strove hard to achieve it. Helping north Manchuria also meant helping Kim Chaek, Choi Yong Kun, Ho

Hyong Sik, Lee Hak Man, Lee Kye Dong and other Korean communists who were waging a guerrilla struggle in this area.

The expeditionary force seethed with excitement from the very start. The prospect of a new place always arouses a rainbow-colored fancies. What is more, the men were mostly aged 18 to 20, and therefore most curious and eager for adventure. As I led the unit, I felt the same pride and joy as they did.

But from the moment the expeditionary force left Duitoulazi, I was haunted by an uneasy feeling, which seemed to hobble my steps. The farther away from the guerrilla zone we went, the more uneasy I became.

I was on my way to north Manchuria, when the guerrilla bases in east Manchuria were not yet completely free from enemy encirclement. The long-term special peace-maintenance scheme was a massive programme of "punitive" operations which the Japanese imperialists had worked out in order to encircle and overcome us by means of a protract-ed war, after they had suffered defeat by the summer offensive of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army. The main point of this programme was to divide the year and a half from September 1934 to March 1936 into three periods and launch their offensives in places where the public peace was comparatively secure, and continue until they could crush the last stronghold of the people's revolutionary army. Their scheme of encroaching siege by means of expanding their occupied area step by step over a long period of time could effectively strangle and suffocate the revolution.

Of course, our expedition to north Manchuria would make a great breach in the Japanese army's scheme for the siege.

An equally serious danger threatening the guerrilla zones was the ultra-Leftist anti-"Minsaengdan" struggle which was under way throughout Jiandao. In complete contradiction of the original goal set by the east Manchurian party committee, this struggle was exploited to meet the ulterior purpose of certain ambitious elements, position seekers, chauvinists and factionalist flunkies in the leadership. Their maneuvers were disintegrating the revolutionary ranks from within and threatened the very existence of the guerrilla bases.

The merciless iron club of a purge campaign punished faithful and true revolutionaries and patriotic masses en masse every day, without discriminating friend from foe. The majority of soldiers and civilians in the guerrilla bases were suspected of involvement in the "Minsaengdan" case.

Worse still, the spearhead of the anti-"Minsaengdan" struggle was directed against Koreans, particularly against cadres and core elements who were working in important positions in the party, the army and mass organizations. The gun barrel of the purge was always aimed at the leading officials, fighters and most active workers whom the masses had trusted and followed. For example, Lee Yong Guk, the secretary of the Wangqing county party committee, was executed on a charge of being a "Minsaengdan" member. Commander of the Wangqing battalion Yang Song Ryong, who was imprisoned and accused of being a "Minsaengdan" member, and only released when I stood surety for him, was still under surveillance.

In this way, ambitious men and schemers in Jiandao used the excuse of a purge campaign to plot against true revolutionaries. Kim Myong Gyun, the head of the military department of the county party committee, and Lee Ung Gol, the secretary of the first district party committee, who were to be executed, on charges of being "Minsaengdan" members, escaped from the guerrilla zone.

When late October came, heavy snow fell and a strong wind blew in Manchuria. From olden times the people in the north had called this wind the Siberia wind.

On the day we left Duitoulazi, too, piercingly cold wind raged as if to check our march over Laoyeling. The Laoyeling Mountains looked like an arrow fixed to a bow. The name of the mountain range can be translated as old man mountain range, and it indicated a mountain range that was very high and steep. We spent all day scaling it. Lee Song Lim complained frequently about the steepness of the mountain.

As we were crossing the mountains Ko Pobae encouraged our comrades greatly by displaying his talent. I have already mentioned briefly that when Tong Chang-rong was in Longjing prison, Ko picked a pocket in order to get himself arrested by the police, and took a chance on meeting Tong in prison to inform him of our opinion. He was extraordinarily quick with his hands, so that he could, for instance, quite easily "steal" all the money in a big market. He could have lived in luxury simply by exploiting his skill, becoming richer than a millionaire, if he had set his mind to it.

It was a mysterious yet truly laudable act for such a man to come into the mountain and plunge into the crucible of the revolution.

However, skill with his hands was only one of his talents. His most wonderful achievements were his vocal dexterity and comedy. Placing his hands on his lips, he could produce all kinds of sound and he could twitch his face and set his eyes and lips askew. When he played such farcical tricks, even Wang De-tai, the 2nd Army Corps commander, who was very blunt and unsociable, would burst into roars of laughter with his mouth gaping open. When he jumped about on one leg, with the other folded up, nobody could help laughing.

When he strolled about markets and streets with a sack on his back, singing a beggar's tune, he looked like the most stupid of men, so he was easily able to deceive the enemy. He frequently employed this dexterity and the art of disguise when he went to towns and villages to sound out the enemy. For this activity he was known by the nickname Pobae (a treasure), apparently because he was as valuable as a treasure. Few of his comrades-in-arms called him by his real name. Even I called him by his nickname. His real name was not even widely known. Some people said he was born in North Hamgyong Province and others said he came from South Hamgyong Province or Kangwon Province. Ko Pobae himself did not know where he came from.

When asked where he was born he would reply that he was born in village of Korea. He did not know his native land because he had come to Manchuria when he was a baby and his parents died early. He was equal to any task because he had known bitter toil since his childhood. He could do the work of a blacksmith, a builder or a barber, if necessary.

For some time Ko Pobae acted as a messenger between the north and east of Manchuria. He did not talk carelessly about what he did and where. When his comrades asked him "What are you doing nowadays. Comrade Pobae? Are you a guerrilla?" he said yes. When they asked him "Are you an inspector?" he also said yes. He always answered such questions with such a queer smile that his comrades could not tell whether he was joking or being serious. This was Ko's peculiar way of keeping his duties secret.

Just as Ko Pobae followed and respected me unconditionally, so I trusted and loved him absolutely. When we were scaling Laoyeling, two Japanese biplanes came flying low over the peak and then returned. Apparently the "punitive" troops who had been chasing us had informed their headquarters of the whereabouts of our expeditionary force.

On that day unusually heavy snow fell from morning to evening. All the mountain ridges and valleys north of Laoyeling were covered with such deep snow that we could not distinguish one valley from another. To make matters worse, a strong wind blew up in the afternoon, so that even Ko Pobae, who knew the terrain as well as the front yard of his own house, was quite at a loss as to which way to go, to say nothing of others who were strangers to north Manchuria. We lost our way at a point 20 miles from Badaohezi and halted our march. In the mercilessly pouring snow and severe cold my men's eyes were fixed on my face. Ko Pobae, who had been so cheerful stood before me with stooped shoulders, as if he had committed a crime.

"Every year some travelers lose their way and die, buried in snow-drifts on this mountain pass. Last year, seven or eight soldiers of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army died on this strange mountain. Perhaps we should turn back to a village and spend one night there until the snowstorm dies down, before resuming our march."

He suggested this timidly, looking in irritation at the northern valleys of Laoyeling, covered with white snow.

I did not accept his suggestion, because retreat in such a case would have been utterly destructive.

"No, we cannot do that. You have nothing to be afraid of in a place where you have worn out many shoes. This is Laoyeling, not Haerbaling or Mudanling, so we have no other choice but to find our way here. All we have to do is to go straight towards the north, using my compass. You have nothing to fear. Brace up. Our comrades in north Manchuria are waiting for us."

My words heartened Ko Pobae. He forced his way through the snow at the head of the column, making the sound of a motor engine with his mouth. At the sound of the engine all the men in the expeditionary force burst into laughter that reverberated across Laoyeling.

We marched until the next day and found a small Chinese village. Hardly had we entered this village, when the "punitive" troops of the Japanese army which had been billeted on a neighboring village attacked us by surprise. So we fought our first battle in north Manchuria.

The "punitive" troops of the Japanese army or the puppet Manchukuo army in north Manchuria had never fought a battle with the people's revolutionary army. Their opponents were only such rabble as local bandits or mountain rebels who would tremble and turn tail at the sight of the Japanese army.

The Japanese "punitive" troops, who had been accustomed to destroying their foes by simple pursuit, attacked us that day in conceit, taking us for local bandits or mountain rebels. We quickly occupied a hill and returned fire, dispatching a platoon to attack the enemy from behind. The enemy was struck hard, and quite at a loss what to do. In this battle the enemy suffered heavy casualties.

The news of this battle was spread far across north Manchuria by the enemy. They created a great commotion, saying that laogaoli units had come from east Manchuria. "They are brilliant fighters. Who on earth commands the unit? It may be Kim Il Sung's unit which attacked the Dongning county town." From that time on the newspapers reported on our unit. In those days the enemy called our guerrilla army "communist bandits" or the communist party, or ambiguously, the anti-Manchukuo army.

The expeditionary force won the battle, but all the villagers had taken refuge, so we found ourselves left totally without support, with no way at all of obtaining food. If we were to stay in the village until we found Zhou Bao-zhong, we had to know the enemy's movements.

But we had neither an intelligence network of our own nor any acquaintances. In such a situation it was impossible for us to take the next step. Even Ko Pobae had no knowledge of the whereabouts of the Ningnan guerrilla army. We left the village and spent one night in an unknown valley. The next day Ko Pobae and O Tae Song went scouting and found Zhou Bao-zhong's camp. In that mountain camp I met Zhou, who was under medical care, with 20 to 30 men under his command. A wound he had received from a mortar shell in the Luozigou battle had festered badly and had not healed even though months had passed.

Zhou walked out, supporting himself on a stick, and assisted by his men. He came quite a distance from the hut to meet us.

"As you see, I am still in bad condition," he said, smiling sadly, raising his stick, and then squeezed my hand tightly. "I am very happy to meet you again like this. I hope you will give me a lot of help."

His greetings were short, but his voice and look showed how much he expected from me.

My reunion with Zhou was an event which symbolized a new chapter in the history of the anti-Japanese armed struggle. This meeting marked the start of the full-scale joint struggle of the Korean People's Revolutionary Army and the guerrilla units led by Chinese communists.

Just as we attached great importance to our cooperation with the armed forces led by the Chinese communists, so the Chinese communists in Manchuria were making every effort to implement joint operations with the armed forces led by Korean communists. When various Anti-Japanese Volunteers' Army units such as the anti-Japanese nationalist army, the national salvation army units, the Red Spear Society and the Broad Sword Society were formed in many places of Manchuria in opposition to hang Kaisek's policy of non-resistance after the September 18 incident, and they challenged the Japanese aggressors, both the Korean and Chinese communists attached great importance to a united front with them and made great efforts to bring it about. There is no need to repeat here the great success we had achieved through tireless efforts.

After 1934 the activity of the Anti-Japanese Volunteers' Army gradually declined. When the Japanese had stepped up their offensive, many commanders of the Anti-Japanese Volunteers' Army had left for China proper, taking their units, and others had surrendered or had become bandits. Some of the nationalists like Shi Zhong-heng had converted to communism. The enemy called such units of the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army "political bandits."

In this situation the anti-Japanese armed struggle in Manchuria developed through the building-up of an army with a well-organized administration, through an alliance between the Anti-Japanese People's Guerrilla Army led by Korean communists and various anti-Japanese nationalist army units under the influence of the Chinese communists.

Zhou said that the organization of the Ningnan anti-Japanese guerrilla army had not gone smoothly, and explained in detail. The backbone of the Ningnan guerrilla army consisted of the 20 anti-Japanese soldiers who had followed him when he left Luozigou.

When the eastern area bureau of Jilin Province was dissolved and the Suining central county party committee was organized, Zhou had taken charge of its military department and started raising an army, with his 20 men as its backbone. The ranks had soon increased to 50 men when a unit of Korean guerrillas joined his unit. After many negotiations his unit had merged with Ping Nan-yang's unit, which had its home base in the Erdaohezi area.

Zhou Bao-zhong had recommended Ping as the commander of the merged unit and he had taken charge of military affairs.

Ping's real name was Li Jing-pu. He was called Ping Nan-yang for a profound reason. Ping Nan-yang meant "pacifying the south." In those days the Japanese aggressors were concentrated in the area south of Ningnan County. Li Jing-pu intended to fight a decisive battle with the Japanese aggressors entrenched in this area. Thus his unit was named the Ping Nan-yang unit and its commander Li Jing-pu was called Ping Nan-yang.

As this anecdote shows, he was both courageous and patriotic. But strong in his anti-Japanese sentiment and courageous as he was, he suffered difficulties because of his undisciplined men. This also bothered Zhou who, as the leader of the unit, held the real power over it.

When he met me, Zhou requested me to work with Ping Nan-yang in his stead.

"Ping Nan-yang is full of heroic aspirations, but he has a friendly feeling towards you Commander Kim because he was saved by a Korean communist."

I said that, grateful as I was to him for his confidence, I felt my shoulders burdened with a heavy responsibility. Zhou said with a smile, "I believe only in your extraordinary influence, which persuaded Commander Yu and Commander Wu."

He was also worried about relations with the Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units. In Ningan County and its vicinity there were numerous small and large AJNA units, many of which were hostile to the communists. This was a great obstacle which the Ningan anti-Japanese guerrilla army had to remove immediately if its operations were to be successful. Daping, Sijihao, Zhanzhonghua and Renyixia units, which made frequent appearances around the center of Beihutou west of Dongjingcheng, were AJNA units which had once joined with Ping and later broken with him. These units were hostile to the communists and, worse still, the Jingan army urged them to surrender, driving an even greater wedge between these units and the communists.

It was difficult to predict what they might become in the future. Shuangshan and Zhongyang AJNA units, which were engaged only in banditry in the northwest of Tongjingcheng, were under threat from the Jingan army. Chiang Ai-min's unit, the strongest of all the AJNA units, small and large, in the Dangdaogou area, east of Ningan, was vacillating following bitter experiences during a "punitive" operation by the 13th brigade of the Japanese army.

The units under Chiang Ai-min's command had once escaped to east Manchuria, pursued by the 13th brigade. These units had been plundering food and had eventually applied for surrender. Our comrades had managed to dissuade them from surrendering. Zhou Bao-zhong said that Chai Shi-rong's unit in Machang had become less active than before.

He complained of the results of the Zhanzhonghua incident in Ningan, which was similar to the Guan's unit incident<sup>14</sup> in Wangqing, saying that this mishap had prevented his unit from working overtly. The Zhanzhonghua incident was a deplorable event which had taken place before Zhou joined with Ping. When Ping's unit was suffering internal discord, the rebels offered wine to Ping and his followers, then disarmed them and fled. Ping had not even a Mauser. In an effort to re-equip the unit which now had practically nothing. Ping, together with his faithful subordinates, disarmed Zhanzhonghua unit in the Nanhutou area, which had been seeking a way to surrender. After this incident the AJNA units in north Manchuria branded the Ningan guerrilla army which was associated with the name of Ping Nan-yang as an enemy.

In the final analysis, Zhou's request was that I should play the role of an arbitrator in improving his relations with the AJNA units so that his unit would be able to operate overtly.

Zhou was most seriously worried about the state of the revolutionary movement in the Ningan area. He was exasperated by the failure to develop the revolution in this area, as if his own inability and negligence were responsible for it.

"From the point of view of the east Manchurian people, Ningan is a place where no revolutionary wind is blowing. I don't understand why the masses are in such low spirits. No matter how earnestly we appeal to the people to rise up for the revolution, they remain aloof from us. Do you know the attitude of the peasants here? They say they can make a living even though the landlords bleed them white. They say, if they go into the mountain they can obtain a lot of land, and why should they shed blood for the revolution when they can till the land and earn a living? From the point of view of the common people, the vast areas of land may make them happy, but at the moment it dulls their class consciousness. I don't know whether we should be proud of the vast lands of north Manchuria or regret that they exist."

Listening to him I burst out laughing.

"Ha, ha, it is fortunate for the 400 million Chinese people that the vast land exists." Zhou Bao-zhong, too, laughed merrily, which smoothed the wrinkles from his face.

"Yes, it is. The vast territory and fertile land are a source of well-being for the whole nation. I was pointlessly worried. Comrade Kim, I have told you about my problem. Help me, please. I can only sleep at peace, if I can find a way to develop the revolution in Ningan, but I don't know how to do it."

I could fully sympathize with his problem. He was an able and well-informed man, but his health was too bad for the arduous north Manchurian revolution. His festering wound prevented him from displaying his ability fully. What is worse, he had few hardcore elements at his disposal.

In the hut in Badaohezi we spent a few days discussing ways of developing the revolution in north Manchuria. We concluded that going among the people was the solution to many difficult problems arising in the north Manchurian revolution. Awakening the people and mobilizing them was the only way to save the north Manchurian revolution from stagnation.

To this end, we had to conduct political work among the people and step up the military operations of the guerrilla army. The armed ranks would be expanded in the course of fighting, and the revolution would develop through struggle. If we remained idle and did not fight, we could do nothing.

Without intensifying our military operations it would be impossible to improve our relations with the AJNA units and win them over as allies or to restore Ping Nan-yang's image, which had been disgraced by the Zhanzhonghua incident.

We confirmed that we shared the same opinions on such matters.

When we met with Zhou in his hut, Wu Ping, the Comintern special representative to Manchuria, was also there, and he showed us the six-point anti-Japanese national salvation programme which he had brought from Shanghai. The original name of this document was the "Basic Programme of the Chinese People on Anti-Japanese Operations."

This document was published in the name of the National Armed Self-defense Preparatory Committee of China. It was signed by the renowned figures Song Qing-ling, Zhang Nai-qi, He Xiang-ning and Ma Xiangbai. Wu Ping said that the signatories to the document had automatically become members of this committee and that thousands of people had already signed it.

The six-point programme of national salvation reflected the policy of the anti-imperialist united front which the Chinese Communist Party proposed when the Japanese imperialists were trying to occupy the north of China proper by posing as the protector of China, and Chiang Kaisek was starting the fifth "punitive" operation against the communist army. In the Chinese revolution, too, the communists did their best to unite and mobilize all the national forces. I therefore considered the six-point programme as a document in season.

For 10 days we discussed these matters comprehensively with Wu Ping. As I spoke with him I learned that the Chinese communists had broken the siege of Chiang Kaisek and started the long march of 25 thousand ri under the banner of the northward advance against Japan, in accordance with the strategy of Mao Ze-dong. We were encouraged greatly by the fact that the Chinese revolution had gone over from retreat, following the failure of the first civil war, to a partial offensive, consolidating on its success.

The anti-Japanese national salvation movement launched in China proper, as well as the powerful thrust of the northward advance against Japan started by the Chinese communists, would create favorable conditions for the revolutionary struggle of the Korean and Chinese communists in the east and in other parts of Manchuria.

Zhou Bao-zhong attached one of his platoons to our unit for joint operations. The expeditionary force left the camp at Badaohezi together with this platoon. A few days later the first shot demonstrating the fraternal friendship and the proletarian internationalism of the Korean and Chinese communists rang out in Shitouhe near Lake Jingbo. The 200-strong Japanese "punitive" force which had left Beihutou after hearing about the appearance of our revolutionary army, became the target of our machineguns and was mowed down in the middle of Lake Jingbo.

Following this battle we struck a heavy blow against a Japanese army unit in the Fangshengou area. The myth of the "invincible imperial army" which had boasted of winning battle after battle in the vast area of north Manchuria began to disintegrate. This also constituted a breakthrough in the Japanese imperialists' plan for the siege of the guerrilla zones in east Manchuria.

The Ningan people rejoiced over our victory, and spread the news of the laogaoli army.

Ping Nan-yang, the commander of the Ningan anti-Japanese guerrilla army, was the first to visit us when he heard the news. As we were marching toward Xiqinggouzi after a meeting with the hardcore party members of a district party organization in Nanhutou, who later helped the Wangqing guerrilla army both materially and morally, Ping appeared suddenly before me together with one of Zhou's orderlies and repeated excitedly, "Congratulations!" without even introducing himself.

I ordered the marching column to halt and spoke with him informally.

"Commander Kim Il Sung, the whole of north Manchuria is buzzing with the news of your victory. My men are delighted at the news. Let me hold the hand which makes the Japanese tremble."

Holding my hand in both of his, he looked me full in the face with an expression of friendship.

"I have received a report that some of my men in the north of Dongjingcheng have been attacked by the Jingan army. Whenever we meet the Japanese or the Jingan army we have a hard time of it. The thought of it makes my blood boil."

"Then, shall we try taking a turn with the Jingan army?"

"Commander Kim, if we fight together with you, we will become bolder and learn from you. As Ping requested, I accepted his 40 men into our expeditionary force and sent Zhou's platoon back to his camp in Badaohezi, together with the orderly who had guided Ping to me. At the same time, I sent the soldiers of the Yanji company back to Jiandao, in view of the tense situation in east Manchuria resulting from the enemy's "punitive" operation.

When Ping came to me Zhou sent with him a messenger who had come from east Manchuria. This messenger told us about the situation in Jiandao.

As we were marching through Beihutou, I ordered the unit to leave only one set of footprints in the snow. Because we had to pass close by one of the enemy's assembly points, we had to conceal our tracks. Leaving one set of footprints meant that everyone in a rank of ten or a hundred men walked by stepping in the footprints of the man at the head of the column, so that it looked as if only one man had passed.

As he watched our companies teaching his soldiers how I had instructed them to march like a single man, to wipe away their trace, to disperse the unit during the march and to billet soldiers on a village, Ping commented that the Korean People's Revolutionary Army was well-versed in guerrilla warfare.

Together with Ping's unit we destroyed two battalions of the Jingan army led by Lieutenant Colonel Takeutsi in the Xinanzhen area, wiped out another Jingan army unit in a joint operation with an AJNA unit under the command of Zhongyang on the River Dahailanghe, and attacked a cavalry company and the 6th infantry company of the Jiangan army in Laozhuanjia, Badaohezi.

As a result of these victorious battles, Chinese anti-Japanese nationalist army units which had been in difficult circumstances came one after another to join our expeditionary force. After meeting briefly again with Zhou in his camp at Badaohezi, we crossed the River Mudan in late December, defeated a Jingan army unit and raided a puppet Manchukuo police station in Xinanzhen at the request of Daping, Sijihao, Zhanzhonghua, and Renyixia units of the AJNA. We launched these battles in order once again to enlist in the Ningnan guerrilla army those AJNA units which had left Ping Nan-yang. While engaging in active operations on our initiative and dealing a succession of blows to the enemy, the Ningnan guerrilla army continually expanded its ranks by enlisting AJNA units and other people in local areas who volunteered to join the army.

"Commander Kim, I have nothing to fear now. I am convinced that we can defeat both the Japanese and the Jingan army. I don't know how I can repay my great debt to you," Ping Nan-yang said confidently, squeezing my hand, on the day when we fought the Jingan army in Xinanzhen.

"Don't mention it. I hope you will destroy as many of the enemy as possible. An army is toughened through battle, isn't it?" I encouraged him enthusiastically, grasping his hands.

During our expedition we also met Chai Shi-rong and Chiang Ai-min and discussed the anti-Japanese allied front with them.

Chiang Ai-min, who had been routed by the 13th brigade of the Japanese army, went to east Manchuria to meet me and then came back after hearing that we were fighting in north Manchuria. He appeared unbelievably cheerful and high-spirited for a commander who lost many battles.

"To tell you the truth, I went to Wangqing to request your assistance. Fang Zhen-sheng said that he was sorry he could not help me because they were also in difficult circumstances. Commander Kim, please help me." Chiang Ai-min spoke frankly about his problem without concern for his honor as the commander of a great unit.

Fang was a Chinese who became a regimental commander of our army after we came to north Manchuria.

We achieved a great deal through joint operations with Ping's unit and other large and small AJNA units. The military and political objectives we had set for the expedition were being achieved rather smoothly.

When we later returned to Jiandao after completing our expedition, we heard the glad news that Zhou Baozhong had successfully formed the 5th Army Corps of the Northeast People's Revolutionary Army, based on the Ningnan anti-Japanese guerrilla army. Most of the Chinese AJNA units which had developed a strong militant relationship with us through the fighting in deep snow in north Manchuria joined the 5th Army Corps.

Many of the cadres of the 5th Army Corps were my intimate friends in the days of the expedition to north Manchuria. Ping Nan-yang became the commander of the 1st Regiment of the 1st Division and then was promoted to division commander; Chai Shi-rong was appointed commander of the 2nd Division before being promoted to a deputy corps commander. Chiang Ai-min was in command of the 5th Regiment of the 2nd Division. His unit had many Korean communists who had shared bloody battles with us.

On hearing the news of the formation of the 5th Army Corps, I wished Zhou success, picturing in my mind the land of Ningan, far beyond Laoyeling.

Together with the battle of Luozigou, the first expedition to north Manchuria marked our first success in frustrating the enemy's plan for a siege, and made a significant contribution to defeating the enemy. Our offensive routed the main force of the 13th brigade of the Japanese army and the Jingan army unit in Ningan.

We shed much blood in north Manchuria. The political instructor of the Yanji company and the young orderly Lee Song Lim fell in battle. This was the bitterest loss to me.

Lee Song Lim was the first orderly whom we had recruited on our arrival in Wangqing. He had been orphaned by the Japanese "punitive" operation. We took him and raised him, providing him with clothes and teaching him to read and write. He had grown into a quite handsome boy. He would sleep, with his arm round my neck. Yang Song Ryong had said that a grown boy should not be indulged if he was to become a man and that he should be sent to the Children's Corps school.

Lee Song Lim cried and said he would not go.

Yang had begun to hate him since Lee began visiting the Children's Corps school to show off the small pistol which I had given him. One day, when we were at a meeting, he had gone to the school in secret and called out the snotty children who were playing in the yard to the willowy dike to show off his pistol. Before he had disassembled the pistol and reassembled it, the break was over. When the teacher came into the classroom to begin the new lesson, he was surprised, and called out the children's name. None of the children who had gone out to see Lee's pistol had come back.

Yang heard this story and suggested to me I should replace the orderly with another man because he might cause an accident.

But I did not accept his suggestion.

Lee Song Lim had been to Onsong and Jongsong with me, and stayed for a long time on the mountain at the back of Tumen. He was a plucky and courageous orderly who was not afraid of death.

I remember he was killed in battle near Tuanshanzi. We were fiercely attacked from two sides by the Japanese army and the Jiangan army.

As he was running to convey my orders to Ping's unit, he was surprised by the enemy. I saw his Mauser after he died. The magazine was empty and there were several dead bodies of the enemy scattered around him. He made the enemy pay dearly for the blood he shed. We cried so sadly that Ping Nan-yang also cried loudly.

When I found Lee's dead body on the field of our victory the first thing I saw in my mind's eye was the Children's Corps school in Wangqing which he had visited as if it were his own home. In this school he was one of many childhood friends who were inseparable from each other.

How could I meet the Children's Corps members of Wangqing after burying Song Lim in north Manchuria? I choked on my tears, and there was a lump in my throat. When my comrades-in-arms suggested we break the frozen ground and bury him, I dissuaded them from covering his body with frozen earth because I felt as if he would come to life again and snuggle into my bosom. I could not turn on my heel knowing I had to leave my child orderly in this terribly frozen land.

Lee Song Lim, who complained of the steepness of the mountain as we crossed the Laoyeling Mountains, is now lying quietly in that valley with his comrades-in-arms, listening to the song of new life ringing across the vastness of Manchuria.

9.4. The Sound of a Harmonica Ringing across Ningan

---

Nothing makes an army suffer more misery than being given the cold shoulder by the people for whom it is fighting. The reader may find it hard to believe that we were given the cold shoulder from the time we began crossing the Laoyeling Mountains. And he might ask, "Have the people, the creator, defender and carrier of morals, ever turned away their faces from the revolutionary army or treated coldly the army which defends their interests?"

I am obliged to contradict common sense and say that I have had such an experience.

Everyone knew that Ningan, with its fertile land, was a great granary. But, when we came down from the Laoyeling Mountains and entered north Manchuria, the people in Ningan hated even to prepare meals for us. If they had treated us inhospitably because they were in dire poverty, we would have felt pity for them. But they turned their backs on us because of misunderstanding and distrust, and this dumbfounded us, for we were accustomed to support and hospitality from the people. If our expeditionary soldiers in their snow shoes and puttees appeared in the distance, they would call their women into the houses and shut their doors, shouting, "The 'Koryo red army' is coming!" And then they watched our every move cautiously. Such unpleasant experiences hurt our pride.

We had to prepare our meals and sleep in the open for a good while.

groups, beating drums and gongs, clapping their hands and presenting bouquets to us. Some people would offer us hot water or boiled green maize. One day a pine arch was even erected in Macun to congratulate the soldiers.

But the Ningan people gave us a wide berth. We sent out scouts and set the underground organizations in action, but we failed to catch the voice of the people in this region. This was a much cooler welcome than we had expected in east Manchuria on the basis of information from Zhou Bao-zhong and Ko Pobae, who had often visited north Manchuria.

There was a village called Wolianghe in Ningan County. It was called Wolianghe because it had fertile land and plenty of food grain, but the people there ignored us completely, and did not even think of providing food.

We tried to gather them together to initiate political work, but they did not respond to our request. We could not even give them a lecture on current events. Lee Song Lim may have complained of the steep Laoyeling Mountains, but this barrier was rougher and steeper.

Some of my men said that Ninganites were cold-blooded people by nature, but I rejected this. The mind of the people may vary a little, but it was hardly possible that the people in this place were the only ones to lack the good manners and customs of Chinese or Koreans, who accord hospitality to their guests and take good care of them.

What, then, was the reason for this unfriendly attitude of the Ningan people, which stunned the men of our expeditionary force?

According to the historical record, in olden times Ningan was the capital of Palhae. This time-honored city once had a population of 100,000. This indicated that this place had a long history of development. The historical record also indicated that the land of this place was fertile and its people were industrious, frugal, simple-hearted, and trustworthy and respected justice and law.

After the capital of Palhae was moved to another place and its people were scattered in all directions, its population increased or decreased over the millennia and scores of generations, but the courtesy and civilized customs of the Ninganites were neither debased nor dishonored, but handed down without change. It was unreasonable to believe that the Ningan people were coldhearted by nature.

Some soldiers alleged that Ningan was not a suitable place for the communist movement. They said that, firstly, the level of consciousness of these people was too low to assimilate the communist idea, and secondly, that Ningan County had abundant land, whereas the number of farmers who cultivated it was comparably small, so there would not be any antagonism in social and class relations and, accordingly, a class struggle would not take place.

Such nihilistic assertions were refuted mercilessly. Is any particular place suitable for communism while any other place is not suitable for communism? Communists who say so cannot win the world. With this kind of communism we cannot realize the slogan "Workers of the Whole World, Unite!" which is written in The Communist Manifesto. The argument that there would be no antagonism in people's relations in a place where the population was thin and land was plentiful was a superficial view which resulted from an ignorance of reality.

According to such an argument, the class contradictions should have been acuter in densely populated Germany than in sparsely populated Russia and accordingly, the revolution should have achieved victory in Germany earlier than in Russia. I rejected such arguments as unfounded.

I said the fact that the Ningan people did not understand communism and were hostile to the communists should be explained by the crimes of the Japanese imperialists, who resorted to every conceivable means to destroy communism. When the communist movement became active in Ningan, the Japanese imperialists immediately launched a pernicious anti-communist propaganda campaign to drive a wedge between the communists and the people. In Ningan, where the people were relatively backward in their political and ideological enlightenment, the enemy's propaganda penetrated easily into the people's minds.

The early Korean communists who had spent their energies in factional strife were also to blame for the anti-communist tendency prevailing in the Ningnan area. Already in the mid-1920s, immediately after a communist party was founded in Korea, the Tuesday group established its organization under the magnificent name of the Manchurian general bureau of the Korean Communist Party, and set about expanding the power of its own group, effectively selling out the noble name of communism. They provoked the simple and good-natured people to engage in reckless demonstrations and riots by clamoring for the independence of Korea and the immediate building of socialism.

The ultra-Leftists broadcast an appeal to the Ningnan people to rise up in the May 30 Uprising. The main targets of this uprising in Jiandao were the Japanese government organs for colonial rule and the Chinese landlords, but in Ningnan the target was the nationalist organizations, such as the Korean General Association. The demonstration, which started in the county town, suffered a heavy blow at the very outset.

The May Day demonstration in 1932, too, ended by drowning the Ningnan county town in a bloodbath and exposing the core elements to repression by the enemy. As a result of these adventuristic demonstrations, the revolutionary organizations in Ningnan were destroyed as groups. After the May Day demonstration the communist movement in Ningnan went into a rapid decline. The party leadership stopped developing the armed forces and guerrilla zones and dispersed to Muling, Dongning, Wangqing and other places. Some people gave up the revolution and went back to the Ningnan county town.

The indiscriminate white terrorism of the Japanese imperialists and the Manchukuo army and police besmirched the image of communism in the eyes of the people.

The fear of prison and death which they faced at the end of their struggle made them tremble in despair. The nihilistic view was prevalent among many people that the result of revolution was death, and it would be pointless to take part in the communist movement.

The Chinese communists came and tried to rebuild the revolution in Ningnan, after the Korean communists had left declaring the attempt was futile and the revolution would not take root in the minds of the masses, but they also were dumbfounded at the cold attitude of the masses towards the revolution in general.

Some Korean nationalists were also to blame for spreading anti-communist poison in Ningnan. The remnants of the Independence Army which fled to Russia in fright at the large-scale "punitive" operations in the year of Kyongsin (1920), and then returned to Ningnan following the Amur incident were fanatical in their anti-Soviet, anti-communist propaganda. They slandered communism and the Soviet Union, saying that the dreadful incident in Amur had been provoked by the Korean communists in exile in conspiracy with the Soviet Union. The nationalists even went so far as to say that Kim Jwa Jin was killed because of the communists. Of course, this was a lie. But the innocent people believed it.

(Lee Wha Rang: The Amur Incident is better known as the Free City Incident. By April 1921, the Korean military units in Manchuria were defeated in a series of battles with the Japanese and the survivors fled to Siberia. There were at least 36 independent armies; Lee Dong Whi, Hong Bom Do and other generals regrouped them into the Greater Korea Independence Corps (Taehan Tong Lip Dang). The Corps was allied with the Soviet Army and received Soviet equipment and training. At about the same time, the Soviet-Koreans formed their own military unit - the Korean Revolutionary Military Congress - and wanted to absorb the Independence Corps. Gen. Lee and other nationalists realized that the Soviet-Koreans worked for Lenin, not for the Korean independence, and refused to cooperate.

On June 27, 1921, the Soviet Red Army and Soviet-Koreans surrounded in a deceptive move an Independence Army corps of 7,000 men at Alekseyevsk (Siberia) and demanded that they surrender. A battle ensued and several hundred Koreans were killed. Many managed to escape. Some 1,700 captured Koreans were pressed into the Red Army and many officers were jailed or killed. Today, this infamous battle is known as the Free City Incident.

The Soviet version of this Incident differs. According to the Soviet historians, there were some 7,000 armed Koreans at the camp being reorganized into regular Soviet army organizations - divisions, regiments, battalions, companies and squads - and a modern military command structure. The nationalists refused to go along and started to sneak away. Naturally, the other armed Koreans tried to stop them from leaving and unfortunately, there were some shots fired. At any rate, the bulk of the nationalists managed to escape to Manchuria and joined the anti-Communist forces there.

The Comintern found the ring leaders of the Free City Incident guilty of factionalism, and Lee Tong Whi, Hong Bom Do and other nationalists returned to Siberia.)

The people in Ningnan were wary not just of communism but of any army. They hated all armies, regardless of their identity and their mission, because they considered every army they had seen to be hangers-on who emptied their granaries and took their money. To say nothing of the Japanese army and the puppet Manchukuo army, some Chinese nationalist army units who professed the anti-Japanese national salvation struggle, also took the people's money, grains and domestic animals. The Korean nationalists set up the Sinmin-bu, an administrative organization, in Ningnan, and exacted war funds and military provisions from the people.

What is worse, the local bandits who frequently took people hostage, could fall upon them at any time and aggravate their mood. So the feelings of the people, who had to submit to all of these factions, were beyond description. Taking this historical background into consideration, it would have been unreasonable to blame them for their cold-heartedness. It is not really of much significance that the expeditionary force did not receive supplies from the people. The greatest problem was that one of the major aims of our expedition, the aim of sowing the seeds of revolution among the people of north Manchuria, was not being achieved. If the people would never open their hearts to us, we would never find a way to revolutionize north Manchuria.

In order to summon the Ningnan people to rise in revolution we had to make a breakthrough somehow.

While taking stock of the party work in the Badaohezi district, we developed a deeper grasp of the reality of Ningan County with the help of Kim Paek Ryong, secretary of the district party committee. According to him, Badaohezi had been more effectively revolutionized than any other part of Ningan County.

Badaohezi was also known as Xiaolaidipan, the place where the Ningan county party committee and the Badaohezi district party committee were located. The word Xiaolaidipan was derived from the name of Kim So Rae (Xiaolai is the Chinese pronunciation of So Rae), who was the leader of the Taejong religion in and around Helong County.

I first heard about Kim So Rae from So Jung Sok when I attended the Jirin Yuwen Middle School. So Jung Sok once taught at the Konwon School in Helong, which was established by Kim So Rae. Kim So Rae was the founder and headmaster of this school and had close relations with So Il as well as the important figures of the northern military and political administration and the Jiandao National Association. As a man of a strong anti-Japanese sentiment, he supported the national salvation movement by sending his school graduates to the Independence Army units led by such renowned generals as Hong Bom Do and Kim Iwa Jin.

After the Independence Army withdrew from north Jiandao, Kim So Rae bought land in the Badaohezi valley and became a landlord there, supplying war funds to Kim Jwa Jin's Independence Army unit. Lee Kwang also obtained many rifles from him immediately after the guerrilla army was founded.

The revolutionaries in the Ningan area disliked him because he was the leader of the Taejong religion. Some of those who were ignorant of history mistook this movement for a Japanese religion. The Taejong religion was a pure Korean religion, which worshipped Hwanin, Hwanung and Hwangorn, the Gods who are described in the Korea-founding myth.

Kim Paek Ryong said that the Badaohezi valley was 20 to 25 miles long. There were many villages scattered in the valley and Koreans made up a considerable proportion of the inhabitants. Badaohezi, which had once been a thriving supply base for the Independence Army, became a base for the activity of the Ningan guerrilla army at the beginning of the 1930s.

Without any great hope, I employed the good offices of Kim Paek Ryong to send a political work team to a village in Badaohezi to inquire into the mood of the population and also to reconnoiter the enemy's movements. The team was made up of masters of propaganda and agitation.

However, Wang Tae Hung, the political instructor of the 5th company, who led the team to the village, came back to me looking exhausted. "We failed again. Any amusing story fell flat with them. I would rather preach the Four Books and Three Classics to the ear of an ox than talk to the Ningan people."

He dropped his head in despair after making his report. Listening to his words, Kim Paek Ryong heaved a sigh, as if it were his mistake that the Ninganites were treating the guests from east Manchuria so coldly.

"Anyhow, the Ningnan people are a real problem. We have made great efforts to persuade them, even sending an inspection group to east Manchuria to learn from their experience, but they are so stubborn. After the inspection group returned they established a Children' Corps school which enrolled about 50 pupils at first, but it all came to nothing."

What should we make of people who turned their backs on revolutionaries who defended and represented their interests? I pondered deeply on this question because I was facing such a sheer barrier for the first time in my life. Our efforts to revolutionize Fuerhe and Wujiazi had not gone entirely smoothly, but the people there were not so cold-hearted as in Ningnan.

In the thousands of years of Korean history the masses of the people had never been bad. In my life I had never had to distinguish between good and bad masses of the people. Those who besmirched history and sought to deceive it were a handful of people, the ruling circles. Of course, there were individual traitors to the nation, misers, swindlers, imposters, ambitious men and immoral men. But they were only a few whole grains among the cleaned rice. The great mass of the people, which we can regard as representing the whole of this world, has always driven the wheel of history forward honestly and sincerely. They produced turtle boats and built pyramids if necessary. When the times required their blood they dashed towards the enemy's pillbox, braving death without hesitation.

The problem was that we had failed to find a way to touch the hearts of the Ningnan people. The political work team led by Wang Tae Hung had clearly conducted a stirring anti-Japanese propaganda campaign. Did the Ningnan people need more of such speeches? They must have heard enough of them until to burn their ears. The Independence Army, the national salvation army, and even the bandits used to make such speeches. Could Wang's political work succeed on the basis of speeches?

Their mistake was that they tried blindly to teach the people. Since when did we regard ourselves as the people's teachers and the people as our pupils? No doubt it was the communists' mission to lead the people from darkness to light, but wasn't it impudent of us to pose as their teachers?

There might be many ways for us to penetrate the depths of people's hearts, but their hearts would accept only sincerity. Only sincerity could fuse our blood and their blood as in one artery. Unless we mixed with the people as their own sons, grandsons and brothers, we would be forsaken for ever by the people of Ningnan.

I was told that when the Wangqing children's art troupe played in Ningnan, the performance hall was crowded out every time. Both the children's art troupe and the guerrillas appealed to them in the name of the revolution, but the people had welcomed the former and turned their backs on the latter.

"Did you see the performance of our children's art troupe when they came here?" I asked Kim Paek Ryong.

"Yes, I did, their performance was excellent." He said the art troupe had set Ningan buzzing with excitement.

"Wherever the children's art troupe went there were crowds of people, I was told. A wonderful change to take place among the Ningan people, who did not like communist propaganda, wasn't it? What do you think attracted so many people?"

"The children behaved quite charmingly. They fascinated the Ningan people by their performances and influenced them by always laughing as brightly as the full moon in the clear sky. They behaved with people like their own fathers and mothers, so the Ninganyites, no matter how callous, could not but be moved."

"Their talent made them very popular in Wangqing, too."

"Of course, their performance was a success, but it was the children themselves who won the people's hearts. I myself was charmed by their good behavior. They cleaned up all of Badaohezi village. They used to get up early to make the village spick and span. In daytime they helped the peasants in the field."

Kim Paek Ryong praised the children's art troupe members repeatedly, making me feel proud of them.

"They have become sensible at an early age."

"The children endeared themselves to the villagers. When they saw the villagers, even in the distance, they raised their hands in salute. They followed the grown-ups, addressing them as 'grandfather,' 'father,' 'aunt,' 'sister' They were loved by the whole village."

The children's art troupe won the people's hearts because they gave their own hearts to the people. When we dropped an axe into an ice hole in the Tuman River, we spent half a day in sincere efforts to find it. Why? Because we were devoted to the people and loved them. When we showed them our sincerity, they never rejected it.

Wang's political work team made a mistake, because they failed to give their hearts sincerely to the people. They clung to their method only with the intention of revolutionizing the people of north Manchuria, but they never thought of loving them and becoming intimate with them. It was not strange that the people in north Manchuria had not opened their hearts to us.

First of all, it was a mistake to have started their contact with the people with a speech. How valuable the lesson we learned from the activities of the Wangqing children's art troupe, which first gave the people their own hearts and then tugged at their heartstrings with songs!

I made up my mind to change the form of our political work and discussed the matter with our commanding officers. I then instructed the company political instructors to bring all our good Harmonica players to the headquarters. When they had gathered I checked them one by one.

Hong Bom from the Yanji company played the Harmonica well enough to perk up an audience. He sometimes produced the sound of an accordion concert on his harmonica. A soldier of the Wangqing 5th company was famous for Harmonica playing, but he was a novice compared with Hong.

Hong Bom had practiced the Harmonia from his primary school days. A visitor to his house once left a Harmonica in his room and did not come again, so it naturally became Hong's favorite. Practicing on this instrument for several years he developed his talent admirably, but the Harmonica became worn out and its gilt came off. Fortunately its sound remained unchanged.

I saw his Harmonica as we were preparing for the expedition in Duitoulazi and thought I should obtain a new one for him. But I had no chance to do this before we had to leave for north Manchuria.

Many of the guerrillas and other people in Jiandao knew of Hong Bom's career. He was an ordinary soldier, but he became a topic of interested discussion among the people because of his extraordinary talent in playing the Harmonica. Harmonica players were always loved by their comrades-in-arms.

Hong's native town was Jongsong, North Hamgyong Province. He followed his parents to Jiandao and took part in the revolutionary movement from his young days. Once as a Red Guards man he joined in the mass struggle to frustrate the Dunhua-Tumen railway project. After the dissolution of the Hailangou guerrilla zone, he moved to Wangougou, carrying his knapsack with a Harmonica in it, and joined the guerrilla army.

I instructed Wang Tae Hung to take the Harmonica concert group to the village where he had failed once and to try to move their hearts. And I requested Kim Paek Ryong to buy as many Harmonicas as possible, with the help of the underground organizations.

That day I visited the secretariat of the Ningnan county party committee to prepare the propaganda materials for the people. While I was talking to the comrades at the secretariat, Wang, who had been to the village with the Harmonica concert group, appeared before me with a broad smile on his face.

"Comrade Commander, it was a success. Those uncouth persons opened their hearts to us at last."

Wang was a commanding officer of a particular character, who first reported the result, and then explained what he had done. The activity of the Harmonia concert group was extremely instructive. It won the hearts of the callous people who had turned their backs on the revolutionary army.

The group started by clearing the snow from the front yard of a house in the center of the village. After posting a sentry on this fairly large area of ground, Hong Bom and another man played a Harmonica duet as the first item on the program. The rest of the group danced to the tune of Harmoniacs. Two or three boys who were spinning tops in a nearby lane ran towards the fence of the yard to watch the performance.

Other children also came running towards the show from other lanes, hitching up the waistbands of their trousers as they came.

The Harmonica duet began with The Song of General Mobilization, then changed into The Children's Song and How Far Have We Come? The children, charmed by the beautiful melody of Hong's Harmonica, followed the song and clapped their hands. Some children ran about the village shouting that the "Koryo red army" soldiers from Jiandao were dancing. When the grown-ups heard the news, they watched the revolutionary army's entertainments from a distance with folded arms. Then some of them approached the performance and gazed at the "musicians" of the "Koryo red army."

When 40 to 50 people had gathered to see the performance, the Harmonica concert group played Arirang. This attracted the whole village, and the audience rapidly increased to one hundred, two hundred and at last three hundred.

At this moment Ko Pobae appeared and sang the Melancholy Song of Pyongan Province. The hundreds of villagers were captivated by his sorrowful melody and encircled the yard in a tight ring, straining their ears to catch the sounds issuing from the mouth of this soldier of the "Koryo red army."

Ko stopped singing halfway and began delivering a speech in a new dramatic tone. "Dear villagers, where's your home town? North Kyongsang Province! Kangwon Province! South Hamgyong Province! South Pyongan Province! Don't ask me where I come from. Don't think I'm putting on airs. I don't know where I was born. I know only that I was born in a coastal village in Korea. I arrived in Jiandao, crossing the river on my parent's back. I don't know whether it was the Tuman River or the Yalu River. I am such a dunce."

The audience was amused by his oratorical talent, laughing and whispering in response. In an amusing manner, like an old story-teller, he told how he wandered about Jiandao like a dried leaf and how he finished off Japs in many battles after he became a guerrilla soldier. Then, as if he had simply turned over a gramophone record, he changed his subject quite naturally into a speech intended to awaken the people to the need for the revolution. "Dear villagers, what is our unanimous desire? We wish we could return home. But the Japs stand on the road to our homeland. Should we leave those barbarians alone? No, I can't. So I joined the guerrilla army with a rifle in my hand. We came to Ningan to destroy the Japanese. I was told that the Japanese soldiers in north Manchuria are more arrogant."

When his speech reached this point, a Japanese army cap appeared from nowhere on his head. He had hidden it in the waistband of his trousers and transferred it in a flash to his head. Then a moustache and spectacles appeared on his face. The audience immediately grasped that he was made up as a Japanese army officer.

In this comic make-up Ko Pobae stretched himself in a yawn and walked round the yard two or three times with his hands folded behind his back, stretching his jaw and twitching his face in a funny fashion. The people were reminded of a Japanese army officer taking a walk in the ground of his barracks immediately after rising from his bed.

The audience tittered at first and then split their sides in laughter.

As soon as laughter calmed down, Ko went round the audience one by one, laughing in different kinds according to their sex and age - an old woman's voice before a grandmother, an old man's voice before a grandfather and a bride's voice before a young lady. They laughed themselves into convulsions, until the tears came running down.

After winning over the villagers in this way, the Harmonica concert group launched into anti-Japanese propaganda and appealed to the people to support the revolutionary army. The Harmonica concert group was able to have such remarkable success in the very place where the political work team failed the previous day, because their propaganda catered honestly to the feelings of the villagers.

Drawing on this experience, we began to mix more closely with the people and revolutionized tens of villages in Ningan one after another by various methods. The iron barrier which had separated the Ningan people from the "Koryo red army" from east Manchuria was removed at last. Where the "Koryo red army" had once passed by, the ranks of the Communist Party increased in numbers, and the Young Communist League, the Women's Association, the Children's Corps and other revolutionary organizations expanded rapidly.

The people who opened their hearts wide to the communists experienced the greatest pride of their life in supporting and assisting the revolutionary army.

Among such people I still recall many unforgettable men and women such as old man Kim in the Tianqiaoling timber mill, old man Jo Thaek Ju in Dawaizi, the old Chinese woman Meng Cheng-fu in Wolianghe and old man Lee in Nanhutou.

Old woman Meng frequently gave the expeditionary force valuable information about the enemy's movements, though she once suffered all sorts of hardships when she was arrested by the Japanese police together with the wife of her husband's cousin.
